KANTURK, a market and post town, and the head of a poor-law union, partly in the parishes of CASTLE-MAGNER and KILROE, but chiefly in that of CLONFERT, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 27½ miles (N. W.) from Cork, on the Bogra road to Abbeyfeale, and 131¾ miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 4388 inhabitants. This place formerly belonged to the M'Carthys, kings of Desmond. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Mac Donogh Carthy commenced the erection of a splendid and extensive mansion in the castellated style (now called Kanturk Castle) about half a mile south of the town; but it having been represented to the government as a regular fortress, its progress was stayed, and it never was completed. The possessions here were subsequently mortgaged by Dermod Mac Owen Carthy to Sir Philip Perceval, by whom they were held as security in 1641, when the proprietor was in actual rebellion; and in 1666 the court of claims decided that, as Sir Philip had advanced more than the value of the estate, his grandson, Sir Philip Perceval, was legally entitled: he accordingly passed patent for the same in 1667. Kanturk Castle, although not actually within any one of the parishes in which the town is situated, is deserving of some notice here from its name, and also from its connexion with the founder of Kanturk. It stands in the vicinity of the mountains and the river Blackwater, and occupies the four sides of a quadrangle, 120 feet in length by 80 feet in breadth: it is three stories high, and flanked at each angle by a square tower of four stories, having three windows in each story in the central portion; the quoins, mouldings, beltings, and other ornamental parts are of hewn stone. The battlements, if ever carried up, have fallen down; and the additional story mentioned by Smith, in his History of Cork, is only apparent on one side, where it forms the under-ground or cellar floor.

The TOWN is pleasantly situated at the confluence of the rivers Allua and Dallua, which here flow through a fine open valley in the midst of gently rising hills; and the vicinity is studded with comfortable farmhouses and young plantations. Each river is crossed by a good stone bridge; that over the Allua consisting of six, and that on the Dallua of five, segmental arches. The place is irregularly built, consisting of several short streets, chiefly diverging from the centre, and in 1841 contained 695 houses, many of which have been lately rebuilt; a new street, also, has been formed between the two rivers, terminating towards the north by a well-fitted up hotel surrounded by a thriving plantation. These and other improvements were effected under the auspices of the earls of Egmont, the late proprietors of the greater part of the town; which is considered extremely healthy as a place of residence. A news-room is supported by subscription; and a branch of the National Bank has been established. Public cars from Tralee and Abbeyfeale to Cork pass through the town, and a car goes direct hence to Cork. The market is on Saturday, and is abundantly supplied with all kinds of provisions, and from Christmas to Easter with corn, pigs, and sheep; fairs for cattle and general farming-stock are held on March 17th, May 4th, July 4th, Sept. 29th, Nov. 3rd, and Dec. 11th. In the immediate vicinity, on the river Dallua, is an extensive boulting-mill, a portion of the produce of which, and of another on a smaller scale near the castle, is sent to Cork, where it is shipped for England: the former of these mills is capable of manufacturing 12,000 bags of flour annually, and has proved of great advantage to the neighbouring farmers, by affording them a ready market for their corn, which previously they were under the necessity of sending to Cork. Quarter-sessions for the East Riding are held here in June and December; and petty-sessions are held every Saturday. The sessions-house and bridewell are substantial and commodious buildings: the former has a handsome front of hewn stone, consisting of a pediment supported by broad pilasters, with a Venetian window between them; the latter is on a large scale, comprising several wards, and having separate day-rooms and yards, adapted for the proper classification of the male and female prisoners. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town.

The ECCLESIASTICAL district of Kanturk was formed out of the parish of Clonfert, and is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the gift of the Bishop: the curate's stipend is £100, payable in equal portions by the vicar and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house, in the vicinity, was erected in 1818, the Board of First Fruits having granted £450 and a loan of £50; attached to it is a glebe of 10 acres, subject to a rent of £12 per annum. The church is a small structure with a square embattled tower surmounted by pinnacles, built in 1789, the same Board giving £200. In the Roman Catholic divisions the town is the head of a district, which comprises about one-third of the parish of Clonfert and the whole of the ecclesiastical parish of Kilcorcoran. The chapel is a remarkably neat cruciform building, erected on a site presented by the Earl of Egmont; the chapel-yard, which is tastefully planted, and forms an agreeable promenade for the inhabitants, is entered by a handsome gateway of pillars of hewn stone, surmounted by richly-crocketed pinnacles, the work of a native artist, who also executed a beautiful font for the chapel. At Coolavota is a Roman Catholic chapel for the rural district. The parochial school is under the superintendence of the Protestant clergyman, and a large building for a second public school was lately erected on a site given by the Earl of Egmont: there are also two national schools. The poor-law union workhouse was opened July 18, 1844, and will accommodate 800 paupers. At Curragh was a castle that belonged to the M'Carthys, on the site of which is now a modern mansion: near it is a strong chalybeate spring. The celebrated lawyer, Barry Yelverton, afterwards Lord Avonmore, was born at Kanturk.

KEADUE, or KIDUE, a parish, in the barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, contiguous to the town of Cavan, and on the road from Dublin to Enniskillen: the population is included in the return for Urney. The parish comprises 2893 statute acres; and is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, held by the vicar of Urney and Annageliffe: the rectory is part of the corps of the deanery of Kilmore. The tithe rent-charge is £81. 18. 3., of which two-thirds are payable to the dean and one-third to the vicar. The church for the town of Cavan stands on the townland of Keadue, on a site given by the late Earl of Farnham. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Urney and Annageliffe.

KEADUE, a village, in the parish of KILRONAN, union and barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 220 inhabitants. It partly arose out of the Arigna Iron and Coal works, and contains 37 houses: a market-house was erected by Colonel Tenison, its proprietor; and there is a patent for a market and fairs, not now held. The village is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held on alternate Wednesdays. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel, which was built by Colonel Tenison.—See KILRONAN.

KEADY, a market and post town, and a parish, partly in the barony of TURANEY, but chiefly in that of ARMAGH, union and county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Armagh, and 61½ (N. N. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Armagh to Dublin; containing 9865 inhabitants, of whom 1120 are in the town. It is advantageously situated on the river Keady, which issues from Clay lake, about a mile and a half distant, and which, from its numerous falls, attracted the attention of some enterprising Englishmen, who formed a large bleaching establishment here about the year 1750, and laid the foundation of the linen trade; previously to which, the whole of the surrounding country had been little better than an uncultivated heath. After the retirement of the parties who originally introduced the trade, it began to decline; but in 1826, the Messrs. Sadler, of Leeds, erected a very extensive establishment at Dundrum, and were the first who attempted to make linen from mill-spun yarn, and who carried on the manufacture of fine linen in this neighbourhood. Since that period, the increase of the trade has been very rapid. There are some large mills for spinning flax at New Holland and Darkley, in which upwards of 700 persons (principally young females) are constantly employed: an extensive manufactory for fine linen has been established at Ballier, affording employment to 2500 persons; another for sheeting at Dundrum; and bleach-greens at Anvale, Greenmount, Dundrum, Ballier, Millview, Darkley, and Linenvale, where about 235,000 pieces of linen are annually finished, principally for the English market. Within the parish are three lakes, called Clay, Tullynavad, and Aughnagurgan, the waters of which are dammed up at a great expense by the proprietors, and an abundant supply is secured throughout the year. The town consists of 250 houses, many of them well built. The market is on Friday, for linen-yarn and general provisions; and fairs for live stock are held on the second Friday of every month. Here is a constabulary police station; a manor court is held monthly for the recovery of debts under £2, and petty-sessions in the court-house every Friday. The court-house and the market-place are commodiously arranged.

The PARISH, including part of Armagh-Breague, comprises 15,351¾ statute acres, of which 208 are under water; the soil is generally light and stony, but in some parts loamy and rich. The system of agriculture is improving, and there is a considerable quantity of bog, affording a valuable supply of fuel; nearly the whole of the waste land has been inclosed, and brought into a good state of cultivation. There are several quarries of building-stone: a lead-mine was opened here and wrought, a few years since, by the Mining Company of Ireland, but has been discontinued. The scenery is in many places highly picturesque: in the vicinity of the town, and on the road from Armagh, more than 100,000 trees of different kinds have been planted within the last few years. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. The church, a neat plain edifice, was erected in 1776, by Primate Robinson, and was enlarged and a tower added to it in 1822, by aid of a loan of £300 from the late Board of First Fruits; it was again enlarged a few years ago, at a cost of £506, of which £306 were a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1777, by aid of a gift of £100 from the Board; the glebe comprises 40 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Derrynoose, and containing three chapels, situated at Keady (a plain cruciform edifice), Derrynoose, and Madden. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Wesleyan Methodists; also a dispensary, with an infirmary attached to it. At Tessagh is the cemetery of the ancient Culdean priory of Armagh, in which was found, in 1824, an antique ring containing a large emerald richly set.

KEALAVOLLEN, Killawillin, or Killavullane, a village, in the parish of Monanimy, union of Mallow, barony of Fermoy, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 0½ miles (S. W.) from Castletown-Roche; on the river Blackwater, and at the intersection of the road from Mallow to Fermoy by that from Doneraile to Cork; containing 394 inhabitants. This place is picturesquely situated at the foot of the range called the Neagle mountains from the name of the family that for several centuries possessed this district, and whose descendants still reside in the neighbourhood. The Blackwater is here crossed by a neat stone bridge of three arches, at the south end of which is an immense rock overhanging the river; the base of the rock has been worn away by the action of the water, and is perforated so as to form a low and narrow cavern of considerable extent, resembling a subterraneous passage. The road from the bridge winds round the steep rock, and branches off towards the east through a romantic mountain pass on the old road to Fermoy. The village consists of several comfortable houses; Ballymackmoy House stands on the summit of the rock before mentioned, and commands an extensive view of the surrounding scenery, which is of the most picturesque and diversified character. The air is very salubrious, and the river affords excellent salmon and trout fishing. Here are the Roman Catholic chapel of the district, and a station of the constabulary police; and in the immediate vicinity is a large boulting-mill.

KEELSALAGH.—See Kilsillagh.

KELLISTOWN, or Kellystown, a parish, partly in the barony of Forth, but chiefly in that of Carlow, union and county of Carlow, and province of Leinster, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Carlow, on the road from that place to Newtown-Barry; containing 684 inhabitants. It comprises 4405 statute acres of land, of good quality, and the elevated grounds command extensive prospects: in it is Moyle, the residence of T. Bunbury, Esq. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the gift of the Crown for two turns, and the Bishop for one: the tithe rent-charge is £271. 7. The church is a small plain building, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted £600 and a loan of £100, in 1808; it was lately repaired by a grant of £155 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1802, by aid of a gift of £100 from the Board; the glebe comprises 20*a.* 2*r.* 23*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Gilbertstown. One of the ancient round towers stood here till 1807, when it was pulled down to make room for the belfry of the church. The remains of the old church denote an early date; in the burial-ground are some tombstones of the Cummins family, formerly proprietors of this place.

KELLS, an ancient parish, in the union of Ballymena, barony of Lower Antrim, county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, 5½ miles (N.) from Antrim, and on the road from Ballymena to Randalstown: the population is included in the return for the parish of Connor, into which this place (which in the civil divisions is not recognised as a parish) is generally considered to have merged. In the early part of the ninth century, a cell existed here, on the site of which a priory was erected some time before the arrival of the English, by O'Brien Carrog, who dedicated it to the Blessed Virgin; the establishment existed till 1442, when it was surrendered, with all its possessions. The village has a neat appearance; it is a constabulary police station, and has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Antrim. Fairs are held on Jan. 10th, March 1st, June 10th, and Sept. 12th. The parish is in the diocese of Connor, and is wholly impropriate in the Earl of Mountcashel, who is bound by the Colvill lease to pay the incumbent of the adjoining parish of Connor £3 per annum for discharging the clerical duties.

KELLS, a parish, in the union of Callan, partly in the barony of Shillelogher, but chiefly in that of Kells, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 6¼ miles (S. by W.) from Kilkenny, on the road from that place to Carrick-on-Suir; containing 1831 inhabitants, of whom 342 are in the village. This place, which was formerly of considerable importance, was built by Geoffry Fitz-Robert, one of Earl Strongbow's followers, for his English companions: he also founded a priory in 1183, which he filled with monks from Bodmin, in Cornwall; and his sons William and John gave charters to the inhabitants, constituting the place a free borough. The town afterwards passed into the De Birmingham family, and was burnt by William De Birmingham in 1252, during a dispute with the St. Aubans; Edward Bruce occupied it for a short time in 1316, and in 1327 it was again burnt by the De Birminghams. In the early part of the 14th century, the barony was granted to the Poers, and the town was fortified by Sir Eustace le Poer. Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, was slain near this place, in 1398, by the O'Byrnes, whom he had pursued from their own country near Dublin. The prior of Kells was a lord of parliament, and the priory of Tullelash, in the county of Cork, was under his authority. The priory, with some of its possessions, was granted at the Dissolution to the Earl of Ormonde: several towers and part of the walls remain, and there is a large moat, said to have belonged to a college. The village, which contains 59 houses, is a constabulary police station, and has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Knocktopher and Stoneyford; a fair is held in it on July 13th.

The parish comprises 4410 statute acres; there are three large flour-mills, worked by water. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, united by act of council, in 1678, to the rectories and vicarages of Earlstown, Ballytobin, and Mallardstown, and the rectories of Kilree, Stamcarty, and Annamult, and in the alternate patronage of the Bishop and the Marquess of Ormonde, in the latter of whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £223. 7., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar; the gross tithe of the benefice to the incumbent is £605. 11. There are two churches in the union. That at Kells is a new structure, built at a cost of £987, whereof £300 were raised by subscription, and the remainder was paid from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; it accommodates 200 persons, and was opened for divine service in May, 1844: the other church is at Ballytobin. The glebe-house is a handsome building, erected in 1830 by the then incumbent, at a cost of £1700; the glebe lands, in various parts of the union, comprise 54*a*. 2*r*. 24*p*. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Callan, but chiefly in that of Danesfort, and has a plain chapel. The parochial school is supported by the incumbent.

Ancient Seal.

KELLS, a market and post town, a parish, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the barony of KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Navan, and 31 (N. W.) from Dublin, on the coach-road to Enniskillen; containing 7648 inhabitants, of whom 4205 are in the town. This place, formerly called Kenlis, is of remote antiquity, and appears to have acquired at a very early period a considerable degree of importance. A MONASTERY for Canons Regular was founded here about the year 550, by St. Columb, on a site granted, it is said, by McKervaill, King of Ireland; and notwithstanding its repeated disasters by conflagration and the ravages of the Danes, it seems to have been the head of a small surrounding diocese, which subsequently merged into that of Meath. The monastery was restored, in 806, by Cellach, abbot of Iona, who had taken refuge here from the Norwegians; but it appears to have been never free from disasters of various kinds till after the arrival of the English. In 1152, the memorable synod of the Irish clergy, at which Cardinal Paparo distributed the four palls to the archbishops, was assembled here; in 1156, the town, with all its sacred edifices, was destroyed by fire. The monastery, after its restoration, was plundered in 1172, by Dermod Macmurrough, at the head of a party of English; but in the year following, Hugh de Lacy bestowed on it such ample grants of land as to entitle him to be regarded as its second founder. In 1176, the town was plundered by some of the native septs, and about the same time a castle was erected for its defence against the O'Nials. Walter, son of Hugh de Lacy, in the reign of Richard I. founded a monastery for Crouched friars, and granted the inhabitants a charter confirming all their privileges, which he made equal to those of the men of Bristol. In addition to its castle the town was strengthened with mural fortifications, rendered necessary from its situation on the frontier; and it was considered one of the most important places in the county. Richard II., in 1388, confirmed the charter of the burgesses granted by Walter de Lacy, and from this period till the time of Henry VI. the town ranked with Trim and Athboy as one of the principal boroughs in Meath; but by repeated wars, and the subsequent dissolution of its richly-endowed religious establishments, it materially declined in importance.

The TOWN is pleasantly situated about a quarter of a mile south-west of the river Blackwater, and in 1841 contained 644 houses, in general neatly built, though in some instances without much regularity. The approaches from Dublin and Drogheda are finely embellished with lofty trees, and the general appearance of the town is cheerful and prepossessing. A silk and cotton-lace manufactory was established in 1824, and affords employment to upwards of a hundred women and children; the establishment has been patronised by the Dowager Queen Adelaide, and three medals have been presented by the Dublin Society to the proprietor; nearly the whole of the lace is sent to England. There are a brewery and a tannery in the town, and a considerable retail trade is carried on: in the excise arrangements Kells is within the district of Drogheda. The market is on Saturday, and is amply supplied with provisions of all kinds, oats, and meal; with yarn, coarse linens, and merchandise; and also with cattle, sheep, and hogs. Fairs are held under the charter on the Thursday before Shrove-Tuesday, the day before Ascension-day, Sept. 9th, and Oct. 16th; and two new fairs on July 16th and Nov. 17th. There is a chief constabulary police station. Under various charters, the last of which was granted by James II., confirming all existing privileges, the corporation consisted of a sovereign (who was a justice of the peace), two provosts, 24 burgesses, a recorder, prothonotary and town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The freedom was obtained only by favour. In 1840, the corporation was dissolved, and the town placed under the management of municipal commissioners. The borough sent members to the Irish parliament from the 2nd of Elizabeth till the Union, when it was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to Thomas, second earl of Bective. A court of record was held before the sovereign, with jurisdiction to the amount of 10 marks; but no proceedings have issued from it since 1819. The quarter-sessions for the county are held here at Easter and Michaelmas, and petty-sessions every week, at which latter the sovereign used to preside with the county magistrates in all cases arising within the borough. The sessions-house is a neat building, erected after a design by Mr. Johnston. The bridewell, or house of correction, for the county, is a spacious and well-arranged building, adapted to the classification of prisoners.

The parish comprises 8597 statute acres. The land is of very good quality, about three-fourths are meadow and pasture, and the remainder arable land in a good state of cultivation. About a mile from the town is Headfort, the noble mansion of the Marquess of Headfort, beautifully situated in a well-planted demesne of more than 1200 statute acres, intersected by the river Blackwater, which within the grounds expands into a fine lake. On the north side of the town is the handsome residence of the Archdeacon of Meath; and within the parish are Rockfield, Drumbarrow, Cannonstown, and several other gentlemen's seats. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united from time immemorial to the chapelry of Dulcen and the rectories of Rathboyne and Burry, constituting the union of Kells and the corps of the archdeaconry of Meath, in the alternate patronage of the Bishop and the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £414. 15., and of the whole union £885. 13. The glebe and other lands belonging to the archdeaconry comprise 2170¼ statute acres, let on lease and producing £464. 11. 1., with renewal fines of £259. 7. 8.; making the gross revenue of the archdeaconry £1509. 11. 9. per annum, exclusively of the mensal lands, comprising 177½ acres occupied by him. The church, rebuilt in 1811 at an expense of £3000, and for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners some years ago granted £104, is a spacious structure, with a detached square tower on the north side, surmounted by a spire, and erected at the expense of Thomas, first earl of Bective, who died in 1795; on one of the faces of the tower are three busts sculptured in stone, representing a bishop and two other dignitaries, with an inscription recording a rebuilding of the church, in 1572, by Hugh Brady, Bishop of Meath. Among others is a fine monument to Sir T. Taylor, first baronet of the Headfort family, and Anne, his wife. Near the church are the remains of a round tower, about 90 feet high, unroofed, and having the entrance on the north; and in the churchyard is an ancient cross, richly decorated. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Girley and Burry, and containing two chapels, situated at Kells and Girley. The former is a spacious and handsome stone building, in the form of a T, with two towers, the whole erected after a design by Mr. Johnston, in 1798, on ground given by the late Marquess of Headfort, who contributed liberally towards the building, and presented a painting of the Assumption, by Raphael, now over the altar. The parochial school for boys is supported by the Archdeacon of Meath, and that for girls by the Marquess. Kells contains a fever hospital; and a savings' bank has been established, the deposits in which exceed £20,000. A bequest of £90 late currency was made by a member of the Garnett family, and £1000 by the late Mr. Dempsey, the former secured on land, and the latter invested in the funds; the produce is annually divided among the poor. The union workhouse, on a site of 9¾ acres purchased for £790, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £5970, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers. Of the ancient abbey, scarcely any traces are now visible; and of the priory founded by Walter de Lacy, nothing but the cemetery remains. The castle occupied the area which was formerly the market-place; and in a contiguous street is a beautiful stone cross, elaborately enriched with sculptured figures and devices, and said to have been raised from the prostrate situation in which it was found, by Dean Swift. There is a small stone-roofed cell, or chapel, called St. Columb Kill's House, of great antiquity, near which is a very fine well named after that saint. At Berford, a few miles distant, numerous fossil remains of the moose-deer were found within an artificial inclosure in a bog, and wholly beneath the surface. The parish gives the inferior title of Baron Kenlis to the Marquess of Headfort.

KENAGH, or KENAUGHT, a village, in that part of the parish of KILCOMMICK which is in the barony of RATHCLINE, union and county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Longford, on the road from that place to Athlone; containing 68 houses, and 370 inhabitants. It is a constabulary police station; and has a fair on Oct. 19th. Petty-sessions are held every Tuesday, and a manorial court occasionally by a seneschal appointed by the Countess Dowager of Rosse. The church, a handsome building, was erected here in 1833, by Lady Rosse, at an expense of £2000; here are also a Primitive-Methodist meeting-house, the parochial schools (principally supported by Lady Rosse), and a dispensary.—See KILCOMMICK.

KENE, or CAINE, also called INISKIN, a parish, in the union of DUNDALK, barony of UPPER DUNDALK, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Dundalk, on the road from that place to Crossmaglen; containing 363 inhabitants. It comprises 749½ acres. At Killen are some large limestone quarries and kilns. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and is partly appropriate to the see and partly one of the four parishes which constitute the union of Baronstown: the tithe rent-charge is £54. 11. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kene forms part of the district of Dundalk, and has a chapel at Killen. At Killen hill and in its vicinity formerly existed some Druidical remains; and about a quarter of a mile from their site is a mount with two successive slopes and terraces, crowned by the ruins of a building shaped like the hull of an ancient ship.

KENMARE, a post-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of GLANEROUGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 30½ miles (S.) from Tralee, and 160 miles (S. W.) from Dublin, on the new road from Killarney to Glengariff; containing 5839 inhabitants, of whom 1339 are in the town. Sir Wm. Petty, who had obtained an extensive grant of land in this district, planted a colony of English here in 1670, at an expense of £10,000; established iron-works and a fishery on a large scale; and contributed much to the improvement of this wild part of the country. In 1685, the natives began to annoy these settlers, who at first cast up an intrenchment at Killowen, which they ultimately surrendered, and after being deprived of the whole of their property they were forced to embark for England with a very small quantity of provisions. The colony, however, was re-established soon after King William's conquests, and the fishery resumed. The TOWN, formerly called Nedeen, is situated near the north-eastern extremity of the great river, or rather bay, of Kenmare, and consists chiefly of one wide street of neat and well-built houses, from which another diverges towards the Sound. The number of houses, in 1841, was 172; several of them had been just erected, in consequence of the encouragement for building given by the proprietor, the Marquess of Lansdowne. An excellent road to Killarney, through a rocky and mountainous district, was opened about 20 years since, previous to which this remote district had been almost excluded from communication with the surrounding country; and another to Glengariff and Bantry, over the range of mountains separating the counties of Cork and Kerry, was lately completed. The latter crosses the Sound at Kenmare by a handsome suspension-bridge (to which the marquess contributed £3000), and opens a line of communication between Bantry and Killarney, commanding a succession of the most sublime and picturesque scenery. A commodious and excellent hotel in the town, and several lodging-houses near the strand, afford accommodation to the visiters resorting hither during the bathing-season, who are chiefly attracted by the romantic scenery and fine salmon-fishing of the river Blackwater, which flows into the bay of Kenmare about six miles below the town. A news-room is supported by subscription.

A market for provisions has been established, and a market-house built by the Marquess of Lansdowne, in consequence of the influx of visiters on the opening of the new road from Bantry. Fairs are held on Feb. 22nd, April 17th, May 22nd, July 1st, Aug. 15th, Sept. 26th,

Nov. 20th, and Dec. 13th, each of which is continued for two days; fairs are also held at the village of Cross-roads, near Roughty bridge, on Jan. 1st, March 17th, and Easter-Monday. Petty-sessions are held on the first Monday in each month; and there is a small but neat bridewell in the town, containing six cells, two day-rooms, and two yards. Kenmare, also, is a chief station of the constabulary police. A court for the manor of Dunkerron is generally held every third week, in which small debts are recoverable; its jurisdiction also extends over parts of the baronies of Glanerough and Iveragh. The old barrack has been converted into a commodious court-house, in which the assistant-barrister of the county holds sessions twice a year, and the seneschal, also, his court. A little below the town is a substantial pier, built about fourteen years since at an expense of £2100, of which the Marquess of Lansdowne contributed £1200; it has a depth of sixteen feet at high water of spring tides, and vessels of large size may at all times come within a mile of it. Coal, timber, tiles, and salt are the principal articles imported; and owing to the small portion of tillage in this rocky district, the importation of potatoes becomes necessary whenever there is a partial failure of that crop. A ship-load of corn is occasionally exported; and a considerable supply of salmon is sent to Killarney, and much to Cork, from the fishery at the Sound. A few of the inhabitants are also employed in the general fishery of the bay, which abounds with a great variety of fish; but this is chiefly carried on at its mouth by boats from Kinsale and other places on the south-western coast. The bay, or, as it is generally but improperly called, the river, of Kenmare, is formed by an arm of the sea extending inland about 25 miles, and is from 1½ to 5 miles in breadth. It is considered one of the safest harbours on the western coast, and has deep water and clear ground in almost every part that is above a quarter of a mile from the shore; excepting at the Maiden rock off Rossmore Island, and the Roanharrick rocks near the islands of Cappanacoss. Its principal creeks are at Sneem, Ardgroom, Kilmacalogue, and Dinish Island. The river, strictly so called, is navigable for boats to Roughty bridge, above the town; these are mostly employed in the conveyance of sea-manure, limestone, and turf.

The PARISH comprises 22,490 statute acres, including a large tract of rocky mountain and bog, a considerable portion of which is easily reclaimable, from the abundance of limestone that in various places breaks the surface of the ground: the portion in tillage is mostly of a clayey soil. The system of agriculture, though still in a backward state, is gradually improving. The seats are, Lansdowne Lodge, the residence of the marquess's agent; Greenlane; Killowen House; Shelburne Lodge; Horsefield; Beechmount; and Roughty Lodge. The two last and Greenlane are on the property of Trinity College, to which a large portion of the parish belongs; the remainder, with the exception of the glebe, is the property of the Marquess of Lansdowne.

Kenmare is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and is a rectory and vicarage, with the rectory of Tuosist united, together constituting the union of Kenmare, in the gift of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £159. 4. 8., and of the whole union £329. 5.; there is a glebe of four acres, but no glebe-house. The church is a neat structure with a steeple, built in 1814, partly by subscription, and partly by a loan of £520 from the Board of First Fruits; it is situated on a gentle eminence, about half a mile east of the town, at the termination of a fine avenue of trees extending nearly the whole of the distance, and commands an extensive view of the Kenmare estuary and the surrounding scenery. In the Roman Catholic divisions the town is the head of a district, which includes the greater part of Kenmare and the whole of Templenoe; the remainder is included in the district of Tuosist. The chapel in Kenmare is a spacious building, and there is another at Templenoe. A meeting-house for Wesleyan Methodists was lately erected. A large public school is partly supported by an annual contribution of £10 from the Marquess of Lansdowne, by whom the building was erected; a school-house has also been built adjoining the new road from Glengariff to Kenmare, at the joint expense of the marquess and the National Board. The union workhouse, standing in an elevated situation, on a site of 6 acres purchased for £93, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £5315, and is constructed to contain 500 paupers; it is an ornamental building about half a mile from the town. The ruins of the old church still remain; also those of a small chapel, supposed to have been built by Sir Wm. Petty on the establishment of the English colony. Near the ferry, or Sound, are the remains of a tower, called Cromwell's Fort; and at Cahir was formerly a castle, the foundation only of which is now visible. There are several raths in the parish; and, near the church, the remains of a Druidical circle. On the little river Finniby, not far from the town, are the ruins of an ancient foot-bridge, similar to that on the river Inny, in the barony of Iveragh. See DROMOD. At Cahir are vestiges of a lead-mine, supposed to have been worked at some former period; and on the east bank of the river Sheen are the remains of the iron smelting-works established by Sir Wm. Petty, consisting of a walled inclosure: the bogs abound with remains of the ancient forests from which these works were supplied with fuel. Kenmare gives the title of Earl to the family of Browne.

KENTSTOWN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Slane, and on the road from Dublin to Londonderry; containing 514 inhabitants. It comprises 2521 statute acres; the soil is good, and there is no waste land or bog. Somerville, the seat of Sir Wm. Meredyth Somerville, Bart., a fine mansion in an extensive demesne, was recently enlarged and improved, and a handsome entrance lodge erected; the grounds are embellished with an expansion of the Nanny water. At Somerville is a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united, by act of council in 1751, to the rectory and vicarage of Danistown and the vicarage of Ballymagarvey, forming the union of Kentstown, in the patronage of the Crown and Lord Dunsany. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £150, and of the whole benefice of the incumbent £247. 10. The church is a neat edifice with a tower, erected about 90 years since, and a steeple was added by Sir James Somerville, in 1797: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £134 for repairs. The glebe-house, which is near the church, was built by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £625 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebes of the union comprise 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Blacklyon, or Ballymagarvey. A school was founded and is supported by Lady Maria Somerville.

KERDIFFSTOWN, an ancient parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of NORTH NAAS, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER; containing 35 inhabitants, and comprising 703 statute acres.—See KILL.

KERLOGUE.—See KILLILOGUE.

KERNANSTOWN, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Carlow, on the road to Castledermot; containing about 420 inhabitants. It is considered a separate parish for civil purposes only; in the ecclesiastical divisions it appertains to those of Urglin, Clonmulsh, and Carlow.

KERRY (Roman Catholic Bishopric of).—See ARDFERT.

KERRY, a maritime county of the province of MUNSTER, bounded on the east by the counties of Limerick and Cork, on the north by the estuary of the Shannon (which separates it from Clare), on the west by the Atlantic, and on the south by the same ocean and the county of Cork. It extends from 51° 40′ to 52° 37′ (N. Lat.), and from 9° 8′ to 10° 27′ (W. Lon.); and comprises 1,186,126 statute acres, whereof 414,614 are arable land, 726,775 uncultivated, 11,169 under plantations, 807 in towns and villages, and 32,761 under water. The population, in 1821, amounted to 216,185; in 1831, to 263,126; and in 1841, to 293,880.

The inhabitants of this tract, according to Ptolemy's chart, were in his time designated Velabri or Vellibori; "Hibernicè," says Dr. O'Connor, "Siol Ebir, obviously meaning Illiberi Iberiæ." They are supposed by some to have been descended from the Iberi of Spain, to which their country lies opposite; but Camden derives their name from the British Aber, signifying an estuary, thus making it descriptive of the nature of the country. The Lucanij, or "people of the maritime country," are placed by Richard of Cirencester in this county, near Dingle bay. Ptolemy calls them Luceni, and they appear to be the Lugadii of Irish writers, which term in a general sense comprehended all the inhabitants on the southern coast, from the harbour of Waterford to the mouth of the Shannon, though sometimes confined to those of the county of Waterford. The present name of the county is variously derived. Some trace it from Ciar, the eldest son of Fergus, King of Ulster; after whom the district was called Carruidhe or Cair Reeght, that is, "the kingdom of Ciar." According to Ledwich, it was called Cerrigia, or "the rocky country," from Cerrig or Carric "a rock." Ciaruidhe, or "the rocky district on the water," from ciar or cer, "a rock," and uidhe or ui dha, "a district on the water," was the present barony of Iraghticonnor, on the south bank of the Shannon; and from it may be derived Cerrigia and Kerry. The chiefs of this part of the county were called Hy Cain aír Ciaruidhe, by contraction O'Connor Kerry, and their descendants were in possession of their ancient patrimony in the beginning of the last century. The district of these chiefs was sometimes denominated Ciaruidhe Luachra, or "the rocky district on the great lake or water." By some ecclesiastical writers the whole county is called the Country of St. Brandon, to whom the principal cathedral in Kerry was dedicated, and from whom a very remarkable mountain on the western coast takes its name. Camden calls that part of the sea into which the Shannon discharges itself, Mare Brendanicum. The great portion of the county lying to the south of the river Mang formed, with the whole county of Cork, the old native sovereignty of Desmond, or South Munster, granted by Henry II. to Robert Fitz-Stephen and Milo de Cogan, but of which these adventurers were able to make themselves masters only of part, namely, the districts near the city of Cork.

On the arrival of the ENGLISH, the O'Connors were in possession of the northern part; the middle parts were in the possession of the Moriartys. The southern portion was occupied by the O'Sullivans, from whom the district now named Dunkerron barony was called O'Sullivan's Country; also by the O'Donoghoes, distinguished into the septs of O'Donoghoe More and O'Donoghoe Ross; and by the O'Mahonies. The M'Carties, who had been the most powerful sept in the south of Ireland before the landing of the English, were subdued by the invaders, and their chief took refuge in the fastnesses of Kerry, where he was afterwards compelled to have recourse to the aid of Raymond le Gros to put down a rebellion of his own son, in recompense for which service he gave up the northern district, then called Lixnaw. Raymond here settled his son Maurice, who gave its present name to this part of the county, which was thenceforward called Clan-Maurice, in the same manner as the family bear to the present day the name of Fitzmaurice. The ancestor of the earls of Desmond, John Fitz-Thomas, also, soon after the arrival of Henry II. acquired large possessions in Kerry and the contiguous districts, including the country of Desmond, by marriage with the daughter of Thomas Fitz-Anthony, another Anglo-Norman leader; and these were augmented by Prince John, in 1199. Henceforward, the family of Fitz-Gerald exercised a predominant authority in this quarter of the kingdom. The county was made shire ground, with its present limits, by King John, in 1210. Desmond was included with the Decies in the confirmatory grant made, in 1260, by Prince Edward to Lord John Fitz-Thomas; but in the following year this family received from the native sept of the M'Carties a complete overthrow in Glancrought, in this county, from which they did not recover for twelve years, when quarrels among the native chiefs again admitted the rise of their power. Lord Thomas, towards the close of the thirteenth century, sat in parliament as Lord Offaly, and claimed under the grant of Edward I., to be the king's sheriff of Kerry. In these early ages, therefore, the districts forming the present county were subject to the power of three great families, the Fitz-Geralds, lords of Desmond; the Fitz-Maurices, lords of Kerry in the north; and the M'Carties, tanists of the elevated central and southern regions.

Edward III., in 1329, granted to Maurice Fitz-Thomas the name and honour of EARL of DESMOND, and all royal liberties within the county of Kerry; the church or cross lands thereof, and the four usual pleas of burnings, rape, forestal, and treasure trove, alone excepted. In the following year, the earl deemed this to be sufficient authority for entirely excluding the king's sheriffs and other ordinary ministers of justice from the county. The extraordinary power of this nobleman, however, brought upon him for a time some jealous persecution by the officers of the crown. In 1345, the earl having presumed to summon a parliament in opposition to that called by the lord-justice, Sir Ralph Ufford, the latter overran and seized upon the whole of his possessions, which were not restored to him until 1352. In 1388, Gerald, Earl of Desmond, was formally appointed keeper of the peace in the counties of Kerry and Limerick, with very extensive powers and authority, in conjunction with Patrick Fox. In 1386, we find John Fitz-Gerald, Earl of Desmond, made sheriff of the Crosses of Kerry; being the lands of the Church within its limits, in which the king's ordinary jurisdiction had course. James, Earl of Desmond, about 1425, as lord of the liberties of Kerry, entered into a deed with Patrick Fitz-Maurice Fitz-John, Lord Kerry, "captain or head of his nation," whereby the latter was bound to answer to the earl and his heirs at his assizes. James, the 15th earl, surrendered, by deed in the chancery of Ireland, his old family prerogative of exemption from attendance on a parliament summoned in any walled town, except at his pleasure; and covenanted that he would suffer the laws of England to be executed in his county, that he would assist the king's judges in their circuits, and permit subsidies to be raised upon his followers; but these conditions were never fulfilled either by himself or his successors. Thomas, sixteenth lord or baron of Kerry, is styled even in the 5th of Edward VI., "Captain of his nation;" an extraordinary mark of the absence of English laws of property and society in this as well as the other old palatinates down to that period. He held his seat in parliament by the title of Baron of Lixnaw.

But a great change in the political condition of the inhabitants soon afterwards took place. Gerald, sixteenth earl of Desmond, restless, ambitious, and raised to a still higher rank among the most powerful subjects of Europe by the oppressions which his family had exercised over their weaker neighbours, united with these qualities and circumstances a great want of discretion, and no slight disaffection to the English crown, which had arisen in the early part of the reign of Elizabeth by mutual jealousies between the government and such of the leading men as had not joined the Reformation. He was imprisoned for a short period in 1568, during which the government of this and of the two contiguous counties was vested in commissioners. The remote southern situation of Kerry rendered it, in the subsequent sanguinary periods, a principal medium of foreign correspondence maintained by the insurgents, whose first attempt, however, was suppressed by Sir John Perrot, in 1572; the leaders, heads of the native clans of the south, with a few of the old Anglo-Norman knights, submitting to mercy. Although a reward was offered for the apprehension of the Earl of Desmond, after his escape from Dublin in 1574, when he was declared a traitor, he remained quiet in his own territories until 1576, when Sir William Drury was made Lord-President of Munster, and the earl nominally appointed one of his council. Sir William, with a view to the general reform of the province, resolved to break through Desmond's liberties, and hold assizes in the palatinate of Kerry, which he regarded as a sanctuary for rebels and disturbers of the peace. The earl endeavoured to dissuade him from his design, but without effect. He then, reserving himself for an appeal to the chief governor, assured Drury that he should be received in Kerry with all honour and submission, and invited him to reside at his own castle of Tralee. This invitation was accepted, when, on the near approach of Sir William with 120 men, he observed at some distance a body of 700 of Desmond's followers advancing to meet him. The president at once concluded that he had been betrayed, and hastened to charge without waiting an attack. Desmond's followers dispersed at the first onset, and it was explained by the countess, who received the president at the castle, that they had been assembled by her lord merely to entertain him with hunting. Drury then proceeded to execute the laws without control or opposition, except in the unavailing complaints made to the government by the earl.

In 1579, a party of Spaniards and a few native insurgents having landed with Saunders, the Pope's nuncio, at Smerwick, in this county, Sir John of Desmond, the earl's brother, to ingratiate himself with them, procured the murder, at Tralee, of Henry Danvers, an English gentleman, and the two provincial judges sent there to execute justice in the queen's name, together with all their attendants. This transaction completed the determination of the government totally to abolish all the Earl of Desmond's powers of exclusive jurisdiction, which his subsequent rebellion gave an opportunity to effect. The earl's wavering and indecisive conduct, in which he was encouraged by the Lord of Kerry, brought a protracted war of extermination on the whole province; and, his defection proving every day more certain, he was at length proclaimed a traitor, and his country entered with fire and sword. The Earl of Ormonde and Sir Warham St. Leger wasted his lands, slew numbers of his men, burned his towns, and took his castles (putting both Spaniards and natives to the sword) as far, with the aid of the lord-justice, as the mountains of Slievelogher. They then ravaged and destroyed the district of Corkaguiney from Tralee to Dingle, slaying many of the people. While this desultory warfare was proceeding, additional forces, with military stores for the insurgents, landed at Smerwick from Spain; but these troops, after a long siege, surrendered at discretion, and were barbarously murdered, together with all who had joined them. Captain Zouch was then appointed, with 450 men, to govern the county and pursue the insurgents, which he did with the utmost rigour; but the English army being soon reduced to an insignificant force, the war again revived with all its horrors; and it was terminated only by the death of the earl, who was slain by a party of common soldiers in a wretched hovel in a wood, where he had taken refuge, a few miles east of Tralee. Sir John Perrot shortly after gave the government of the palatinate to the queen's sheriff, and the Lord of Kerry, who had submitted and received pardon from the queen.

In 1599, a fresh rebellion broke out, headed in this county by the sugan or mock Earl of Desmond; his brother John; Patrick, the seventeenth lord of Kerry; Pierce Lacy, the knight of the Glin or Valley; and Thomas Fitzmaurice, son of the late baron of Lixnaw, or Kerry. Florence M'Carty, also, took secret part with them. It was suppressed prior to the landing of the Spaniards in 1601; but this event encouraged another general revolt, in which the most noted parties in this county were the M'Carties, O'Sullivans, O'Connors, the Lord of Kerry, the Knight of Kerry, and all who had been pardoned for their previous acts of insurgency. They raised and maintained in active service a guerilla force of about one thousand men. But a warfare of ravages, with a view to destroy all means of subsistence, conducted by Sir Charles Wilmot, at length forced the insurgents through absolute famine to surrender.

The lands forfeited by these successive rebellions, including the vast possessions of the Earl of Desmond, were portioned out to English adventurers. The principal of these were Sir William Herbert, Sir Valentine Browne, Sir Edward Denny, Robert Blennerhasset, and Capt. Jenkins Conway; besides whom other settlers obtained grants, from whom the families of Spring Rice, Morris, and Gunn, descended. Before this period Kerry had been considered the most flourishing part of the south of Ireland, abounding with corn, and the best inhabited county of Munster. But the state of misery, depopulation, and ruin to which the whole had been reduced by the wars was most appalling. The custom of tanistry was formally abolished here by a judgment of the king's bench, in 1605. On the breaking out of the war in 1641, the old native families took part with the insurgents; appointed a governor of the county; and levied men, whose hostilities caused as many of the English gentlemen as were able to retire either to join the Lord-President St. Leger, or to pass over into England, while others fortified themselves in places of strength. By the end of 1642 the Irish were masters of every place in the county, with the exception of Ballingarry Castle: Rinuncini landed in Kenmare bay in 1645, and died in a wood near Tulligaron, in the vicinity of Tralee. But the county was finally reduced in 1652, by General Ludlow, who took Ross Castle, and compelled Lord Muskerry to surrender his troops, amounting to about 5000 men. Extensive grants were now made to new English settlers, out of the estates forfeited in these disastrous commotions; and a colony of English was planted on the Kenmare river in the south, by Sir William Petty, who obtained large grants of land here, and carried on the iron trade with great activity so long as timber could be procured for smelting. In 1689, however, the colony was attacked by the Irish in King James's interest, to whom, after some resistance, it was compelled to surrender on terms; and the Protestant settlers of the entire county were much harassed and plundered, and for the most part driven out. In a report made to King William's government, and now among the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum, this county is described to be "of large extent, almost surrounded by the sea, and in it the most and best harbours of any county in the kingdom; full of woods, bogs, and mountains, yet intermixed with pleasant valleys, full of people, and the most quiet and peaceable part of Ireland; the country full of cattle, and great store of corn in the ground; and in the last wars, when all Ireland was reduced, this one county kept near 10,000 men almost two years in action; and hither came the Earl of Clancarty and all the officers of his army, and in Ross, a place by nature of great strength, made good terms and so went off. It may cost more men to reduce it than half Ireland, for the county is full of fastnesses and plenty of provision. The greatest advantage may be made of its harbours, that are for all winds, and near which all ships from the western seas must pass, and if in possession of the French might destroy more merchants of England than out of any parts in France or Ireland." In 1691, a detachment of William's army under Brigadier Levison completely subdued the country, although the Irish inhabitants every where rose to oppose them; and burned Tralee. About 1710, the southern coast was greatly harassed by French privateers, to check whose inroads a redoubt was ordered by parliament to be erected on Valencia Island.

This county is entirely within the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe. For purposes of CIVIL JURISDICTION it is divided into the baronies of Clanmaurice, Corkaguiney, Dunkerron, Glanerough, Iraghticonnor, Iveragh, Magonihy, and Trughenackmy. It contains the borough, market, and assize town of Tralee; the (once incorporated) market and post town of Dingle; the market and post towns of Cahirciveen and Killarney; the post-towns of Kenmare, Listowel, Milltown, Tarbert, and Valencia; the smaller towns of Ballylongford, Blennerville, Castlegregory, and Castleisland; the ancient incorporated town of Ardfert; and the villages of Annescalle, Ballybrack, Ballyheigue, Killorglin, Sneem, &c. Prior to the Union it sent eight members to the Irish parliament—two knights of the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs of Tralee, Dingle, and Ardfert; but since that period its sole representatives have been the two members for the county at large, and one representative for the borough of Tralee, in the Imperial parliament. The county constituency qualified to vote, in 1841, consisted of 1401 persons, of whom 329 were £50, 206 £20, and 645 £10, freeholders; 32 £20, and 136 £10, leaseholders; and 16 £50, and 39 £20, rent-chargers. The election takes place at Tralee. The county is included in the Munster circuit; the assizes and general quarter-sessions are held at Tralee, and quarter-sessions also at Killarney, Cahirciveen, Dingle, Kenmare, and Listowel: at Tralee are the county court-house and county gaol; and there are bridewells at Cahirciveen, Castleisland, Dingle, Kenmare, Killarney, Listowel, Milltown, and Tarbert. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 17 deputy-lieutenants, and about 80 other magistrates; besides whom are the usual county officers, including three coroners. There are 34 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, 6 sub-inspectors, 7 head-constables, 28 constables, and 140 sub-constables, with 6 horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £9946, defrayed by grand jury presentments, and by government. Along the coast are 15 coast-guard stations; 4 being in the district of Valencia, and having a force of 4 officers and 31 men; 6 in that of Dingle, with 7 officers and 36 men; and 5 in the district of Tralee, with 3 officers and 35 men: each district is under the control of a resident inspecting commander. The county infirmary, lunatic asylum, fever hospital, and dispensary are at Tralee; and there are dispensaries and fever hospitals at Listowel, Cahirciveen, and Killarney, and 24 dispensaries situated respectively at Tarbert, Milltown, Dingle, Castleisland, Kenmare, Sneem, &c., supported equally by private contributions and grand jury presentments. The entire amount of grand jury presentments, in 1844, was £38,250. In mountainous districts the applotments are made by what are called reduced ploughlands, each being divided into 60 acres, called reduced acres; but these ploughlands are determined rather by their proportionable quality and value than by their superficial extent; for the larger they are, the coarser and less fertile; the smallest being the most fruitful. In the military arrangements, that part of the county south of the river Flesk is included in the Cork district, the other part to the north of the river being in the Limerick district. There are a barrack station for infantry at Tralee, affording accommodation for 17 officers and 456 non-commissioned officers and men; and two batteries on the islands of Carrigue and Tarbert, each mounting six 24-pounders and containing bomb-proof barracks for about 20 men.

KERRY is the most western county of Ireland, and the fourth in extent; it is surpassed by many in fertility. From its aspect it seems well adapted to become a valuable tillage country, but, though improvements have been rapid of late years, a great part of it lies still in a very unproductive condition. The northern part, towards the Shannon, is comparatively low. From the mouth of the river Cashen to Kerry Head, which forms the south side of the mouth of the Shannon, stretches a bank of upland; this is chiefly a heathy moor, and near Kerry Head rises to a considerable elevation. The coast of the county towards the ocean is partly high sand-hills and partly steep cliffs, on which the ruins of some dismantled castles are boldly situated; that of Doon stands almost perpendicularly over the ocean. The northern tract of low country has on its south a range of upland, rising gradually into the boundaries between Limerick and Cork; this upland, in passing eastward, expands to a great width. Still more southerly is an extensive range of mountains, many of the summits of which are among the highest in Ireland; they commence at the eastern side of the bay of Dingle, and, with little interruption, pass along the southern side of the lake of Killarney and onward to the county of Cork, embracing some deep vales. The general aspect of this part of the county is rude: the valleys are commonly occupied with bog, round the upper edge of which, and along the margins of the streams, are narrow stripes of cultivated land, behind which the mountains rise to an elevation of from 1500 to 2000 feet, presenting bold rocky cliffs towards the bay of Dingle and the Atlantic. The southern baronies of Iveragh, Dunkerron, and Glanerough are the wildest and most uncultivated tracts in the county: the last-mentioned, which takes its name from the Roughty, a river that flows through it, is separated from the adjoining barony of Bere, in the county of Cork, by a range of lofty mountains, the greater part of which was formerly the estate of the O'Sullivans. Macgillycuddy's Reeks, in north Dunkerron, are the highest mountains not only in the county, but in Ireland; their most elevated summit, called Carran Tual, or Gheran Tuel, being 3404 feet above the level of the sea. Mangerton is next in height. Towards the west are the mountains of Drung and Callee, the highest summits of the range that separates the baronics of Iveragh and Dunkerron. This chain proceeds eastward to the south of the lakes of Killarney, along Tomies mountain, Glena, Torc, Mangerton, Crohane, and the Paps; the last are particularly remarkable for the regularity of their convex or conical form, and the range of which they form a part is connected with the hills of Glenflesk, overbanging O'Donoghoe's Country. North and east of Tralee are the ranges called Stack's mountains and the Glanruddery mountains. Between the harbours of Castlemaine and Tralee is a range of high mountains, called Slieve Mish, attaining an elevation of upwards of 2200 feet; and hence mountains extend westward into the peninsular barony of Corkaguiney under various names, among which, one of remarkable conical shape is called Cahir-conrigh. Considerable tracts of these mountains have been improved, and brought into tillage. This barony, indeed, is esteemed the granary of the county; the northern side, called Litteragh, is richly cultivated, and rendered very productive by the facility of obtaining sea-manure. Brandon hill here rises to a great height, and its top or sides are often enveloped in clouds. From the base of the mountains various brooks run into both bays. From the southern coast of the barony a long peninsula of sand-hills, called Inch Island, extends into the bay of Castlemaine.

The LAKES in the mountainous regions are numerous, but few are of large dimensions. The most remarkable for extent is the celebrated Lough Leine, the principal of the lakes of Killarney, which are three in number, and connected by straits, or short rivers. They are distinguished by the names of the Upper, the Torc, and the Lower lake. The last is about six miles in length and of great breadth, with mountains on one side of the richest grandeur, which is increased by the contrast of the level shore on the other; the surface is overspread with islands of the most luxuriant beauty. Tore lake is separated from it by the wooded peninsula of Muckross and Dinis Island, and is still more picturesque; but the wildest sublimity is that of the Upper Lake, about 2½ miles in length, and wholly surrounded by mountains. [For a more detailed account, see the article on Killarney.] The other lakes are as follow:—Lough Currane, near the shore of Balliuskellig bay, and which has several islands, and is fed by a stream called the Cummaragh river, flowing from the smaller lakes of Derriana and Elaineane, in the mountains; Lough Scall, about halfway between Tralee and Dingle; Lough Cara, near the harbour of Castlemaine; and Lough Quinlan, near the creek of Kilmacalogue, and which contains several small floating islands. The Devil's Punch-Bowl is a very deep hollow near the summit of Mangerton mountain, upwards of 1500 feet above the level of the sea; it discharges its surplus water by a large stream that rolls down the mountain side in a succession of cataracts distinguished by their white foam at a considerable distance. At the foot of the same mountain is Lough Kittane, a secluded and picturesque lake.

Several of the mountain ridges form headlands projecting boldly into the sea, the intermediate valleys being the basins of noble BAYS and ESTUARIES, into which the rivers empty themselves. Commencing at the southern extremity of the county, the first of these is the bay or estuary of the Kenmare river, which penetrates 25 miles into the country, and is navigable at high water up to Kenmare town, at its innermost extremity: it contains, on the south side, the harbours of Ardgroom and Kilma-calogue, and on its northern side, that of Sneem; and along the northern shore is a succession of small islands, the principal of which are Rossmore, Ilansherky, Cappanacoss, and Dunkerron. The next bay is that of Ballinaskellig, near the entrance of which are the Hog Islands; and towards the west are the Skellig Islands, which, like the other principal islands here noticed, are described under a separate head. Beyond these lies Puffin Island (see Killemlagh), and beyond Puffin is Valencia Island, forming a harbour by the channel that separates it from the main land; this harbour has an entrance at each end, and is considered one of the safest and most commodious on the western coast. Between Valencia Island and the Blasquets is Dingle bay, an extensive opening with steep shores on each side, in which a ship may anchor in any part above a mile from the shore; it contains the harbours of Ventry, Dingle, and Castlemaine. Dunmore Head, the most western point of Ireland, forms the northern extremity of Dingle bay; the natives call it Tig-vourncy-Geerane, or Mary Gerane's house. Off this headland are the Blasquet or Ferriter's Islands, between the largest of which and the main land is a deep sound with a rapid current. Beyond Dunmore Head is Smerwick bay, the whole of which was originally bog, now invaded by the sea. Pursuing eastward the north coast of the peninsula of Corkaguiney, between Magharee Head and Brandon Head, lies Brandon bay, on the eastern side of the mountain of that name. The Magharees, or Seven Hog Islands, lie at the extremity of a peninsula which separates Brandon from Tralee bay. Between Fenit Island (behind which is the inlet called Barra harbour) and Kerry Head is Ballyheigne bay, in which there is no shelter; and from an error in laying down the latitude of Loop Head in the charts, it has often been fatally mistaken for the mouth of the Shannon. The only harbour in Kerry within the Shannon is that of Tarbert: off its mouth is the island of the same name.

The climate is mild, and, though moist from its vicinity to the Atlantic, from the height of the mountains, and the wide extent of the bogs, is salubrious: several trees which are deemed indigenous to warmer latitudes, particularly the arbutus, grow here naturally to great size and beauty. In some instances cultivation extends up the sides of the high lands in the mountainous region to an elevation of 700 feet above the sea. The SOIL in the Northern parts is of a coarse quality, much inclined to produce rushes, and retentive of surface water, a considerable portion of it having been reclaimed from a state of bog; but in summer it is very productive of grass, and is chiefly depastured by dairy cattle. The Middle district, bounded as it is by mountains of considerable elevation, is in general of an alluvial aspect: the soil and gravel transported from the uplands on each side form the cover, and limestone the substratum to an uncertain depth. The south side is generally a stone-brash of the slate and rubble stone mingled with sand; the northern, a gravel of blue flag, tightened with sandy clay. The valley from Tralee by Castleisland and down the river Maine has a sandy and clayey loam on limestone: the upland on the north is argillaceous, being chiefly composed of slate-clay and hard argillaceous sandstone. A band of limestone is found to traverse the lower part of this tract. In the mountainous district which occupies nearly the whole of the South of the county are deep and extensive vales, which are almost entirely occupied by bog, but which, though at present little better than wastes, appear, from their favourable exposure and the facility with which their produce may be exported, to be well adapted to a more improved mode of cultivation. The BOGS are not confined to the mountainous districts, but occur frequently in large continuous tracts in all parts of the county, and cover an extent of 105,577 acres, exclusively of the small mountain bogs which were not estimated in the general survey of the bogs of Ireland. One species of bog, found chiefly in the barony of Corkaguiney, peculiarly deserves notice; it is called in Irish Meagh Vone, which signifies "flat turf." In its natural state it is of a glutinous or saponaceous quality, lying upon the gravel under shallow peat-bogs, which are of a black and brittle nature, with a grassy surface, often producing rushes. It occurs about three spits deep, in a stratum from eight to twelve inches thick, and is of a light-brown colour, mixed with a clayey white. When found, it is carefully laid aside, not for fuel but for light; as two or three sods of it, broken small and placed successively on the top of the fire, supply light for the family during the longest night. If kept it is carefully dried, in which case it is nearly as light as cork and has a similar smell when burning. A chymical analysis showed it to be wood, much decayed, and highly impregnated with bituminous matter: when distilled it yielded a considerable proportion of a thick oily inflammable matter, with a residuum of soft charcoal.

In a county so extensive as Kerry, and until of late so difficult of access in its mountainous districts; where the inhabitants of its several baronies seem to be precluded by nature from a free communication with each other; and where, throughout the whole, agriculture is in a backward state, no regular system of TILLAGE can be supposed to prevail. The general crops are potatoes, wheat, barley, oats, and flax. Green crops, with a few exceptions, are little known; nor are any grass seeds sown, except by a few gentleman farmers. The Irish oat, which is but of indifferent quality, is that usually raised. Barley has been tried on boggy land, but found to be a failing crop, being liable to be overrun by the weed persicarium. In some places, rape is partially cultivated for seed, and is well adapted for boggy land: the crop is stacked when cut, and threshed when a market occurs. DAIRIES abound, particularly in the district about Castleisland. In some, the proprietor of the land and stock lets out a certain number of cows on a given tract of land by the year, for a particular sum, engaging that all shall have calved before the 21st of June, with a drawback in cases of failure. In other cases, the land and cows are given up to the management of a dairyman, who returns his employer a certain quantity of butter of prime quality, and one guinea horn-money for each cow, by which is meant an allowance for the sale or value of sour milk. To every dairy-farm a certain portion of meadow ground is annexed for winter provender, which the dairyman is obliged to save at his own cost. Should his supply fall short, the proprietor buys elsewhere and the dairyman draws it home. In the northern districts the dairy system is very prevalent, and the method used there for making butter has been deemed worthy of a particular description by an agricultural writer. The butter produced in Kerry, to the annual amount of 100,000 firkins, or full-bounds, as they are here called, formerly found a market in the city of Cork; of late, however, butter has been sold to a large extent at Tralee and Killarney. Much is sold in the public market; but a considerable quantity is also disposed of by contract to particular merchants.

Limestone is extensively used as a manure in those districts where it can be easily procured: the quarries which supply a very large tract of country are at Ballymacelligot, four miles from Tralee, and there are others about seven miles from Killarney, isolated by a district of bog and mountain; the former also produce building-stone of superior quality. The farmers in the vicinity of the sea-shore have an inexhaustible supply of manure of two kinds, sea-weed and sand, which on loamy soils act jointly with the best effect, while on soils where either is found to be injurious, the other operates as a correction. The agricultural implements are few and simple. In the mountainous parts the plough is scarcely used; the process of tillage being wholly managed by a spade of peculiar construction, called a "loy." Until the late general improvement of the roads, wheel-carriages were little known in these districts, but their use is now becoming general.

From the introduction of the improved kinds of CATTLE from Great Britain, the county now possesses the long-horned Leicester, the Hereford, the Holderness, and the Devon breeds: the common cattle of the country are partly of the long and partly of the short horned, varying in size according to their pasture; in mountain farms they are very small, and chiefly short-horned. The mixtures of blood have operated towards the extinction of the original Kerry breed of small cattle, so beautiful in their shape, so profitable for their milk, and so easily fattened to the best quality of fine-grained meat. Yet some of their good qualities still remain; the present stock frequently prove valuable milchers, and almost all, when brought into rich pastures, increase considerably in size and make excellent beef. The dairy cow is of a very good description, not of any distinct breed, but what may be termed an excellent grazier's cow, of comely shape and thrifty appearance, weighing from four to six cwt. when fat. The Sheep are of the mountain kind, in some parts of good size, and in general with very fair wool of clothing quality: from their strong resemblance to the Merino, particularly in the formation of the horns of the males, and from the former communication between Spain and this part of Ireland, there is every reason to suppose that the mountain flocks of this county are deeply crossed with Merino blood. Numerous herds of Goats are fed on the mountains, and, though apparently suffered to ramble at large, are collected every evening for milking, by dogs trained for the purpose. Little attention is paid to the breed of Swine. In some places a very bad description of long-legged, thin, flat-ribbed pig, difficult to fatten, is met with; in others, a well-formed white pig, easily fattened, and weighing from two to three cwt., is reared. The Suffolk breed of Horses has been introduced, but has not spread largely through the county. The Kerry ponies, once so famed, and originally of Spanish or rather of Moorish extraction, were formerly strong enough for farming purposes, but now, by injudicious crossing, are so degenerated as to be fit only for the saddle and for very light weights. Numbers of them are brought down from the mountains to Killorglin fair, in droves of perhaps a score together, not one of them having been ever embarrassed by a halter, till sold there. Ponies of a superior description are occasionally offered for sale here, and command high prices. Some of the wilder mountains are still haunted by the native red Deer, and a few of the fallow-deer still remain wild about Ballyheigue; the hunting of the former through the mountains of Killarney, with their resounding echoes, affords sport of the most animating description.

This county was once almost entirely covered with TIMBER of large size and of the best description, and even now in the mountain valleys the growth of timber is kept down only by the grazing of the cattle; for it has been found that wherever these were excluded, timber spontaneously grew up, insomuch as, in some cases, to prevent the growth of young plantations. Some of the great landed proprietors are very attentive to the planting of their property. The Marquess of Lansdowne planted 100,000 trees, principally oak, ash, Scotch fir, beech, and larch, in the twelve years between 1800 and 1812. The extent of the Earl of Kenmare's woods is estimated at 2000 acres; and Mr. Herbert's, of Muckross, at nearly double that number. Important improvements were effected by the late Lord Headley on his estates at Glenbegh, Castleisland, and Aghadoe, particularly the first, where the change produced in a few years, not merely in the cultivation of the land, planting, draining, embanking, &c., but in the habits and manners of the peasantry, excites the admiration of all who were previously acquainted with this wild, mountainous, and lawless district. Orchards are not unfrequent in the northern district of Kerry. This county produces the celebrated Kacageogh cyder: the trees which bear this famous apple are the worst-looking and least productive of any; they appear to be falling down, are ill supplied with leaves, unhealthy in appearance, and so knotty as to resemble trees grown from pitchers, but unrivalled in the quality of liquor they produce. The next in quality is made from an apple called the Speckled Moss. The fuel universally used is turf, the supply of which may be said to be inexhaustible. Coal is rarely used for fuel, except by a few respectable families.

The GEOLOGY is interesting. The western portion of the NORTH of the county, which has been already described as lying low, is a great limestone basin, the eastern boundary of which is formed by a line from Knockanure hill southward to Listowel, and thence south-westerly to Ardfert, where it sinks under the ocean in Ballyheigue bay. This limestone is secondary, with marine remains and calc-spar, usually of a light blue or smoke-grey colour; it seldom rises more than forty or fifty feet above high water, appearing sometimes in crags and low cliffs, but mostly concealed by a cover of yellow clay. Its northern boundary, the hill of Knockanure, about 700 feet high, is composed of grey sandstone; the junction on that side is every where concealed by a deep cover of clayey loam. To the west of that hill, the contiguous rock sinks under the level of the ocean, and permits the tide to enter the mouth of the Cashen, the navigation of which is obstructed by sand-hills; but these, being partly calcareous, afford a useful supply of manure to the upper country. From the Cashen to Kerry Head, as already observed, stretches a bank of upland, which, as it proceeds westward, becomes chiefly a heathy moor, rising to a considerable height at its termination: it is composed of thick beds of argillaceous sandstone, nearly horizontal, and in the partings of which the beautiful quartz crystals called Kerry stones are found; they are transparent and regular, and very hard. Steel-grained lead is also found traversing this formation. On its southern side this bank is more slaty and somewhat calcareous, being mixed, near Ballyheigue, with lesser masses of close-grained conglomerate. On the west is a low sandy flat and salt marsh, defended from the ocean by sand hills extending from Ballyheigue to Barra harbour.

In the northern upland formation of the MIDDLE district of Kerry are beds of culm, which has been worked only in its eastern range, in the county of Cork. Some specimens of the culm from Killarney, Tralee, and Castleisland were nearly incombustible, which may be accounted for from their having been taken from the surface: in a drift in the river Awineeghrea, a branch of the Flesk, the specimens resemble plumbago. It is possible, by sinking, to obtain coal like that of Kilkenny. A band of limestone, containing a few organic remains, traverses the southern part of this formation; it is chiefly blue, compact, with chert over it, and to the west partly regularly stratified. Where it shows itself in the middle of the Slieve Lughar bogs, in Lord Kenmare's quarries, it is also blue and compact, without any chert, but a good deal of calcareous spar. It next appears about two miles west of Killarney, on the Flesk, much intermingled with hornstone or chert, and, finally, constitutes the great deposition which forms nearly all the islands and promontories on the north side of the Lower lake. The limestone there meets the brown transition rocks of the mountains; and near the junction it is traversed by metallic veins of copper and lead. A second band is found in various places along the course of the Gheestan, where it is blackish and mingled with chert. The whole bottom of the valley of the Maine consists of limestone lying in strata, which, though generally confused, appear to lap on each side above those of the mountain. The limestone is generally compact, and much impressed with marine remains; black and hard towards Tralee, where it is dressed as marble; whitening and more tender towards Castleisland and the Maine, and of course more readily calcined: both kinds are excellent and nearly pure. Towards the northern side of the beds they become more flinty, and are separated from the mountain rocks by thin beds of Lydian stone, black or blueish-grey, with the cross fracture slightly conchoidal. Towards Tralee this becomes a complete horn-slate, the shiver of which is highly valued for road gravel. There are large banks of shell-sand in Castlemaine bay; it is of a muddy blueish cast, containing numerous whole shells of the species of cardium. One of the Skellig rocks, which has often been called marble, contains nothing but bolts of quartz traversing the brown slate. The mountain of Slieve Mish, which runs parallel to the Maine on its northern side, and terminates in the peninsula of Corkaguiney, is composed of old sandstone or grit, dipping about 40° N. to 8° W.: towards the interior the dip is greater, and the rock more indurated. It is covered with thick beds of millstone grit, or coarse-grained conglomerate, with pebbles of quartz, &c.

The component rock of the mountains which form nearly the whole of the SOUTHERN part of the county, is of the transition class, being a clay-slate or ardesia, which dips to the S. 55° E. at an angle of 68° from the horizontal; so that, though nearly on edge, it presents its cliffs and sections to the north-west. This position is favourable to its decomposition. From the facility with which the water penetrates, the strata split and crumble down the mountain side, leaving a considerable detritus at the foot of all the cliffs, finally decomposing into an adhesive loam well suited to the production of grain crops, and forming a principal component of many fertile soils in the south of Ireland. The range of mountains which separates the bay or river of Kenmare from Bantry bay is composed of beds of schist and sandstone of various colours, but similar in their composition to the greywacke formations of other parts of the county. The clay-slate is quarried for roofing in some places; but as the works have seldom proceeded far below the surface, that raised is generally shivery and small, though much of it is equal in quality to the Easdale and Ballahulish in the west of Scotland. It is blue, purple, and green, according to the intermixture of iron or chlorite; splits readily, and bears piercing; is slightly foliated or wavy, harder and more silicious than Bangor slate, and very durable. The convenience of export has hitherto only admitted of quarries being opened at Cahir, Begnish, and Valencia; at the last place flags of large dimensions are quarried, which find a ready market in London. The general slate rock, especially towards the south and centre, is in many places penetrated with veins of quartz; it is highly indurated, and in some places the traces of stratification are entirely obliterated in the smaller specimen, though always recognisable in the great, where the rock is found in situ. From the colour communicated by the chlorite, the rock is provincially called greenstone, being similar in aspect, though of different composition, to that so called by mineralogists. When the red oxyde is more abundant, it is called brownstone. Where the induration is not so great as to destroy the schistose as well as the lamellar structure, the rock is used as flag or rubble stone. Flags of this sort are common on the surface. But the most common land stones here are the blocks of more highly indurated rocks, which, parting from the mass by cracks and fissures, have had their angles decomposed and worn off, and are to be met with in the form of round boulders at great distances from their original seat in the mountain. One of the most singular rocks occurs close to the road from Killarney to Ballyvourney, at the head of the glen of Glenflesk: it rests on the transition slate of the county, and is a close-grained compact sandstone, imbedded in which are minute prismatic crystals of flesh-coloured felspar, and here and there geodes, six or eight inches in diameter, containing sparry iron ore and white quartz. It thus comes under the description of porphyritic rocks, and is the only one at present known in the south of Ireland. It may also be mentioned that, in all the mountains, the common grit-stone contains large quantities of spar or crystal, or both; also sparry iron-ore, and iron pyrites in crystals. The Roughty stream separates beds of limestone from others of clay-slate; and near the head of the Kenmare river are several islands abounding with limestone and beautifully variegated marbles. Limestone occurs on other parts of this coast.

Iron is found plentifully in the southern baronies, where there were two manufactories of it, one at Killarney, the other at Blackstones, but both have been long since discontinued from want of fuel. Lead-ore is found in many parts. Copper of a golden colour was raised at Muckross, and when the mines were worked, grey cobalt and cobalt-bloom were found in considerable quantities; purple copper at Ardfert; and marcasites of copper in Glanerought. The marble of Tralee has spots like that of Kilkenny, but larger, and fuller of sparry substance; it takes a high polish. Marble of inferior quality is found in several other parts. In some of the islands in the bay of Kenmare is a variegated marble of red and white, interspersed with yellow, green, and purple spots. A grey marble in Cappanacoss Island was formerly extensively worked by Sir William Petty. Near Castleisland is found the Lapis Hibernicus auctorum, or "Irish slate;" its taste is sour, and it abounds with common green copperas, for extracting which works were erected at Tralee, but were relinquished for want of a market. Pipe-clay, potters'-clay, fullers'-earth, brown ochre, and rotten-stone, like tripoli, are met with in various places. Very fine amethysts have been found in the cliffs near Kerry Head; and sulphur appears on the north of Cashen river, near Ballybunnian. A kind of whetstone used for razors is found near the Devil's Punch-Bowl. Fossil shells are to be met with in most places where there is limestone; they are chiefly of the cockle kind, and generally consist of lumps of sparry matter, the shell being wholly decomposed, and only the shape remaining. Coraloids are also discernible. Of the plants peculiar to this county, or only found on the ridge that separates it from the county of Cork, the most remarkable is the arbutus, which, with the yew and holly, gives a perpetual verdure to the natural woods of Killarney. The prostrate juniper occurs on the shore near Derriquin, on the Kenmare estuary. Saxifrages in numerous varieties descend from the summit of the Reeks to the sea-shore; and those plants that luxuriate in a moist climate are more numerous and diversified in Kerry, than in any other county in Ireland: such are of the orders Musci, Hepaticæ, and Lichenes, and of these, several new species have been added to the British list.

The chief MANUFACTURE, that of coarse linen, is nearly confined to the barony of Corkaguiney, where it was formerly much more extensive than at present; the word "Dingle," impressed upon the cloth, procured for it a ready sale at foreign markets. The flax is uniformly raised on potato soil, and yields abundantly; latterly, since attention has been paid to saving the seed, half the former quantity of imported seed has been found to be sufficient. The kind of linen most in demand was known by the name of "Box-and-trip," and owed its character to the careful mode of preparing the yarn; but the sale has latterly declined, in consequence of the inferior method of manufacture: it is wrought in pieces from 140 to 200 yards in length. Another kind of linen is also made here, called Baudle linen, from being of the width of fourteen inches, which makes the measure called a bandle. Both sorts were in much demand, as well for domestic consumption as for the army and navy. The woollen manufacture is carried on for domestic purposes only; the wool being mostly sent to Cork or Limerick, where it is purchased and made up into cloth. The Coomduffe mountains, however, form an exception to this remark; for the tenants there pay their rent by flannels, which are sold at the markets of Tralee and Dingle. The FISHERY is carried on chiefly from the ports of Valencia and Dingle; the kinds taken include cod, ling, hake, glasson, and some haddock. Along the shores of the Kenmare river, the fishery is likewise carried on to some extent; and here, that of pilchards was also a great source of profit, but the fish quitted the coast many years since. Salmon is abundant, though much thinned by the seals, which frequent the shores in such numbers that the rocks are covered with them in summer; these are killed sometimes with musket balls, and sometimes by moonlight in the caverns where they sleep. Dingle bay is famous for its crayfish, and for lobsters on its northern side; oysters and other shell-fish are to be obtained in many places. A great disadvantage which the entire county labours under, is, the want of means for exporting its produce; there are but few quays, so that it loses nearly all the advantages of its maritime situation. Much might be done in this respect by opening the mouth of the Cashen, and by improving the harbour of Tarbert, which is capable of being made one of the most useful ports on the Shannon.

The RIVERS are numerous, but none of them of great length. The Feale rises in the mountains that separate Kerry and Limerick, and, running by Abbeyfeale, receives the Gale or Galey near Rattoo from the north-east, and afterwards the Brick from the south. From the junction of these three, the united stream takes the name of Cashen, under which it discharges itself into the estuary of the Shannon, near Ballybunnian. The tide flows up the whole of the Cashen, and boats proceed as far as Lixnaw, on the Brick, at high water. The Mang, or Maine, rises near Castleisland, and proceeding south-west is augmented by the Fleskroe; and after passing by Castlemaine, to which place it is navigable, it falls into the harbour of that name. The Lee or Leigh is a small stream rising a few miles east of Tralee, but when augmented by the mountain streams after rain, its body of water is so considerable, as frequently to overflow a great part of that town, to which it is navigable from the sea by boats. The Flesk, the second river in the county in size, has its source in the Derrynasagart mountains, on the boundary of the county of Cork, and flowing in a very winding course through the valley of Glenflesh, discharges itself into the Lower lake of Killarney. The only outlet for the waters of these lakes is the Laune, or Lane, which empties itself into Castlemaine harbour, after receiving the Gheestan. The Cara rises in the mountains of Dunkerron; passes through Glencarra; and after forming a lake, falls into the same bay. The Fartagh, and Inny or Eeny, rise in the Iveragh mountains, and flow westward, the former into Valencia harbour, the latter into Ballinaskelligs bay. The Roughty rises in the parish of Kilgarvan, and flowing through a picturesque valley empties itself into the inner extremity of the arm of the sea called the river or bay of Kenmare, into the northern side of which the Finihy, Blackwater, and Sneem also fall. Most of these rivers abound with salmon and trout. The Great Blackwater rises in the north-east of Kerry, and after forming the boundary between this county and Cork, flows eastward through the latter county into the Atlantic at Youghal. The roads have been considerably improved. A government road from Castleisland to King-William's-Town was lately completed; as was another under the Board of Public Works, from Kenmare to Glengariff, in continuation of a line from Killarney to Kenmare completed about twenty years since: each of the three opens a communication through a wild and mountainous tract. Several other new roads are in progress or projected.

The VESTIGES of ANTIQUITY scattered over the county are very numerous, though the most common are merely the traces of the military struggles of which it has been the scene. It had formerly three of the ancient round towers, of which the one that stood near the cathedral of Ardfert fell in 1771; of another, at Aghadoe about 20 feet remain; and the third is still standing nearly entire at Rattoo. Staigue fort, in the parish of Kilcrohane, is an extraordinary circular building of the most remote date: there is another stone fort with seats around it, about three miles distant, but in ruins, from the inferior solidity of its workmanship; and a similar inclosure is to be seen in Iveragh, on the opposite side of the river to Cahirciveen. Perhaps of a remoter age are the Ogham inscriptions near the church of Kilmelchedor, not far from Smerwick harbour; where there is another inscription in a running character of various ancient letters. At Ballysteeny is likewise a stone with an Ogham inscription; and, in the ruined church of Aghadoe, another. Among the most curious of the ancient fortifications is the circular inclosure at Caherdonnel, which is attributed to the Danes; and on the mountain of Cahirconree, or "the fortress of King Con," is a circle of massive stones, also piled in the manner of a Danish intrenchment. There is a Danish camp, called Caher Trant, on the shores of Ventry haven; and another at Rathanane, in the same vicinity. Clee Ruadh, or the Red Ditch, is a singular line of defence, commencing at a place called Caher Carbery, near Kerry Head, and carried eastward to the Cashen river, beyond which it re-appears; proceeding over Knockanure mountain, it enters Limerick county, where all traces of it are lost. It is conjectured to have been a line of demarcation between the principalities of Thomond and Desmond. The most curious of the minor remains of the more remote ages is the bronze instrument, resembling a kettle-drum, found at Muckross, and now deposited in Charlemont House, Dublin. Eighteen Religious Houses are said to have anciently existed in this county; and there are remains of those of Aghamore or Derryuane, Ardfert, Ballinaskellig, Innisfallen, Irrelagh or Muckross, Killagh or de Bello Loco (in the parish of Kilcoleman), Lislaghtin, O'Dorney or Kyrie Eleison, and Rattoo or Rathtoy. There are also the ruins of the ancient cathedrals of Ardfert and Aghadoe; a ruined religious building, called Monaster in Oriel, in the parish of Kilgarvan; chapels or cells, built entirely of stone with arched roofs, on Skellig and Blasquet Islands, from the former of which the abbey of Ballinaskellig was removed to the main land; a curious church and cell, dedicated to St. Finian, on an island in Lough Currane, in the parish of Dromod; a stone-roofed cell at Fane, in the parish of Ventry; one also at Kelmelchedor; one near Gallerus, at the bottom of Smerwick harbour, which is very perfect and curious; Mac Ida's chapel, near Ballyheigue; and an anchorite's cell in the solid rock near Kilcrohane church. Ruined parochial churches are scattered over the entire county; but their features are generally very simple. The old Castles still remaining in a more or less perfect state are those of Ardea, Barra, Ballybeggan, Ballybunnian, Ballycarbery, Ballyheigue, Ballymalus, Ballinaskellig, Beale, Cappanacoss, Carrigafoyle, Castledrum, Castlefiery, Castleisland, Castlelough, Castlesybil, Clonmellane, Doon, Dunkerron, Dunloh, Fenit, Gallerus, Killaha, Kilmurry, Lick, Listowel, Littur, Molahiffe, Pallis, Rathanane, and Ross; which, as well as the modern castles and seats, are noticed in the articles on the parishes in which they are situated.

In the western part of the county the houses were formerly built after the Spanish fashion, with stone balconies in front; as there was a great communication with the Spaniards and Portuguese, who visited the coast annually in considerable numbers to fish for cod, which circumstance also accounts for the names given to some of the towns. The mountainous parts are chiefly inhabited by herdsmen, who feed and clothe themselves from their own lands, consuming but little of the produce of other places; their habitations are low smoky huts covered with coarse thatch. In some parts the women have a becoming dress, consisting of a jacket of cloth, with loose sleeves, made to fit close round the neck and bosom, and fastened in front with a row of buttons: this is considered to be a relic of the Spanish costume. They marry at a very early age. The peasants are generally well-proportioned, with swarthy complexions, dark eyes, and long black hair; exhibiting, in the opinion of some, strong traces of Spanish origin. They are a frank, honest race, of very independent spirit, acute in understanding, and friendly and hospitable to strangers. The Dingle mountains being dry and healthy, are very populous; those to the south are but thinly peopled. The state of the peasantry in the northern part of the county is much worse than that just described. In many places they are badly housed, the family and the cattle, including the pig, being inmates of the same apartment; the floors being sunk below the level of the soil; the bedding formed of straw, hay, or dry rushes; their clothing scanty; nearly two-thirds of the population bare-legged; the diet, potatoes and sour milk; the wages, tenpence a day in spring and harvest, and at other periods the labourers wholly unemployed. Between Tarbert and Listowel many of the cabins are built of stone without cement, the doors being of wicker. The people in general, though superstitious, querulous, and, from want of regular employment, of an idle disposition, are inquisitive and extremely intelligent. It is well known that classical learning was once sought after even to a fault among the lower orders throughout the county, many of whom had more knowledge of the Latin language than had the higher classes in other parts. The practice of "keening" at funerals, which in many parts is falling into disuse, is here retained in full force.

Mineral springs, simply chalybeate, are numerous. Of sulphuric chalybeates the principal is that called the Spa, about three miles from Tralee; and at Ballybeg, north-east of Dingle, is another highly impregnated. A saline spring at Magherybeg, in Corkaguiney, rises a little below high-water mark out of a clear white sand: though covered twice a day by the tide, there is no variation in it. Near Dowlas Head are several large natural caves, one of which is of magnificent dimensions, and in calm weather may be entered for 100 yards in a boat; the reverberation of the human voice in the interior sounds like a speaking-trumpet. At Minegahane, near the Cashen, the sea breaking into the cavities of the shore produces a loud sound like the discharge of artillery; the noise generally precedes a change of weather, and not unfrequently occurs on the approach of a storm. A columnar cliff, called by the country people the Devil's Castle, stands to the north of Lick Castle, in the mouth of the Shannon, and is inaccessible except to the sea-fowl. The whole shore hereabouts presents a succession of romantic caverns, extending from Ballybunnian to Kilconly Point. But the great natural curiosities of this county are those of Killarney and its vicinity, described in the account of that place; besides which may be enumerated the transposed limestone and sandstone rocks, and the Fairy Rock covered with impressions of feet, both near Kilgarvan; Lough Quinlan, with its floating islands, in the parish of Tuosist; and the caves and subterranean stream in the parish of Ratass. Kerry gives the inferior titles of Baron and Earl to the Marquess of Lansdowne, who also enjoys the titles of Viscount Clanmaurice and Baron of Lixnaw and Dunkerron, in the peerage of Ireland, all derived from districts in this county.

KESH, a village, in the parish of MAGHERACULMONEY, union of LOWTHERSTOWN, barony of LURG, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 12 miles (N. by W.) from Enniskillen, and 93 miles (N. W. by N.) from Dublin, on the road from Enniskillen to Donegal; containing 54 houses, and 248 inhabitants. It has a sub-post office; is a constabulary police station; and has fairs on Jan. 28th, March 28th, June 1st, July 28th, Sept. 28th, and Nov. 21st.

KID ISLAND, in the parish of KILMORE, union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It lies at the entrance of Broadhaven, and comprises 25¼ statute acres: the highest point is 311 feet above the level of the sea.

KILACONENAGH, a parish, in the union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the post-town of Castletown-Bearhaven, 7085 inhabitants. The parish comprises 19,295 statute acres. It is very uneven, being principally composed of mountains of slate, the highest of which is Miskush, which has an elevation of 1214 feet: a few of these mountains furnish herbage for cattle, but the greater part are barren. Some of the low lands are moderately well cultivated with the spade, and round Castletown the land is fertile, being chiefly manured with sea-weed and sand. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, episcopally united to the rectories and vicarages of Kilnamanagh and Kilcateerin, in 1795, the whole forming the union called Bearhaven, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Riversdale. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £288. 15., of which £150 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £363. 15. The church is a small neat edifice with a low square tower, built in 1812, by aid of a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and recently rebuilt at a cost of £759. 15., towards which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners contributed £609. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £250 and a loan of £550 from the same Board, in 1820; the glebe of Kilaconenagh comprises 30 statute acres, and the glebe of the whole union 63 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is in the diocese of Kerry, and, with Kilnamanagh, forms the district of Castletown, where is a large chapel; there is also one on Bere Island. In Castletown are some ruins of Castle Dhermod, built by Dhermod M'Carthy; and at Dunboy stand the remains of Dunboy Castle, formerly belonging to the O'Sullivans; for the remarkable defence of which, see the article CASTLETOWN-BEARHAVEN.

KILACONNIGAN.—See KILLOGHCONNOGHAN.

KILBAHA, a village, in the parish of KILBALLYHONE, union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 15½ miles (W. by S.) from Kilrush, and on the northern shore of the estuary of the Shannon; containing 87 houses, and 531 inhabitants. It is situated on the small bay of the same name, which is the first on entering the Shannon, and forms an asylum harbour for fishing-vessels and other small craft coming in from Loop Head. The pier, constructed by the late Fishery Board, affords accommodation for landing sea-manure, of which a considerable quantity is used in the neighbourhood; and has proved of great benefit to the farmers. Turf of a superior quality is cut in the vicinity, and sent hence to Limerick; and the fisheries afford exclusive employment to upwards of 100 persons.

KILBALIVER.—See BALLIVOR and KILLOGHCONNOGHAN.

KILBALLYHONE, or KILBALLYOWEN, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 13 miles (S. W.) from Kilrush, and on the western coast; containing 4346 inhabitants, of whom 188 are in the village. This parish is situated at the south-western extremity of the county, and, being bounded on one side by the Atlantic Ocean and on the other by the river Shannon, forms a peninsula, which terminates in the promontory called Cape Lean or Loop Head. It also comprises the headlands of Dunmore and Kilclogher, and the harbour of Kilbaha on the Shannon; and its north-western shore constitutes part of the Malbay coast, on which numerous shipwrecks have occurred. The peninsula is exposed to the whole ocean swell, which here sets in with great violence in west or southerly winds, particularly when accompanied by the "rollers," a periodical visitation. Loop Head is situated at the mouth of the Shannon, in lat. 52° 33′ 13″, and long. 9° 54′: on its summit is a lighthouse, the lantern of which is 269 feet above the sea at high water, and exhibits a brilliant fixed light from 15 lamps. The parish comprises 10,835 statute acres; the land is chiefly in tillage, but there is a considerable portion of coarse pasture, with some patches of bog. Sea-weed and sand are extensively used for manure, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving. Samphire of superior quality is found on the cliffs at Clehansevan. Kilballyhone is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is partly impropriate in the representative of Lord Castlecoote, and the remainder forms part of the corps of the prebend of Tomgraney in the cathedral of Killaloe; the vicarage is part of the union of Kilrush. The tithe rent-charge is £200. 15. 6., of which £51. 18. 6. are payable to the lessees of the impropriator, £62. 6. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donaha, or Cross, which also comprises the parish of Moyarta and contains three chapels, situated respectively at Cross, Donaha, and Carrigaholt. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground; and at Ross are those of another, but much smaller: of the ancient castle of Clehansevan, which was blown down by a violent storm in 1802, some vestiges still exist; and at Fodera hill are the remains of a signal-tower. The puffing holes of Clehansevan are considered a great natural curiosity, and in a certain state of the wind and tide spout water to a considerable height. At such times, the sea is strongly impelled into the horizontal fissures of the cliff; and the air forced inwards by the weight of water, suddenly reacting on the spent force of the waves, repels them with a sound resembling the discharge of heavy artillery. The natural bridges at Ross are formed by the action of the tide on the loose earth among the rocks. At Fierd is a chalybeate spring; and manganese, adapted for making bleaching liquid, is also said to exist there.

KILBANE, a village, in the parish of KILLOKENNEDY, union of ENNIS, barony of LOWER TULLA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing 370 inhabitants.

KILBANNON.—See KILBENNAN.

KILBARRACK, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of COOLOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Dublin, on the road to Howth; containing 199 inhabitants. It comprises 740 statute acres, and the Grand Northern Trunk railway from the metropolis to Drogheda passes through the parish. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Howth; the rectory is appropriate to the prebend of Howth in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, and the tithes are included in the return for that parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilbarrack forms part of the district of Baldoyle and Howth. On the road to Howth are the ruins of the chapel of Mone, commonly called the Abbey of Kilbarrack, which formerly belonged to St. Mary's Abbey, Dublin: it is said to be of great antiquity, and to have been built on the strand near the great sand-bank called the North Bull, for the assistance of shipwrecked mariners; the ancient cemetery, although unfenced and overgrown with weeds, is still occasionally used.

KILBARRON, a parish, in the union of BALLYSHANNON, barony of TYRHUGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Donegal to Enniskillen; containing, with the greater part of the sea-port, market, and post town of Ballyshannon, 10,027 inhabitants. St. Columb founded a church here, of which Barrind was bishop about 590. The parish comprises 23,932¾ statute acres, of which 915¼ are water: half of the soil is arable; the remainder is meadow, pasture, and mountain land, and there is a sufficient extent of bog. In addition to the usual crops, great quantities of carrots and onions are raised in the open fields. The Abbey river, which flows into Abbey bay, in Ballyshannon harbour, contains eels, trout, and salmon; and off the coast most kinds of sea-fish are abundant, but are preyed upon by a kind of small shark, or dog-fish. During spring and summer here are many seals; the coast is frequently visited by large whales, and great numbers of skate and thornback are taken with the long line. Saudstone and whinstone are found at Kildoncy, and a kind of stone coal appears in the cliff overhanging the sea; the seam is about 7 inches thick, and dips towards the land. In boring for coal, emery has been discovered about 12 feet below the surface. Colonel Conolly has greatly benefited this part of the county, in which he is one of the largest proprietors, having for many years expended at least £1000 per annum in agricultural implements, flax-seed, dispensaries, schools, and roads; in addition to which, he has laid out large sums on Ballyshannon harbour.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the gift of Colonel Conolly, in whom the rectory is impropriate. Of the 44 townlands comprised within the parish, only four pay full tithe, three are subject to a small modus, and the remainder are tithe-free: the tithe rent-charge is £33. 15., of which £19. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was originally erected in 1745, on an eminence near the town, and is the principal landmark for vessels entering the harbour; it has been rebuilt at a cost of £3405, of which £500 were from private sources, and the remainder from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; it accommodates 1200 persons. The glebe-house was built in 1809, by aid of a gift of £100, and a loan of £675, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 315 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the principal chapel, in Ballyshannon, is a large neat building, erected in 1795; another at Castleard was erected in 1832, and has a burial-ground. There are also places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists. Near the glebe-house, on a stupendous rock rising almost perpendicularly out of the sea, are the ruins of the castle of Kilbarron, which is supposed to have been inhabited by freebooters. Within the parish are fourteen Danish raths; and in the harbour of Ballyshannon, at the mouth of the Erne, was formerly an island, called Inis-Samer, where, according to the Munster Annals, was a religious house, in which Flaherty O'Maoldora, King of Conall, or Tyrconnell, having renounced the world, died in 1197. There is a chalybeate spring in the parish.—See BALLYSHANNON.

KILBARRON, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, partly in the barony of LEITRIM, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, but chiefly in the barony of LOWER ORMONDE, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Burris-o'-kane, on the road from Killaloe to Portumna; containing 2853 inhabitants. It comprises 11,344 statute acres: the land is of a light limestone quality, and chiefly under tillage; about 150 acres are called the Commons of Kearney, and 814½ acres are in the island of Illaunmore, in the river Shannon, being that part of the parish which is in the county of Galway. Coarse limestoue and a kind of red and white marble are found, and lead was formerly obtained. Here is a constabulary police force, for whom a barrack was lately built. Among the chief seats is Castletown, a handsome castellated building on an eminence near the Shannon, commanding beautiful views of Lough Derg and the mountain scenery of Clare and Galway. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Captain Ralph Smith. The tithe rent-charge is £270, of which £180 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a neat building, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £1000 in 1823. The glebe-house was built in 1831, by a gift of £260, and a loan of £400, from the same Board; the glebe consists of 12 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also Terryglass and Finoe, and containing two chapels. In the churchyard is a parochial school in connexion with the Church Education Society. Here are the ruins of an ancient church; also of four castles, called Cushlawn-Thullahawn, Cushlawn-Thigge-Burht, Annah, and Ballycollaton.

KILBARRY, a parish, in the ancient county of the city of WATERFORD, union of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S.) from Waterford, on the road to Tramore; containing 605 inhabitants. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded here in the 12th century, on the dissolution of which order it was given to the Knights Hospitallers. The ruins shew that it consisted of a dwelling-house connected with a chapel. On the opposite side of the marsh near which they stand is a very fine cromlech. The parish contains 2631 statute acres, part of which is arable, and the rest a marsh, which, being under water the greater part of the year, renders the vicinity extremely unhealthy; it is, however, proposed to cut a canal, for the double purpose of draining it and facilitating the conveyance of agricultural produce and manure. The living is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Waterford, and in the gift of G. L. FOX, Esq., in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £116. 5., payable to the impropriator, who allows £5 to the curate of St. Patrick's, Waterford, for the performance of the clerical duties.

KILBARRYMEADEN, a parish, in the southern part of the barony of UPPERTHIRD, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Kilmacthomas; containing 3360 inhabitants. It comprises 6264 statute acres: the surface is generally naked and uncultivated, and includes about 300 acres of bog; but the mineral productions are valuable, the Irish Mining Company raising a large quantity of superior copper-ore; and lead-ore was formerly obtained from the strand at Kilmurrin. Several neat houses have been built for the miners. Dunbratten is supposed to have been the spot first occupied by the Anglo-Norman invaders, under Raymond le Gros, who here repulsed with great slaughter the Danes of Waterford and the inhabitants of the surrounding country, who had attacked his intrenchments, part of which still exist. There is a small fishing-station at Dunbratten, with about 25 boats. Much limestone is imported from Dungarvan, and the erection of a pier would be a great benefit. The principal seats are Gardenmorris and Georges-town. The parish is in the diocese of Lismore: the rectory is united to part of the rectories of Kilburn and Kilmeaden, together forming the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Waterford, in the patronage of the Bishop; the vicarage forms a separate benefice, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £225, of which £150 are payable to the precentor, and £75 to the vicar; the entire revenue of the precentorship, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £345. 17. 3. There is now no church in the parish. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel. About 180 children are educated in two public schools, which are held in a house built by Lady Osborne, who also contributes towards their support; and a third school is under the Church Education Society. Here is a well dedicated to St. Baramedan, who founded the church; and at Kilmurren was a church founded by his sister, Murina, of which the ruins are still visible. Near Dunbratten is an image of St. Baramedan, rudely carved out of a rock, and much resorted to by the peasantry.

KILBEACON, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Knocktopher, on the road from Kilkenny to Waterford; containing 1362 inhabitants, and 3402¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, united to the vicarages of Rosinan and Killahy, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of St. Canice, Kilkenny. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £85. 10., of which £57 are payable to the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the vicar: there is a glebe of 16 acres attached to the vicarage, and one of 19 acres belonging to the vicars-choral; but no glebe-house. The church was built in 1826, by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Mullinarat. At Earlsrath was a large fort, encompassed by a fosse and a bank about 20 feet high.

KILBEACONTY, or KILVECONTY, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of KILTARTAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9½ miles (N. N. E.) from Gort, on the road from that place to Portumna; containing 4575 inhabitants. This parish comprises 12,473¾ statute acres, and contains good lime and building stone: agriculture has been much improved by draining, and reclaiming the mountain. The seats are Russan, Lysbrian, Rendifin, Ballyturin, and Cloon. Kilbeaconty is in the diocese of Kilmacduagh; the rectory is partly appropriate to the archdeaconry, and partly, with the vicarage, forms a portion of the union and corps of the deanery of Kilmacduagh. The tithe rent-charge is £146. 5., of which £15 are payable to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the dean. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a good chapel, built in 1837. A national school was built in 1836, on the estate of J. O'Hara, Esq.

KILBEAGH, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Ballaghadireen, on the road from that place to Swinford; containing 9963 inhabitants. It contains 33,824¾ statute acres: very large tracts are bog and mountain; the soil is poor, and not well cultivated. There is plenty of limestone, and some freestone. The gentlemen's seats are Clonmore, Palmfield, and Carra Castle. Here are large warehouses for iron, timber, &c.; the parish is a constabulary police station, and a manorial court is held monthly at Carra Castle. The parish is in the diocese of Achonry; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Dillon, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilconduff. The tithe rent-charge is £127. 18., and is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the districts of Kilbeagh and Carra Castle, in each of which is a chapel. Here are the ruins of an old church, in a burial-ground that is still used.

KILBEG, or KILMAINHAMBEG, a parish, in the union of KELLS, barony of LOWER KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Kells, on the road to Nobber; containing 2036 inhabitants. This parish takes its name from a commandery of Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, founded by Walter de Lacy in the reign of Richard I., which was a cell to that of Kilmainham, near Dublin, but of which no vestige can be traced. The area is 5184¾ statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Newtown: the tithe rent-charge is £135; and the church of the union is in this parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilbeg forms part of the district of Stahalmock, and contains a chapel. A school at Carlanstown is aided by Sir H. Meredyth, Bart., who gave a house and an acre of land to the master.

KILBEGGAN, a market and post town, a parish, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of MOYCASHEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 15 miles (E. by S.) from Athlone, and 44¼ miles (W.) from Dublin; on the river Brosna and the road from Dublin to Athlone; containing 4186 inhabitants, of whom 1910 are in the town. A monastery was founded here by St. Becan, son of Murchade, a contemporary of St. Columb, about the year 600. In 972, a sanguinary battle was fought between the Irish and Danes, at a ford on the river, near the present bridge, since called Aghnaccan, or the "Ford of Heads," from the numbers of the slain that floated down the river. In 1200, the monastery, which had fallen into decay, was rebuilt by the family of Dalton, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; and some Cistercian monks, from the abbey of Mellifont, were placed in it. After its dissolution, the house and its possessions, which were very extensive, were granted to the Lambart family, of whom Sir Oliver, afterwards Lord Lambart, in 1606, obtained for the town the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair. In 1612, James I. gave the inhabitants a charter; and in 1620, Charles, son of Oliver, Lord Lambart, procured a grant of two additional fairs. During the disturbances of 1798, a party of insurgents was defeated near the town, after an obstinate engagement, by Colonel Blake, at the head of his regiment of Northumberland militia.

The TOWN contains 372 houses, of which nearly one-half are neatly built and slated. It is improving; and a branch from the Grand Canal, which was recently cut to it, holds out prospects of the increase of its trade. There are a large distillery, a brewery, and two mills for flour and oatmeal, one of them extensive; also a manufactory for tobacco and snuff. The market is on Saturday, and is a considerable mart for butter: fairs for live stock are held on March 25th, June 16th, Aug. 15th, and Oct. 28th. The market-house is a neat plain building of limestone, erected by Gustavus Lambart, Esq., and contains also accommodation for holding the public courts. The corporation consisted, until its dissolution in 1840, of a portreeve (who was a justice of the peace), 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, with a recorder, town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The freedom was obtained by favour of the portreeve and burgesses. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when it was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to Gustavus Lambart, Esq. A borough court of record, for the recovery of debts not exceeding five marks, used to be held; also a court of petty-sessions every Saturday, in which the portreeve occasionally presided, with the county magistrates. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town.

The parish comprises 6085¾ statute acres; the land is generally of good quality, and the system of agriculture greatly improved: a considerable extent of exhausted bog has been reclaimed, affording excellent pasture, and a small quantity still remains for fuel; there is no waste land. The principal seats are Belmont, Meldrum, Correigh, and Coola. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representative of the late Sir W. Lambart Cromie, Bart. The tithe rent-charge is £190. 11., wholly payable to the impropriator. The church, built in 1764, was enlarged, and a square tower added to it, in 1818, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £200, and the Commissioners of the Loan Fund £400. The glebe-house, for the erection of which the late Board gave £100, was built in 1800; the glebe comprises 21½ acres, subject to a rent of £20 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with that of Rahue; the chapel is a handsome edifice, and there are a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, a parochial school, and a dispensary. Here are numerous mineral springs, but none of them are used medicinally. The remains of the ancient monastery are very inconsiderable. John Henry North, an eminent barrister, was a native of this place.

KILBEGNET, a parish, in the poor-law union of ROSCOMMON, barony of BALLYMOE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Roscommon, and on the road from that place to Dunmore; containing 5036 inhabitants, and 10,867¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Athleague; the rectory is impropriate in Thomas Corr, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £103. 17., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united with Donamon, and has a chapel at Crosswell. Here is a public school, principally supported by Mr. Dowell.

KILBEHENNY, or KILBENNY, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Mitchelstown, on the road from that place to Limerick; containing 4291 inhabitants. It comprises 15,376 statute acres, having much light land and a well-planted glen extending among the hills to the Galtee mountains, the highest of which, called Galtee More, separates this parish from Galbally. The Earl of Kingston's beautiful seat, the Mountain Lodge, with its extensive demesne, is in Kilbehenny; as is also Lord Massey's lodge, with its fine woods and grounds. The parish is in the diocese of Emly: the rectory forms part of the union of Duntrileagne, and of the corps of the prebend of Killenellick in the cathedral of Emly; the tithe rent-charge is £300. The church has been lately rebuilt, at an expense of £634. In the Roman Catholic divisions, with the exception of a small part included in the district of Mitchelstown, Kilbehenny forms a separate district, in which are two chapels.

KILBELFAD, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Ballina, and on the river Moy; containing 3681 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the west by Lough Conn, in which is the island of Glass, the burial-place of Bishop Bale Fadh, who took refuge there during a period of persecution, and from whom the parish is supposed to have derived its name. Kilbelfad comprises 13,515¼ statute acres, whereof 6416 are under water. The soil is tolerably fertile, and the system of agriculture much improved: there is abundance of good bog, and the parish contains quarries of limestone and granite; also considerable quantities of marl, and of clay for making bricks. A fair is held on Whit-Tuesday, and petty-sessions occasionally. The island of Annagh, in Lough Conn, comprises 45 acres of arable land and two acres of bog. The parish is in the diocese of Killala; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Ardagh: the tithe rent-charge is £135. 5., which is equally divided between the appropriators and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Backs, in Ballynahaglish; there are two chapels, one at Knockmore and one at Gallows Hill, but service is only performed in one. Here are numerous encampments, generally called forts; and the remains of the old castles of Deel and Cloghan, built by the Bourkes; and of Castle Kelly.

KILBENNAN, or KILBANNON, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of DUNMORE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (N. N. W.) from Tuam, on the road to Hollymount; containing 2844 inhabitants, and comprising 7656 statute acres. A religious house was anciently established here, of which no other record exists but that it was granted, after the Dissolution, to the burgesses of Athenry; it would appear to have been of great antiquity, as there is still remaining a portion, 50 feet high, of one of those round towers found generally near the site of the earliest religious establishments. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Tuam, and the vicarage forms part of the ecclesiastical union of Tuam: the tithe rent-charge is £79. 12., which is equally divided between the vicars-choral and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilbennan forms part of the district of Kilconly; the chapel is a small thatched building.

KILBERRY, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of NARRAGH and RHEBAN WEST, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Athy, and on the river Barrow; containing 1771 inhabitants. It comprises 10,539½ statute acres; about two-thirds are arable and pasture land, and one-third bog. The seats are Barrowford, Bellview, Salisbury, Geraldine, and Bert House, a residence of Lord Downes. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the gift of the Vicars-Choral of St. Patrick's Cathedral; the rectory till lately formed part of the corps of the deanery of St. Patrick's. The tithe rent-charge is £270, of which two-thirds were payable to the dean. The church was opened for divine service in 1833; it was built at a cost of £1200, of which £900 were a grant from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of two acres, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Athy. About 100 children are educated in a national school, and about 150 in two private schools. Here are the ruins of two churches; also the well of Tobberara, which is dedicated to St. John.

KILBERRY, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of MORGALLION, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Navan, on the road from that place to Kingscourt; containing 2023 inhabitants, of whom 128 are in the village. It comprises 4818¼ statute acres of land of good quality; about two-thirds are meadow or pasture, and about 100 acres bog. The parish is intersected by the Yellow River, on which is a corn-mill. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Donaghpatrick: the tithe-rent charge is £231. 5., and there is a glebe of six acres, valued at £18. 9. 2. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilberry is the head of a district, comprising also Donaghpatrick and Teltown, and containing two chapels, situated at Kilberry and Oristown. There are two national schools, and a school to which Colonel Everard gives a house and garden rent-free, and C. Smyth, Esq., subscribes £10 annually. A chantry of two priests was formerly attached to the church of St. Mary, in this parish.

KILBIXY, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of MOYGOISH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the market and post town of Ballinacargy, 2246 inhabitants. The castle of Kilbixy is said to have been built by Hugh de Lacy, in 1192, and was subsequently the seat of Geoffry de Constantine, who founded at Tristernagh a priory of Canons Regular, sometimes called the priory of Kilbixy, and richly endowed it. The last prior was Edmund Nugent, Bishop of Kildare, who held it with his bishopric; and a pension of £26. 13. 4. was granted to him on its surrender. In 1590 a lease of it was granted to Captain W. Piers, at a rent of £60, and the lands are still held by his descendants. It was finally destroyed in 1783. The town arose under the protection of the castle, and in the reign of Henry VI. was one of the borough towns of Meath. Sir Henry Piers, in his chorographical description of the county, states, that in 1782, part of the burgage castle, with 40 acres called the burgage land, existed, besides the ruins of many ancient houses and castles. The place had once an hospital, called the Leper-house of St. Bridgid, of which there are still some ruins. In the reign of Elizabeth, O'Dogherty of Connaught encamped in the abbey demesne with about 600 followers, and being attacked by the queen's forces and refused admission into the abbey, was slain with all his party. The PARISH contains 6493½ statute acres, and is richly embellished with plantations that extend to Lough Iron, which is one of its boundaries, and is a mile in length by half a mile in breadth, but very shallow. The land is arable and pasture, with a small quantity of bog: there is some limestone. The principal seats are, Baronstown, which was built by the Rt. Hon. Anthony Malone; Tristernagh; Rath; Cummerstown; and Carrickbawn. The living is a curacy, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of Sir J. B. Piers, Bart., in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £82. 10. The church is a handsome building, erected in 1798, at a cost of £10,000, of which £900 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits; the remainder was given by the late Lord Sunderlin, who also gave the organ. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1816, granted £450 as a gift and £50 as a loan; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is united with that of Templeoran, and is also called Sonna; there are two chapels in the union, of which that of Kilbixy is in Ballinacargy. At Rath is a loan fund; also a society for spinning yarn, supported by subscriptions. Edmund Malone, the celebrated commentator on Shakspeare, is interred here, and the Malone family have a handsome mausoleum near the church. At Temple-Cross are the ruins of an ancient chapel.—See Ballinacargy.

KILBOLANE, a parish, in the union of Kanturk, partly in the barony of Upper Connello, county of Limerick, but chiefly in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 5¼ miles (S. W. by W.) from Charleville, on the road to Rathkeale; containing 4155 inhabitants. It comprises 10,015 statute acres. The land is of good quality, and mostly in pasture; the portion in tillage yields excellent crops of grain and potatoes. There are about 26 acres of woodland, and 100 acres of bog, forming part of the "Red Bog," which extends into the adjoining parishes. The chief seats are Gibbins Grove, Kilbolane House, and Curryglass House; and the villages of Millford and Coltycormick are in this parish. It is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Cloyne, united by act of council to the rectory of Knocktemple, the two constituting the union of Knocktemple, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory of Kilbolane is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £412. 10., is entirely payable to his lessee, who allows £6. 3. for discharging the clerical duties. A neat church, with a square tower, was erected in 1834, at a cost of £300. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Millford, or Freemount: the chapel at Millford is a commodious modern building; there is another chapel at Kilbolane. The castle of Kilbolane, which was destroyed by Cromwell, was of a square form, with a circular tower at each angle; the ruins are very insignificant. On removing the remains of the ancient church, the tomb of the Synan family, bearing the date 1446, was transferred to the new edifice.

KILBONANE, a parish, in the union of Bandon, barony of East Muskerry, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3 miles (S. E.) from Cookstown; on the river West Bride, and on the roads from Cork to Macroom and from Mallow to Bandon; containing 1725 inhabitants. It comprises 4710 statute acres: about three-fourths are arable and pasture land, some of which is extremely good; the waste consists chiefly of exhausted bog and some elevated heathy ground in the south. The state of agriculture is unimproved. At Aherlow are extensive and valuable quarries of limestone, which supply the greater part of the vale of Bandon and the interior of the country on both sides for agricultural purposes and for building and ornamental architecture, and from which was taken stone for the ornamental part of the new court-house of Cork. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the family of Rye, of Rye Court. The tithe rent-charge is £307. 10., of which £151. 7. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, a neat small edifice, was erected in 1834, by subscription. There is no glebe-house; the glebe consists of 9 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmurry. The parochial school is supported by the vicar and other subscribers. There are some remains of the old church; and at Cloghduff, in the western part of the parish, great quantities of human bones have been often found, but whether it is some ancient burial-place, or the scene of some long-forgotten battle, is not known.

KILBONANE, a parish, in the union of Killarney, barony of Magonihy, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 3½ miles (S. S. E.) from Milltown, on the road to Killarney; containing 3666 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the river Laune, and comprises 8668 statute acres, the greater part of which is in tillage; the soil consists chiefly of a heavy clay, and there is a considerable portion of bog. The state of agriculture is gradually improving; the limestone quarries at Listry are extensively worked, and the produce burnt for manure. At Ballymalis are flour-mills, worked by the Gheestan river. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; the rectory is impropriate in the Crosbie family, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Molahiffe. The tithe rent-charge is £276. 18., payable in equal portions to the impropriators and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilbonane forms part of the district of Milltown; the chapel, at Listry, is a large modern building. At Faha is a school-house, with apartments for the master, built in 1834 by Mrs. Raymond, at an expense of £250, for the education of the male children of her tenantry, for which she allows the master £20 per annum. The ruins of the ancient church are situated near the banks of the Laune; at Ballymalis are the remains of the castle of that name.

KILBRACKEN, or Ballynbracken, a parish, in the union of Athy, barony of West Ophaly, in the county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 3¼ miles (S. E.) from Monastereven, on the road to Athy; containing 1365 inhabitants. It comprises 3057 statute acres: the land is of average quality. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Drogheda: the tithe rent-charge is £103. 17. About 100 children are educated in the parochial school.

KILBRAGH, a parish, in the union of Cashel, barony of Middlethird, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster; containing 362 inhabitants. It comprises 1100 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, forming part of the union of Fethard: the tithe rent-charge is £67. 10.

KILBRAGH, Tipperary.—See Templetouhy.

KILBREEDY, or Kilbride, a parish, in the union of Ballina, barony of Tyrawley, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Killala, and on the road from Rathlacken to Ballycastle; containing 1963 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4457¼ statute acres; the soil is marshy, and there is a considerable quantity of bog. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, and forms part of the union of Dunfeeny; the rectory is appropriate to the dean and precentor of Killala. The tithe rent-charge is £110. 12. 6., half of which is equally divided between the dean and precentor, and half is payable to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish is part of the union or district of Dunfeeny. There is a chalybeate spring. Downpatrick Head is an insulated circular cliff, about 80 yards from the shore; on the summit are the remains of a building.

KILBREDY MAJOR, a parish, in the union of Kilmallock, partly in the barony of Small County, but chiefly in that of Costlea, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Kilmallock on the road to Tipperary; containing 1409 inhabitants. It comprises 3384 statute acres: the land is of good quality, being on a substratum of limestone; the greater portion is arable with some valuable meadow and pasture, and there is a small proportion of bog. The parish is in the diocese of Limerick, and the rectory forms part of the union of Kilmallock: the tithe rent-charge is £168. 12. 6. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the glebe comprises 11½ acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Athnassy, or Ballinvana. Here are several raths, some of which are perfect.

KILBREDY MINOR, a parish, in the union of Kilmallock, barony of Coshma, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from Kilmallock, and on the road from that place to Charleville; containing 612 inhabitants. It comprises 2110 statute acres; the soil is very good, but only about one-fifth of it is under tillage, the remainder being meadow or pasture land. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £97. 10. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the glebe consists of 12¾ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Effin. Near the south bank of the Subtach are the ruins of the church.

KILBREW, a parish, in the union of Dunshaughlin, barony of Ratoath, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (N. E.) from Dunshaughlin, and on the road from Ratoath to Drogheda; containing 275 inhabitants. It comprises 2530½ statute acres of land of prime quality. Kilbrew House, formerly the property of the Gorges family, is a fine mansion, with an extensive and richly planted demesne. The parish is in the diocese of Meath, and the rectory forms part of the union of Tryvett; the tithe rent-charge is £134. 12. 6. The church, which serves for the union, is a neat edifice, built about the middle of the last century; it was repaired, and a tower added, in 1822, by a loan of £300 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is in Tryvett, which see. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Creekstown, or Curragha.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the barony of Upper Antrim, union and county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, 2¾ miles (W. N. W.) from Ballyclare, and on the road from Ballymena to Doagh; containing 2071 inhabitants. This parish comprises 5641 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and forms part of the union of Donegore: the tithe rent-charge is £279. 17. 6. There is no church; divine service is performed in a school-house every Sunday.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the barony of Newcastle, union of South Dublin, county of Dublin, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 63 inhabitants, and comprising 846 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and forms part of the union of Clondalkin. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united to Lucan, Palmerstown, and Clondalkin.

KILBRIDE, or Castlecorr, a parish, in the union of Oldcastle, partly in the barony of Demifore, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, but chiefly in the barony of Clonmahon, county of Cavan, and province of Ulster, on the road from Crossdoney to Oldcastle; containing, with the post-town of Mount-Nugent, 5041 inhabitants. It comprises 9341 statute acres, of which about three-fifths are arable: in Lough Sheelin are 564 acres. Limestone is abundant. The living is a rectory in the diocese of Meath, the presentation to which belongs to Lord Dunsany: the tithe rent-charge is £311. 12. The church was built in 1804, by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits; it has been lately repaired, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granting £157. The glebe comprises 22 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Killeagh and Kilbride, and has a chapel at Mount-Nugent.—See Mount-Nugent.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the union of New Ross, barony of Ida, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 5½ miles (W. by S.) from New Ross; containing 516 inhabitants, and 1696 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Kilcoan; the rectory is impropriate in the Rev. John Digby. The tithe rent-charge is £67. 10., which is equally divided between the vicar and the impropriator. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilbride forms part of the district of Slieuruagh.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the union of Dunshaughlin, barony of Dunboyne, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 4½ miles (N. by E.) from Clonee, and on the road from Dublin to Ratoath; containing 374 inhabitants. It comprises 3096½ statute acres; and is a chapelry, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Dunboyne, in which the tithes are included: the church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Dunboyne and Kilbride, and has a small chapel. On the lands of Ballintra are the remains of a Danish fort.

KILBRIDE, a parish, partly in the barony of Roscommon, but chiefly in that of South Ballintobber, union and county of Roscommon, and province of Connaught, 5 miles (N.) from Roscommon, on the road to Strokestown; containing 8578 inhabitants. It comprises 19,287 statute acres: there is a large proportion of bog: the other land is principally under tillage, but the system of agriculture is unimproved. Limestone abounds. Petty-sessions are held every alternate week at a place called the Four-mile-House. Kilbride is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and forms part of the ecclesiastical union of Roscommon; the rectory is impropriate in the Sandys family. The tithe rent-charge is £225. 13. 6., one-half payable to the impropriator and the other to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilgeffin, also called Kilbride; a chapel was lately erected. Some remains yet exist of the abbey of Derrane; and there are several raths, one of which, on the lands of Holywell, has a treble fosse.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the barony of MIDDLETHIRD, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. by W.) from Waterford, and on the bay of Tramore; containing 582 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1801 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, entirely appropriate to the economy estate of the cathedral, and forms, with the rectory of Island-Ikane, the impropriate cure of Kilbride, which is in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Waterford; the tithe rent-charge is £56. 3., and there is a glebe of three acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Dunhill. Here are the ruins of the old castle of Cullen.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, barony of SCARAWALSH, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. E.) from Camolin, and on the coast-road from Gorey to Oulart; containing 1054 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the vicinity of Ferns, was, during the disturbances of 1798, partly occupied by the insurgents, who encamped on Carrigrua Hill in their progress towards Gorey. It comprises 4473½ statute acres, of which a considerable portion is excellent grazing-land, and the remainder under tillage: the system of agriculture is slowly improving. Quarries of good building-stone are worked, and jasper has been found in some parts; there is only a scanty supply of fuel. A large quantity of butter is made here, and sent to the markets of Gorey and Enniscorthy. The chief seats are, Ballymore, a handsome modern mansion, beautifully situated in the midst of a richly wooded demesne; and Rockspring. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and the rectory forms a part of the union of that name: the tithe rent-charge is £390. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilbride is part of the union or district of Ferns: the chapel, a neat building, is at Kilcissan, or Clorogue; and there is a place of worship for the Society of Friends at Ballintore. A school in the parish is under the Church Education Society, and another under the National Board. At Ballymore are the ruins of an ancient church, held in such veneration that persons dying within 40 miles of the spot are sometimes buried there.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the poor-law union of RATHDRUM, barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER; situated near Arklow, from which it is separated by the river Ovoca; and containing 1445 inhabitants. It lies on the coast, extends three miles northward of Arklow, in the direction of Wicklow, and comprises 6754 statute acres: the land is generally in a high state of cultivation. Shelton, the splendid seat of the Earl of Wicklow, is within the parish, which is wholly the property of that nobleman; there are, besides, several good residences, viz. Woodmount, Seabank, Sheepwalk, Templemichael, Kilbride, and Ballyrichard. Near the mouth of the Ovoca is a coast-guard station. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Glendalough, and patronage of the Archbishop of Dublin. Kilbride includes the ancient parishes of Templemichael and Templerainey, and previously to 1833 constituted part of the union of Arklow, from which it was then separated by act of council; it now forms, together with the parish of Enorely or Encriley, the union of Kilbride. The vicarial tithe rent-charge is £138. 9. 4. The church, erected in 1834 by the Earl of Wicklow, at a cost of £900, is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a tower. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newbridge and Baranisky: the chapel is a neat and spacious edifice. Upwards of 200 children are educated, without religious distinction, in schools supported entirely by the Earl and Countess of Wicklow; and about 130 children and young persons are instructed in a Sunday school under the superintendence of the minister. Within the parish are the ruins of three ancient churches, those of Kilbride, Templemichael, and Templerainey, with burial-places adjoining each. The ruins of Kilbride church are on an eminence commanding a fine view of the town and bridge of Arklow, a great expanse of sea, the demesne of Shelton Abbey, and the woods of Glenart: in the churchyard adjoining is a mausoleum of the Howard family.

KILBRIDE, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of LOWER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 4¾ miles (E.) from Blessington, on the road from that place to Wicklow; containing 1256 inhabitants. This parish is in a very mountainous district, and comprises 11,640¾ statute acres, of which about 8000 are mountain land; there is much bog, particularly at Shankhill. The land is chiefly in pasture. The granite used in building Nelson's pillar, the Post-office, and other edifices in Dublin, was brought from the Golden Hill granite-quarry, here; and there is iron-ore in Butter mountain. The principal seats are Kippure Lodge and Ballywood. The parish is in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough: the rectory is partly impropriate in the representatives of the late Colonel Allen, and partly appropriate to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's; the vicarage forms part of the union of Blessington. The tithe rent-charge is £91. 6., of which £16. 10. are payable to the representatives, £34. 19. to the dean and chapter, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, for which a grant of £900 was made by the late Board of First Fruits, was built in 1833, and is in the later English style of architecture, with an embattled tower. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilbride forms part of the district of Blessington, and has a neat chapel, which was enlarged in 1835. Here are two old burial-grounds, several raths, and some large unhewn blocks of granite on the mountains.

KILBRIDE, KING'S county.—See TULLAMORE.

KILBRIDE-GLYN, a parish, in the union of WEXFORD, barony of SHELMALIER WEST, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. E.) from Taghmon, on the road from that place to Wexford; containing 826 inhabitants. It comprises 4110 statute acres, principally in tillage; and is in the diocese of Ferns. The rectory was impropriate in the Colclough family till about 1740, when it was purchased by the late Board of First Fruits, and annexed to the impropriate curacy, which forms part of the union of Killurin: the tithe rent-charge is £77. 9. 2. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Glyn.

KILBRIDE-LANGAN, or CLARA, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of KILCOURSEY, King's county, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Tullamore to Athlone; containing, with the post-town of Clara, 4581 inhabitants. This parish comprises 7617½ statute acres; more than one-half is good arable land, and of the remainder, about 1600 acres are profitable bog. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Clara, in which the church is situated; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire: the tithe rent-charge is £204. 4. 6., of which £114. 4. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, the parish forms part of the district of Ardnorcher or Clara: a small chapel is kept up at Lehinch, where is a school under the patronage of the Christian Brotherhood; there is also a chapel in the town. The parish contains places of worship for Baptists, and for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. About 45 children are taught in the parochial schools; and there are several private schools.—See CLARA.

KILBRIDE-PILATE, or PACE-KILBRIDE, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of FARTULLAGH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4¼ miles (W.) from Kinnegad, and on the road from Dublin to Athlone; containing 914 inhabitants, and 4031¾ statute acres. Here is Gaulstown Park, the splendid seat of Lord Kilmaine, in the grounds of which was a very large larch-tree, planted by Dean Swift; but it was blown down in the storm of January, 1839, and was sold for £25. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Enniscoffey, or Kilbride-Pilate, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £75. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Fartullagh, or Rochfort-Bridge, and has a chapel at Milltown.

KILBRIDE-VESTON, or KILBRIDE-VASTY, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of FARTULLAGH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Mullingar, on the road from that place to Rochfort-Bridge; containing 645 inhabitants. It comprises 1980 statute acres, and is in tillage and pasturage, with a considerable quantity of bog. The principal seats are, Dunboden, in which demesne are the remains of the ancient parish church; Whitewell; and Kilbride Castle, where are the remains of a stronghold of the Tyrrells. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Gifford family, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £58. 17. 6., of which £39. 5. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar; there is neither church nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Fartullagh, or Rochfort-Bridge.

KILBRIN, a parish, in the union of KANTURK, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (S. by W.) from Liscarrol; on the river Allua, and on the new road from Liscarrol to Mallow; containing 4855 inhabitants. It comprises 12,631 statute acres. The land considerably varies in quality, and a large portion consists of hilly pasture. Limestone is found in the south part of the parish, and burnt for manure; the state of agriculture is gradually improving. A fair is held at Ballyheene on Oct. 2nd, for general farming stock. Two roads have been made through the parish within a few years, and have tended greatly to the improvement of the district; one from Drumcolloher, through Liscarrol, to the mail-road near Mallow; and the other from Newcastle to Castle-Cor in this parish, where it meets the former road. The chief seats are, Castle-Cor, the ancient family mansion of the Freeman family, situated in a richly wooded demesne, which is particularly remarkable for its fine oaks; Ballygraddy; and Marybrook. The parish is in the diocese of Cloyne: the rectory is impropriate in the family of Longfield, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Liscarrol, or Kilbrin. The tithe rent-charge is £707. 5., of which £392. 5. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, situated at Ballygraddy, on the border of the parish, is a plain building with a square tower surmounted by a small spire; it was erected in 1790, by a grant of £564 made by the late Board of First Fruits. There are no remains of the ancient church, but its extensive burial-ground is still used. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which also comprises the parishes of Ballyclough, Drumdowney, and Kilmaclenan: the principal chapel, at the Cross of Kilbrin, is a large and handsome slated building of recent erection, with pointed windows; there is also a chapel at Ballyclough. A school is supported by Major Freeman, who allows £20 per annum, and a house and garden for the master.

KILBRINE, a parish, in the union and barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 1¾ mile (S. S. E.) from Boyle; containing 1114 inhabitants. It comprises 3852 statute acres. Lough Key is chiefly in this parish: it is about three British miles in its greatest length, has many bays and inlets, and abounds with islands; but its scenery is rather beautiful than romantic, although the Curlew mountains rise near its western shore. On Trinity Island was an abbey, founded in the 7th century, and refounded in 1215 for Præmonstratensian canons: in 1466 it was accidentally burnt, but it was rebuilt, and continued till the general dissolution; some of its ruins still exist. A chronological register was kept in this monastery, and is known as the Annals of Lough Key. On Inchmacnerin was a monastery, supposed to be the Eas-mac-neire founded by St. Columb; it existed till the Reformation. Castle Island is almost covered by a building called Mac Dermot's Castle, which has been partially rebuilt by Viscount Lorton, and contains some handsome apartments and fine old portraits: several legends are connected with the original fortress. Church Island contains some ruins, and Stag Island is finely wooded. On the south side of the lake is the demesne of Rockingham, the beautiful seat of Viscount Lorton, who has greatly improved this parish, as well as his other estates. The parish is in the diocese of Elphin: the rectory is impropriate in Lord Crofton; the vicarage was till lately part of the union of Killuken and corps of the archdeaconry of Elphin. The tithe rent-charge is £21. 15., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is included in the district of Boyle. Lord Lorton contributes £14 per annum, and gives a house and garden rent-free, in support of a school.

KILBRITAIN, a parish, in the union of Bandon, East division of the barony of East Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Bandon, on the road from that place to Timoleague; containing 1652 inhabitants. A castle was built here in the 13th century by De Courcey, who was dispossessed by M'Carty Reagh; there are still some remains. In 1642 this place was taken and garrisoned by the men of Bandon. The parish, which lies on the eastern side of a small bay, comprises 4751 statute acres, two-thirds of which are under tillage; the remainder forms the demesne of Kilbritain House. The land is generally very good, but indifferently cultivated; sand brought from the shore of the bay is the principal manure. Here is a slate-quarry; also some extensive flour-mills, and a fulling-mill on a small river which falls into the bay. Many of the people are occupied in fishing, and some are engaged in weaving cotton cords and coarse cloth. Besides Kilbritain House, here are Borleigh and Mill House. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, forming the corps of the prebend of Kilbritain in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £307. 10. The church is in ruins, but divine service is regularly performed in the school-house at Kilshanahane. The glebe consists of 5 acres; there is no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Rathclarin. Parochial schools were built by subscription in 1829.

KILBRITAIN, a village, in the parish of Rathclarin, union of Bandon, East division of the barony of East Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 6 miles (S.) from Bandon; containing 48 houses, and 288 inhabitants. It is situated in a deep and interesting glen, at the head of a long narrow creek running up from Courtmacsherry bay on the southern coast; and is a constabulary police station. A fair is held on Nov. 22nd, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel, belonging to the district of Rathclarin. The environs are very interesting; the sides of the hills are richly wooded, and there are some remains of an ancient castle.

KILBRODERAN, a parish, in the union of Rathkeale, partly in the barony of Lower Connello, but chiefly in that of Shanid, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 4 miles (N. W.) from Rathkeale, on the road to Shanagolden; containing 869 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the western bank of the river Deel, over which is a good bridge called Newbridge, built in 1747, when the road was first constructed. It comprises 2901 statute acres; about one-half is under tillage, and the remainder principally in large dairy-farms, but in many parts the soil is so stony that its cultivation is much impeded. The substratum is limestone rock, in some places rising above the surface and in others scattered in large detached masses. Newbridge is about two miles from Rathkeale, and the same distance from Askeaton. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop; but on the demise of the present incumbent it will merge in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' fund. The tithe rent-charge is £165. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the glebe comprises six acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Coolcappagh, comprising also the parish of Kilcoleman: there is a chapel at Coolcappagh, in this parish; also one in the parish of Kilcoleman. Some picturesque remains of the church still exist, at the foot of Kilbroderan hill; and at Rathgonin are the ruins of the old castle of that name.

KILBROGAN, a parish, in the union of Bandon, barony of Kinnalmeaky, county of Cork, and province of Munster, on the road from Cork to Bandon; containing, with part of the latter borough, 5404 inhabitants. This parish, called also Knockbrogan, is bounded on the south by the river Bandon, and comprises 7578 statute acres: the land is in general of good quality; about one-third is in pasture, principally included in the demesne of the Earl of Bandon. At Lauragh an extensive tract of waste has been brought into cultivation by John Swanton, Esq., who lately introduced the Scottish system of agriculture. Lime brought from Aherlow, six miles distant, and sea-sand from Colliers'-quay, are the chief manures. The prevailing substratum is clay-slate; but there are some good quarries of freestone, which principally supplied the stone of which the chief part of the new town of Bandon is built. The scenery in many parts is pleasingly varied, and there are several gentlemen's seats. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, united from time immemorial to the rectory of Aglish, together forming the union and corps of the prebend of Kilbrogan in the cathedral of St. Finbarr, Cork, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £487. 10. The church is in Bandon: divine service is also performed at Carhue, where a chapel of ease has been erected. The glebe-house is beautifully situated on an eminence surrounded by plantations, and the glebe comprises 32¾ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Bandon: the chapel, situated in the old churchyard, is a small plain edifice. —See Bandon.

KILBRONEY, a parish, in the union of Mallow, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 2¼ miles (N. E.) from Buttevant, on the road to Charleville; containing 788 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1876 statute acres: the soil is a fine deep loam, and the land is mostly in pasture; the small portion of bog is now nearly exhausted. Kilbroney is in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in J. Watkins, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Buttevant: the tithe rent-charge is £144. 9., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the place forms part of the union or district of Buttevant. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground; and at Ballinguile are the remains of the castle of that name, and of an ancient mansion of the Fitzjames family.

KILBRONEY, a parish, in the union of Kilkeel, barony of Upper Iveagh, county of Down, and province of Ulster, on the road from Newry to Kilkeel; containing, with the town of Rosstrevor, 4540 inhabitants. It comprises 13,208¼ statute acres, of which 275 are woodland, about 5000 arable, and the remainder bog and mountain, the latter of which affords excellent pasture. Here are some large bleach-greens, and some lead-mines. The principal seats are the Lodge, Brandensburg, Carpenham, Green Park, Amos Vale, Ballyedmund, Old Hall, and Crayfield. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dromore, and in the gift of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £116. 10., one-third payable to the vicar, and two-thirds to the bishop. The church, which is in Rosstrevor, is a handsome cruciform edifice, with a lofty tower and pinnacles: it was built in 1819, at an expense of £2000, of which the Board of First Fruits gave £200 and lent £1100. The Board also granted £450 as a gift, and £120 as a loan, for the erection of the glebe-house, in 1821: the glebe comprises $7\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains two chapels, one in Rosstrevor, the other at Killowen. There are several national and other schools. On the acclivity of a mountain is a very large stone, called Cloughmerne, which was formerly part of a cromlech; and near Killowen are the ruins of Green Castle: this fortress was built by Walter de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, destroyed by the Irish in 1343, rebuilt soon after on a large scale, and dismantled by order of Cromwell. In the parish are also the remains of Castle Roe, or Rosstrevor Castle. On the Hillstown road are the ruins of Kilbroney church, in which a clogh-ban, or "white bell," was some years since discovered; also an ancient stone cross and a holy well. In 1834 a spacious cave was discovered, containing broken urns filled with calcined human bones and ashes. A chalybeate spring was formerly much resorted to, but is now almost neglected.—See Rosstrevor.

KILBRYAN.—See Kilbrine.

KILBURNE, a parish, in the barony of Middlethird, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Waterford; containing 905 inhabitants. It comprises 3515 statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, and partly forms a portion of the corps of the deanery, and partly of the precentorship, of the cathedral of Waterford: the tithe rent-charge is £115. 3., of which £90. 19. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the precentor.

KILCAR, or Kilkaragh, a parish, in the union of Glenties, barony of Bannagh, county of Donegal, and province of Ulster, 5 miles (W.) from Killybegs; containing 4969 inhabitants. St. Carthach, whose festival is kept on the 5th of March, is supposed to have presided over a monastery here so early as 540. The parish comprises 18,883 statute acres, about one-sixth of which only is arable, the remainder bog and mountain land: agriculture is in a very backward state. Fairs are held eight times in the year, for cattle, yarn, and flannel. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £93. 15. The church is a small handsome building, erected in 1828, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built at the same time, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £450 from the Board; there is a glebe of 1282 statute acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a large chapel. The parochial school is endowed with a grant from Col. Robertson's fund; there are five other schools, and a dispensary.

KILCARAGH, a parish, in the barony of Gualtier, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Waterford, and on the river Suir; containing 170 inhabitants. It comprises 650 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, forming part of the corps of the deanery: the tithe rent-charge is £22. 11. 6.

KILCARN, a parish, in the union of Navan, barony of Skreen, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Navan, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Enniskillen; containing 600 inhabitants. It comprises 2337 statute acres, of which about two-thirds are under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. There are some considerable corn and flour mills; and the river Boyne, upon which the parish is situated, affords facility of conveyance. The principal seats are Kilcarn House, Kilcarn Lodge, and Upper Kilcarn. The parish is a chapelry, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Skreen, or Skryne; the rectory is impropriate in C. Barry, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £95. 14., the whole payable to the impropriator. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcarn forms part of the district of Athlumney: the original chapel, an old building, has been converted into a school-house; and a chapel has been built adjoining the residence of the parish priest.

KILCARRAGH, a parish, in the union of Listowel, barony of Clanmaurice, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 5 miles (S. W.) from Listowel, and on the rivers Brick and Feale; containing 1250 inhabitants. It comprises 2911 statute acres, of which $1280\frac{1}{2}$ consist of good arable land, $891\frac{1}{2}$ of coarse pasture, and about 740 of bog. Limestone abounds, and in some places approaches to marble; it is generally burnt for manure, for which purpose sea-sand brought from Cashen ferry is also used: the state of agriculture is gradually improving. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of William M. Hickson, Esq.; it is held by faculty with the vicarage of Duagh. The tithe rent-charge is £70; and there is a glebe of $12\frac{1}{2}$ acres, subject to a rent of about one guinea per acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Lixnaw, which see.

KILCASH, a parish, in the union of Carrick-on-Suir, barony of Iffa and Offa East, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Clonmel; containing 1260 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 3754 statute acres, is on the southern side of Slieve na Man, and contains an ancient seat of the Ormonde family. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, united episcopally, in 1813, to the vicarages of Killaloan, Templethay, and Kilgrant, and in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £85, of which £34. 12. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the vicarial benefice is £200. 6. 6. The church was erected in 1827, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house: the glebe here comprises 8*a.* 2*r.* 17*p.*, and there is also one of 3*a.* 1*r.* 30*p.* in Kilgrant. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Gammonsfield, or Kilcash, and has a chapel at Ballypatrick.

KILCASKIN, a parish, in the unions of BANTRY and KENMARE, partly in the barony of GLANEROUGH, county of KERRY, but chiefly in that of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. E.) from Castletown; containing 6780 inhabitants. This parish, which extends for more than ten miles along the shore of Bantry bay, comprises 51,491 statute acres. The greater portion is wild and mountainous, and not more than one-sixth is under cultivation; several of the mountains afford pasture on their sides and summits, but others are rocky and barren. The loftiest is Hungry hill, 2160 feet above the level of the sea, and remarkable for its singular waterfall, which, descending from a height of nearly 800 feet and frequently broken by ledges of projecting rock, forms a magnificent and beautiful cascade; the water issues from a lake near the summit, and after its descent passes by Ardrigoole and falls into the bay. Seven miles to the east of this mountain is the larger Sugar Loaf, which is 1112 feet high; and of the other mountains in this parish, the principal are the Knocknafouka and the Esk: along their summits runs the boundary line between the counties of Cork and Kerry. In this parish is also part of the romantic and celebrated district of Glengariff, comprising the scene of a hard-fought battle between the English forces under Sir C. Wilmot, and the native Irish under the Prince of Bear and Bantry, the latter of whom were defeated with great loss. [A more detailed description of Glengariff is given in the article on Kilmacomogue.] The principal seats are, The Lodge, the handsome residence of the Earl of Bantry; Reemeen Cottage; and Reen Lodge. There is an extensive slate-quarry at Roosk, close to the sea-shore. Iron and copper ore abound in various parts of the parish, but neither is at present worked: the iron-ore was formerly very extensively procured, and large smelting-works were carried on at Glengariff and Ardrigoole; of the latter, very considerable remains exist, forming an interesting feature on the banks of the river. There are constabulary police stations at Ardrigoole and Glengariff, and a coast-guard station also at the latter place, forming part of the district of Castletown. A manorial court is held at Ardrigoole every third Thursday, for the recovery of debts under 40*s.*

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, the rectory till lately constituting part of the union and corps of the archdeaconry of Ross: the tithe rent-charge is £285. The church is a small edifice with a low square tower, situated at the base of the rugged mountain of Ardrigoole; it was built in 1810, at an expense of £500, a gift from the late Board of First Fruits, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £190 towards its repair. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is in the diocese of Kerry, and is the head of a union or district, comprising also Bunnane; there are three chapels, situated respectively at Massmount near Ardrigoole, Glengariff, and Bunnane. At Daraheen-Dharmuda a battle was fought between O'Sullivan Bear and O'Donovan, in which the latter was slain. The ruins of the old church are situated in a deep recess in the mountains, one mile north-east from Ardrigoole: at Drumlav is a very perfect fort; at Croho is a second of much greater dimensions, and there are others in various parts of the parish. At Leitrimbeg and Leitrimmore are two Gollanes, or upright stones, but without any inscription; and several more are to be seen in the same district. At Dereencharrin, on a hill near the public road to Glengariff, are prodigious piles of large stones, heaped together in great confusion, and called in the Irish language "Carrans."

KILCATERN, or KILCATEERIN, a parish, in the union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Castletown; containing 6940 inhabitants. This parish comprises 21,778 statute acres, of which more than three-fourths are bog and mountain; it rises into mountains near the Kenmare river, and on the north-west has a capacious bay, called Kilcateerin or Quoilah bay. The valleys are moderately well cultivated, chiefly by spade husbandry; the mountains are generally bare, but afford good summer pasture. A new road from Castletown to the mines of Allihies has been opened in the vicinity of the parish, and other improvements are contemplated; a constabulary police station has been established. The parish is in the diocese of Ross: the rectory is partly impropriate in Lord Riversdale, and partly appropriate to the vicarage, which forms part of the union of Kilaconenagh. The tithe rent-charge is £145, of which £48. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. Divine service is performed at Allihies, in a house licensed by the bishop. The Roman Catholic parish is in the diocese of Kerry, and is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a small plain building near Quoilah bay. Near the bay, also, are the remains of the old church; and not far distant is a very high erect stone, called a Gollane or Long stone.

KILCAVAN, or KILKEVAN, a parish, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 11½ miles (S. W.) from Wexford, on the new road to Bannow; containing 768 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by St. George's Channel, and comprises 3204½ statute acres, almost entirely under tillage; the system of agriculture has been greatly improved within the last few years, and from the convenience of the situation of the parish for obtaining seamanure, the land is generally in a good state of cultivation. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, episcopally united, in 1806, to the vicarage of Bannow, together forming the union of Kilcavan, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £108. 10., and of the whole union of the incumbent £212. 18. 6. The church, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £190, is a neat edifice with a square tower, erected in 1820; the late Board of First Fruits gave £600, and lent £130, towards the expense. The same Board also gave, in 1821, £400, and lent £330, for the erection of the glebe-house, in Bannow: the glebe, in four portions, comprises 4½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Bannow, or Ballymitty. At Granstown is a convent of Augustine friars, representing the ancient house of Clonmines, and to which is attached a chapel, open to the public; the establishment consists of two brethren, employed in preparing pupils for the college of Maynooth, and in this seminary the late eminent Dr. Doyle received the rudiments of his education. There is a dispensary.

KILCHRIST, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Clonderlaw, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Kildysart, and on the western bank of the river Fergus; containing, with the island of Innismore, or Deer Island, 2974 inhabitants. This parish comprises 7061½ statute acres, mostly under tillage; there is a large extent of bog. Sea-weed and sand procured on the shores of the Fergus are used for manure. Grain and other agricultural produce are occasionally sent in boats to Limerick from Ballycorick. The principal seats are, Paradise, beautifully situated on the Fergus, of which, and of the surrounding scenery, it commands a most extensive view; and Fort Fergus. On an eminence in the demesne of Paradise was an ornamental building, called the Temple, which formed a conspicuous landmark in the navigation of the river; but it has been taken down. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is partly impropriate in the family of Wyndham, and partly in Bindon Scott, Esq.; the vicarage forms part of the union of Kildysart. The tithe rent-charge is £189. 10. 6., of which £79. 1. 9. are payable to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clondegad: the chapel, at Knockboy, is a small building. The ruins of the ancient church still remain, in the burial-ground.—See Ballinacally and Deer Island.

KILCHRIST, or Kilcriest, a parish, in the union of Loughrea, partly in the barony of Dunkellin, but chiefly in that of Loughrea, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Loughrea, on the road from that place to Gort; containing 1579 inhabitants. It comprises 3419 statute acres. A baronial court is held once in three weeks. Kilchrist is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, and forms part of the union of Killinane, or Kilthomas; the rectory is partly appropriate to the bishopric, and partly to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £66, of which £14. 5. are payable to the bishop, £2. 5. to the lessee of the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the vicar: the glebe-house of the union is in this parish. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel, lately built, in connexion with which is a school for about 100 children. About 80 children are educated in a public school partly supported by the rector. Here are the remains of a chapel.

KILCLEAGH, or Moate, a parish, in the union of Athlone, barony of Clonlonan, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, on the road from Athlone to Dublin; containing, with the post-town of Moate, 6444 inhabitants. It comprises 15,264 statute acres, and is principally grazing-land; there is a considerable quantity of bog, with abundance of limestone and gritstone. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £207. 5. The church was built in 1782, enlarged by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits in 1819, and lately repaired by a grant of £228 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was purchased in 1819, by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board: the glebe comprises 86 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the diocese of Ardagh: part of it forms the district of Moate, in which are two chapels, one there and one at Bogagh; the other, with the parish of Lemanaghan, constitutes that of Ballymahown, in which also are two chapels, one of them at Ballymahown, in this parish. There is also a meeting-house for the Society of Friends. Near Farnagh are the ruins of the castle of Clonlonan, which gave name to the barony.—See Moate.

KILCLEEHEEN.—See Kilculliheen.

KILCLIEF, a parish, in the union of Downpatrick, barony of Lecale, county of Down, and province of Ulster, 2 miles (S.) from Strangford; containing 1121 inhabitants. Here was formerly an abbey under St. Eugene and St. Neill, disciples of St. Patrick; also an hospital for lepers, of which there are still some small remains. The castle of Kilclief, of which also part remains, was anciently the palace of the bishops of Down, to whom the manor belongs. The parish contains 2424½ statute acres: there is no waste or bog, and the land is extremely well cultivated, furnishing much wheat, barley, oats, and potatoes for exportation. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £162. The church is a small plain building, on an elevated spot near the sea-shore, erected at a cost of £506, of which £435 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which £400 were given and £50 lent, in 1816, by the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 10 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, including also the townland of Ballyargan and two others in Ballyculter, and containing a small chapel. The parochial school was built in 1804.

KILCLOAN, a parish, in the union of Dunshaughlin, barony of Upper Deece, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (N. E.) from Kilcock, and on the road from Summerhill to Dunboyne; containing 267 inhabitants. It comprises 2717 statute acres, of partly good, and partly middling land. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and forms part of the union of Raddonstown: the tithe rent-charge is £83. 1. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Batterstown, comprising Kilcloan, Raddonstown, Ballymaglasson, Rathregan, Balfeighan, and Moyglare, and containing three chapels; that of Kilcloan is a neat modern building. Here is Mulhussey Castle.

KILCLOGHAN.—See Templetown.

KILCLOGHER.—See Clogher, county Louth.

KILCLONAGH, a parish, in the union of Thurles, barony of Eliogarty, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Templemore; containing 179 inhabitants. This parish comprises only 759 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and forms part of the union of Moyne: the tithe rent-charge is £48. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish is part of the union or district of Moyne.

KILCLONBROOK, or Cremorgan, a parish, in the union of Abbeyleix, barony of Cullinagh, Queen's county, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Stradbally, on the road from that place to Abbeyleix; containing about 84 inhabitants.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, and patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £28. 11. 9. There is neither church nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Stradbally.

KILCLONFERT, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of LOWER PHILIPSTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Philipstown, on the road from that place to Kilbeggan; containing 1835 inhabitants. This parish comprises 10,266¼ statute acres; above 3000 acres are arable, above 4000 meadow and pasture, about 100 woodland, and 2600 bog. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare: the rectory is in the patronage of the representatives of F. Trench, Esq.; the vicarage, which was lately suppressed, was in the gift of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £186. 18. 6., of which £124. 17. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither church nor glebe-house: the occasional duty is performed by the incumbent of Killaderry. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Philipstown, and contains a chapel.

KILCLOONY, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of CLONMACNOON, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the river Suck and on the road from Dublin to Galway; containing, with part of the post-town of Ballinasloe, 7248 inhabitants. The English army encamped here for three days previously to the celebrated battle of Aughrim, during which this was the scene of much sanguinary conflict, the memory whereof is perpetuated in the names of several places in its immediate vicinity. The bridge over the small stream which separates the parish from Aughrim is still called the Bridge of Millea Chean, or "The Thousand Heads," from the numbers that fell here; and there are two other passes where much carnage took place before the Irish outposts were driven across the stream and morass upon their main army: one is called Barna Chaugh, or "The Gap of Grief," and the other Craugh, or "The place of Sorrowing." The parish is close on the confines of Roscommon, and comprises 7289 statute acres, of which about 1736 are waste and bog: the Grand Canal from Dublin terminates at the town of Ballinasloe. The principal seats are, Garbally Park, the residence of the Earl of Clancarty; Macnee; Cahir; Kelly's Grove; Persse Park; Nutley; and Grange. The parish is in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is partly appropriate to the see and to the deanery, and partly united with the vicarage, which forms a portion of the union of Creagh. The tithe rent-charge is £94. 8. The church, in Ballinasloe, is a plain cruciform structure with a lofty octagonal spire, built in 1790, and enlarged in 1825 at a cost of £1200, being a loan from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballinasloe; the chapel is a neat edifice, built by subscription. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A chalybeate spa, issuing from the bog at Poolboy, has been inclosed by the Earl of Clancarty, who has built a handsome room over it.—See BALLINASLOE.

KILCLUNEY, or KILCLOONEY, a district parish, partly in the barony of LOWER ORIOR, but chiefly in that of LOWER FEWS, union and county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER; including part of the town of Markethill, on the road from Newry to Armagh; and containing 8079 inhabitants. It was constituted in 1792, by disuniting 22 townlands from the parish of Mullaghbrack, and comprises 12,833¾ statute acres, of which 3109 are heath and bog, and the remainder in a high state of cultivation. At Carricklane is a quarry of good clay-slate, from which was raised the stone for building Gosford Castle: lead-ore has been also found in the parish in considerable quantities. The weaving of linen and cotton cloth is carried on. Kilcluney is in the diocese of Armagh; and on its separation from Mullaghbrack, a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Prebendary of Mullaghbrack, was instituted under the provisions of an act of the 7th of George III.; and a church was built (in 1794) at Glassdrummond, a plain neat edifice, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £500. The glebe-house, towards which the same Board granted £450 as a gift and £50 as a loan, is a handsome building, situated on a glebe of 22 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Lisnadill, or Ballymacnab; the chapel is a large and handsome edifice, at Clady. There are three places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly; one at Redrock, another at Clady, and the third at Ballylane. Of the several public schools, some are aided by donations from the Rev. Dr. Blacker, others by Lords Charlemont and Gosford, and the parochial school by the prebendary and perpetual curate. Some vestiges yet exist of the old church of Kilcluney, burnt in 1641; and also of a bawn, built in 1619 by H. Achison, Esq., and destroyed at the same time. Cairn-amnhanaghan, or "The Vicar's Cairn," which is noticed more particularly under the head of Mullaghbrack, is in this district.

KILCOAN, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER; containing 555 inhabitants, and 1583 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, episcopally united in 1779 to Kilbride, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £84. 16. 6., and of the whole union £118. 16. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcoan forms part of the district of Slieruagh.

KILCOAN, WEXFORD.—See KILCOWAN.

KILCOCK, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of IKEATHY and OUGHTERANY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 10½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Trim, and 15 miles (W.) from Dublin, on the road to Galway; containing 1974 inhabitants, of whom 1327 are in the town. This place, which is said to have derived its name from an ancient church or monastery dedicated to St. Cocha, is situated on a stream called the Rye Water, which here forms the boundary of the county. The town extends into the parish of Raddonstown, barony of Upper Deece, county of Meath, and contains altogether 1537 inhabitants; it consists of several small streets diverging from the market-square, and has 306 houses, irregularly built, but a few of which are of respectable appearance. The inhabitants are amply supplied with excellent water from springs, and coal is brought down the Royal Canal, which passes by the town, as does the railway from Dublin to Mullingar. Races are annually held on the adjacent common for three or four days, and are well attended. A large distillery and brewery have been established here. The market, which is toll-free, is on Wednesday, and is abundantly supplied with corn and potatoes, great quantities of which are purchased, and sent by the canal to Dublin. The original fairs, chiefly for cattle, sheep, and pigs, are on March 25th, May 11th, Aug. 11th, and Sept. 29th; and additional fairs have been established on Feb. 4th, July 14th, Oct. 22nd, Nov. 24th, and Dec. 13th. Here is a constabulary police station. The parish comprises 4064 statute acres, chiefly rich pasture land, appropriated to the fattening of stock for the Dublin market, and for exportation; what little is under tillage is cultivated on the improved system, and is very productive. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and within the parish are the houses of Courtown and Laragh, both situated in demesnes richly wooded. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, united to the vicarages of Hortland and Cloncurry and the rectory of Downings, forming the union of Kilcock, in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Trimlestown, and Joseph Walker, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £126, of which £52. 10. are payable to the vicar; and the rent-charge of the entire union payable to the incumbent is £294. 11.: the glebe of the union comprises 10½ acres; there is no glebe-house. The church has been rebuilt at a cost of £798, whereof £698 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Cloncurry, Hortland, and Clonshamboe; there is a chapel in the town, and also one at Newtown.

KILCOCKAN, a parish, in the union of LISMORE, barony of COSHBRIDE, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (E. S. E) from Tallow, and on the river Blackwater; containing 1420 inhabitants. It comprises 4538 statute acres, and includes the modern castle of Strancally, the seat of the proprietor of the parish, a large Gothic building, in a richly planted demesne of above 1000 acres. The parish is in the diocese of Lismore; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire and J. Keily, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Templemichael. The tithe rent-charge is £177. 3., of which £51. 18. 6. are payable to each of the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcockan forms part of the district of Templemichael, also called Knockanore, or Kilwatermoy, and has a chapel recently erected. Here are the ruins of the ancient castle of Strancally, which formerly belonged to the earls of Desmond, and after its forfeiture by that family was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Walter Raleigh, by whom it was assigned to the Earl of Cork. This castle appears to have been partially demolished with gunpowder a long time since, and was recently struck by lightning, which caused a large portion of it to fall into the Blackwater.

KILCOE, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, Western division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Skibbereen; on the river Roaring Water, and the road to Rock Island; containing 2339 inhabitants. It comprises 5272 statute acres. The surface is rocky and uneven, and not more than one-third is in cultivation; the remainder consists of bare rocks of clay-slate, intermixed with small tracts of bog. The land under tillage is chiefly in patches amidst the rocks, and is generally cultivated by the spade; the manure is brought to it on the backs of horses, and the produce carried off in the same manner. Some of the higher grounds afford tolerable pasturage for young cattle. The scenery is for the most part wild, and marked with features of rugged grandeur; but the glen here, through which the river rushes with furious impetuosity, forming numerous cataracts in its progress to the bay to which it gives name, abounds with young and thriving plantations, and is finely contrasted with the sterility around it. In this romantic glen have been erected mills, corn-stores, and quays, on the banks of the river. Two manorial courts are held monthly, by the seneschals of the bishop of Ross and Thomas Hungerford, Esq., respectively. The parish is in the diocese of Ross: the rectory is partly impropriate in Lord Riversdale, and partly constitutes a portion of the income of the vicar; the vicarage is united with that of Cape Clear, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of Kilcoe is £225. The church, a small edifice, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits, in 1830, gave £650, is nearly in the centre of the parish. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcoe forms part of the district of Aghadown: the chapel is a large edifice, situated near the Roaring Water. On a point of land at the head of Roaring-Water bay are the extensive remains of Kilcoe Castle, built by the M'Cartys, lords of Clandermot, and now consisting principally of a large massive square tower, with a small turret; at no great distance, close to the shore, are the ruins of the old parish church. Several swords and spear-heads of bronze were found in 1825, by some labourers quarrying stone; they were all in good preservation.

KILCOLA, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of FRENCHPARK, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Frenchpark, on the road from that place to Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 2784 inhabitants. It comprises 7217¼ statute acres, of which about one-tenth is bog, and the remainder arable or pasture land. The parish is in the diocese of Elphin: the rectory was till lately part of the union of Shankill and corps of the precentorship of Elphin; the vicarage is part of the union of Easter-Snow. The tithe rent-charge is £48. 2., and is equally divided between the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcola is included in the district of Croghan and Ballynameen, also called Killucan, and has a chapel at Ballynameen.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, in the barony of BARRETTS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 9½ miles (W. by N.) from Cork, on the road to Killarney, and on the river Dripsey; the population is returned with Magourney, the boundary between the two parishes being now unknown. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, forming part of the union of Magourney. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Aghabologue.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, partly in the barony of MAGONIHY, but chiefly in that of TRUGHENACKMY, union of KILLARNEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, on the mail-road to Cahirciveen; containing, with the post-town of Milltown, 4745 inhabitants. In the reign of Henry III., Geoffry de Mauriscis founded a priory at Killagh, in this parish, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated it to the Blessed Virgin: the abbot was a lord of parliament. It was endowed with large possessions in several parts of the county, which, together with the site, were at the Dissolution granted to Captain Spring, but were forfeited by him after the wars of 1641. The abbey now forms part of the estate of Sir William Duncan Godfrey, Bart., to whose ancestor, Major Godfrey, the lands of Kilcoleman and the contiguous parishes of Killorglin, Kiltalla, and Kilgarrilander, were granted by Charles II. on his restoration, when several English families settled here, some of whose descendants still remain. The PARISH, which is bounded on the north by the river Maine, and on the west by the harbour of Castlemaine, comprises 7758 statute acres, of which 6803 consist of arable and pasture land, 745 of bog, and 210 of woodland. The soil is mostly a heavy clay; it produces good crops of grain and potatoes, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving. The principal seat is Kilcoleman Abbey, the residence of Sir W. D. Godfrey, which has been remodelled in the Elizabethan style, and is surrounded by an extensive and finely wooded demesne. Attached to the demesne is a neat cottage, called Fort Agnes, built on the edge of a circular hollow surrounded by a Danish moat or rath.

The living is a perpetual cure, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the representatives of Lord Glandore; the rectory is impropriate in the Hon. and Rev. F. Mullins, to whose lessees the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £242. 6., is entirely payable, and who allows a stipend to the curate. The church, at Milltown, is a neat edifice, with a lofty square tower surmounted by octangular pinnacles; it was erected in 1822, on a site presented by Sir John Godfrey, by aid of two loans of £900 and £100 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built about the same period, the Board granting £450 as a gift, and £50 as a loan; the glebe comprises eight acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Milltown, where the principal chapel is situated. Of the abbey, which was a building of considerable size and strength, and constructed of a kind of dark marble, the walls and the noble east window are still nearly entire, and, from the style of the architecture, appear to be of a more recent date than that of the original foundation. Near the abbey are the ruins of the old church, with a burial-ground attached, which is still used. Besides the fort already mentioned there are several others, commonly called "Danish" forts.—See MILLTOWN.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, in the poor-law union of PARSONSTOWN, partly in the barony of BALLYBRITT, but chiefly in that of CLONLISK, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Parsonstown, on the road to Roscrea; containing 9285 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from a religious house founded here in the 6th century by St. Colman, son of Ængus, King of Munster, and which subsequently became the parish church; the walls are yet standing. It comprises 8202¾ statute acres, principally under tillage; the surface is undulated, and the soil a light porous limestone. The seats are, Sharavogue, a spacious mansion in an improved demesne; Ballyegan, also in a well-planted demesne; and Rathmore. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe: the former constituted part of the union of Parsonstown, but has been lately separated from it; the latter is still part of the union of Ettagh. The tithe rent-charge is £143. 10.: the glebe consists of 20 acres. A church was built by subscription in 1845; also a curate's house; the two at the cost of £900. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united to that of Ettagh; in each is a chapel. Remains exist of several old castles and towers.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, Shanid division of LOWER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (S. W.) from Shanagolden, on the road to Newcastle; containing 759 inhabitants. It comprises 2762 statute acres; more than three-fourths of the land are mountain pasture, in some places occupied by loose fibrous turbary, and the remainder is under tillage. The system of agriculture is improved, and there is little waste land but what might be reclaimed at a trifling expense. Great numbers of young cattle are reared in the mountain pastures. Limestone abounds, and the more elevated parts are of the coal formation. The living was a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop; but on the death of the late incumbent in 1845, it lapsed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who pay a curate £10 a year for the occasional duties: the tithe rent-charge is £52. 10. There is neither church nor glebe-house; the former was destroyed in the war of 1641, and has not been rebuilt: the glebe comprises 3 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Coolcappagh; the chapel is a small modern edifice. Near it are the remains of Castle-Egney, consisting of one slender square tower; and in the immediate neighbourhood are the remains of several others.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, in the union of BALLINROBE, barony of CLANMORRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Ballinrobe to Castlerea; containing, with the market and post town of Clare, 9451 inhabitants. A Carmelite friary was founded here in the 13th century by the Prendergast family, and at the Dissolution was granted to Sir John King. The parish comprises 23,739½ statute acres: above one-third is arable, one-fourth pasture, and the remainder waste and bog; limestone is plentiful. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £228. 9. The church is in Clare; it was erected in 1828, by a gift of £900, and a loan of £1000, from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe consists of 9 acres, with a glebe-house built in 1826, at a cost of £1000, partly a gift, but chiefly a loan, from the same Board. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are chapels at Clare and Barnycarrol, and in the ancient abbey of Ballinasmale are a few monks, who perform divine service regularly. At Clare, also, is a meeting-house for Wesleyan Methodists. Here are several schools, to one of which Mrs. Browne, of Claremount, contributes £10; and to another some gentlemen in the neighbourhood subscribe £8; annually. —See CLARE or CLARE-MORRIS.

KILCOLEMAN, a parish, in the union of CASTLEREA, partly in the barony of COOLAVIN, county of SLIGO, but chiefly in that of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the mail-coach road from Longford to Ballina; containing, with the market and post town of Ballaghadireen, 6655 inhabitants. It comprises 18,093¼ statute acres, of which 5880 are bog; the land is of various, but mostly of very inferior, quality, and the system of agriculture unimproved. Limestone is scarce, but there are some quarries of freestone of good quality. The seats are, Edmondstown, the residence of the Costello family; Clogher; and Coolavin House. The parish is in the diocese of Achonry; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Dillon, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Castlemore: the tithe rent-charge is £142. 10., payable in moieties to the impropriator and the vicar. The church, in Ballaghadireen, is a small building, serving for the vicarial union; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £110 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Castlemore, and containing chapels at Ballaghadireen and Cragaduff. There are various public schools, some of which are aided by donations from Lord Dillon, Mr. Holmes, and the incumbent. Some remains exist of the old parish church.

KILCOLEMAN, CORK.—See DONERAILE.

KILCOLEMANBANE, a parish, partly in the barony of CULLINAGH, but chiefly in that of MARYBOROUGH EAST, union of MOUNTMELLICK, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. S. E.) from Maryborough, on the road from that place to Ballinakill; containing 962 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3693¼ statute acres: the land is of a middling quality. The seats are Sheffield, Woodville, and Rathleague. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and forms part of the union of Maryborough: the tithe rent-charge is £120. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilcolemanbane is in the district of Maryborough.

KILCOLGAN, a parish, in the barony of DUNKELLIN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Oranmore, on the road from that place to Ardrahan; containing 1359 inhabitants. An abbey is said to have been founded here in 580, over which St. Colgan presided. The parish comprises 5548½ statute acres; the land is of a light limestone soil, with a large portion of rocky ground. An inlet of the bay of Galway extends up to Kilcolgan, and is navigable for small boats; large quantities of sea-weed are collected for manure. A receiving-house for letters here is in connexion with Ardrahan. Tyrone is the seat of the St. George family. The living is a vicarage in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, episcopally united, about 1735, to the vicarages of Kinvarra, Stradbally, Killeely, Killeny, Dromacoo, Killineen, Killenavara, Duras, Kilcooly, and Bullane, together forming the union of Kilcolgan, in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory of Kilcolgan is appropriate partly to the see, and partly to the prebend of Kinvarra in the cathedral of Kilmacduagh. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £141. 15., of which £39. 7. 6. are payable to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice, payable to the vicar, is £241. 14. 6. The church, built upwards of a century ago, was repaired in 1820 by parochial assessment. The glebe-house was erected in 1820, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £190 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe of the union consists of 28¾ acres.

KILCOLLUM, or KILCOLM, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Waterford, and on the river Barrow; containing 2407 inhabitants. This parish comprises 8274 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Ossory; the rectory is impropriate in Sir Ellis Leighton, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Dunkit. The tithe rent-charge is £360, of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator and one-third to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcollum forms part of the district of Slieruagh.

KILCOLMANBRACK, an ancient parish, in the union of MOUNTMELLICK, barony of CULLINAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER; containing 67 inhabitants, and 905¾ statute acres.

KILCOMAN, a parish, in the union of ROSCREA, barony of CLONLISK, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, ¾ of a mile (N. W.) from Shinrone, and on the river Brosna; containing 1552 inhabitants. St. Cumin, who died in 668, founded an abbey here of which there are still some remains. The parish comprises 3583 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Killaloe, and forms part of the union of Shinrone: the tithe rent-charge is £117. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilcoman is included in the union or district of Shinrone.

KILCOMB, a parish, in the union of GOREY, barony of SCARAWALSH, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Gorey; containing 1170 inhabitants. It comprises 5441 statute acres, chiefly in tillage. Here is Camolin Park. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and the rectory forms part of the union and prebend of Tomb in the cathedral of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge is £153. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Ferns, and has a chapel at Ballyduff.

KILCOMENTY, or BALLINAHINCH, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of OWNEY and ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Newport, and on the mail-coach road from Nenagh to Limerick; containing 2892 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the Shannon, comprises 6943 statute acres; about 400 are waste and bog, and the remainder profitable arable and pasture land in a good state of cultivation. The soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improved; limestone is quarried extensively for agricultural purposes and for building, and marl and sand are also used for manure. The scenery is strikingly bold and varied, comprising a chain of mountains to the south-east of the parish, among which the lofty Keeper is conspicuous, rising 2265 feet above the sea: the principal seats are Bird Hill, Cragg, and Parteen. Communication is afforded by the canal to Dublin, and numerous rivulets issuing from the mountains intersect the parish. A constabulary police force is stationed here. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Kilnerath, or St. John's, Newport: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions also Kilcomenty is included in the union or district of Kilnerath, or Ballinahinch; the chapel is at Bird Hill, at which place a national school has been also established. At Cragg are the ruins of an ancient church and castle; and there are some Danish raths in the parish, used as places of interment. Philip of Worcester, chief governor of Ireland in 1184, founded here a priory, which he dedicated to St. Philip, St. James, and St. Cumin; and placed in it Benedictine monks from the abbey of Glastonbury, in Somersetshire.

KILCOMMICK, a parish, in the union of Longford, partly in the barony of Shruel, partly in that of Moydow, but chiefly in that of Rathcline, county of Longford, and province of Leinster, 3¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ballymahon, on the road from that place to Longford; containing 3644 inhabitants. It comprises 11,871½ statute acres: there is much bog; also some limestone containing shells and susceptible of a high polish. The Royal Canal runs through the southern part of the parish. Near Mosstown is a flour-mill. The principal seats are Mosstown, Lisglassick, Ledwithstown, Lislea, and Glanmore: Mosstown was defended by the Newcomens in 1641, but was obliged to capitulate; it was also garrisoned for King William by the same family, and was unsuccessfully besieged by James's forces. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and patronage of the bishop of Tuam: the tithe rent-charge is £207. 15. The glebe-house was built in 1827, by a gift of £100, and a loan of £700, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of 214 acres. The church, at Kenagh, was erected in 1832, by the Countess Dowager of Rosse, at an expense of £2500. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called Clough; there is a chapel, and divine service is also performed in a private house. At Kenagh is a Primitive Methodist meeting-house. To one of two schools the Countess of Rosse gives £15 per annum, besides a house and three acres of land; and to the other, £14 per annum. Several raths and the ruins of the old church remain; and at Ballynock and Mosstown are two dilapidated castles.—See Kenagh.

KILCOMMIN, county Mayo.—See Kilcummin.

KILCOMMON, a parish, in the union of Ballina, barony of Erris, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught; containing, with the sea-port and post town of Belmullet, 17,000 inhabitants. This very extensive parish, which includes the harbour of Broadhaven, comprises 203,396 statute acres. The surface is mountainous, with large tracts of bog: between the mountains are deep valleys, which are productive; but towards the sea the lands are very bleak, and exposed to the western blasts, by which the crops are frequently destroyed. The mountain soils might be easily reclaimed by the use of a silicious marly gravel which is found in various parts of the parish, but agriculture is in a very backward state; spade husbandry is generally prevalent. Limestone abounds in the eastern portion of the parish, and there are some quarries of flagstone, which is used for building; iron-ore of good quality is found in abundance, and some mines were opened and a furnace for smelting the ore was erected by Sir Arthur Shean, but from the great expense of procuring fuel, the works were discontinued. The scenery of the interior is wild and romantic, abounding with features of rugged grandeur: the mountains, of which that called Shenachabine, or John Cabine, is 927 feet above the level of the sea, and abounds with grouse and other game, form a vast amphitheatre from north-west to south-east; and nearly in the centre of the parish is Lough Curramore, 8 miles in circumference, and abounding with salmon and trout. The principal seats are, Enver, Rossport House, Rimoe, Bangor Lodge, and Croy Lodge. Monthly fairs are held at Belmullet (which see); and there are fairs at Bangor on the 20th of Jan., Feb., March, April, and July, the 11th of June, August, and Dec., 10th of May, 8th of Sept., and 16th of Oct. and Nov., for cattle, sheep, pigs, and yarn.

The principal rivers are, the Owenmore, which enters the parish near the bridge of Carrick, and falls into the bay of Tulloghane at Goolamore, and on which is a valuable salmon-fishery; the Munshine, which issues from Lough Curramore, and falls into the Owenmore; the Glenamory, which falls into the harbour of Broadhaven, and is also celebrated for its salmon; and the river Greyhound, so called from the rapidity of its current. The shore is extremely bold, rising in perpendicular cliffs of great height, perforated in some parts with immense caverns, one of which is 700 feet high at the entrance. The harbour of Broadhaven is separated from Blacksod bay by an isthmus 200 yards wide connecting the peninsula of the Mullet with the main land, and is 6¾ miles long from the entrance, which is ¾ of a mile wide, to the town of Belmullet. It affords good anchorage, of sufficient depth for any vessels; but there is room only for two large or four small ships to ride in shelter from northerly winds, at half-cable length to the eastward and westward; the anchorage is between two spots of sand, one stretching from Ringtail Head on the west, and the other from Rinishummuck on the east side. To the north-east of the harbour is Binwee Head, 824 feet in height; off which are the stags of Broadhaven, four remarkably high rocks, visible at a great distance, and serving to distinguish this part of the coast, which to Killala bay is clear of rocks and shoals, the shore being mostly steep cliffs indented with small fishing-coves. To the north of the entrance to Broadhaven bay, and also off Binwee Head, is Kid Island, comprising 25¼ acres. It has been in contemplation to cut through the isthmus separating the harbour from Blacksod bay, and to connect these harbours, which are defended from the Atlantic by the breakwater of the Mullet, 15 miles in length; thus opening entrances to Broadhaven both from the north and south, and affording full security to vessels sailing in and out of the bays. Were this done, they would be as safe and commanding as any harbours on the western coast of Ireland.

The whole northern line of coast is characterised by features of striking magnificence: the cliff scenery between Balderig (to which is a branch leading from the new road from Killala to Erris) and Kilgalligan Head is unrivalled for grandeur and beauty, and the intersections and trap-dykes between those places afford highly interesting geological specimens. In rowing along the shore, to the westward of Balderig, is Moista Sound, a remarkable passage, little more than a cable's length from one extremity to the other, and so narrow as to preclude the use of oars. It is bounded on both sides by perpendicular walls of rock, more than 500 feet high; and the space between them was most probably filled by a trap-dyke, the decomposition of which, either from the perishable nature of the material, or from some chymical action, perhaps formed this interesting chasm. Near Port Twiling, a coast-guard station eight miles from Balderig, affording good shelter for boats, is the Natural Arch, 30 feet high, which may be rowed through at half-tide in moderate weather with perfect safety. A key-stone of trap, 12 feet high, extends from the centre of the arch nearly to the summit of the cliff, where it is continued along a hollow, indicating a subsidence of the dyke at some former period, a recurrence of which may probably produce another sound similar to that of Moista; at the eastern extremity of the archway is a perpendicular cliff, 618 feet high. About 1¼ mile from the archway is a headland, remarkable for its beauty and the fanciful contortions of its strata; and about a mile farther to the west is the mouth of Port-a-Clay, an interesting small haven, where is a coast-guard station, with good shelter for boats. Near this is the entrance to a cavern called the Parlour, situated at the northern extremity of the lofty promontory of Doonrinalla: the entrance is through an archway, 30 feet high, and wide enough to allow a boat to be rowed into it; the main branch runs in a direct line, and gradually contracts in width and height, terminating in a fissure 10 or 12 feet high, and probably communicating with another cavern, called the Kitchen, on the south-west side. To the east of the Parlour are immense masses of detached rock lying on an inclined plain. Binwee, or "the Yellow Mountain," rises perpendicularly on its north-west side, and commands from its summit a most extensive and truly magnificent prospect. To the south-west are seen the deeply indented shores of the Mullet, the bays of Blacksod and Broadhaven, with the towering Achill in the distance; to the east are the Stags, the iron-bound range of coast between Binwee and Ben More, the Wedge, and Downpatrick Head, with the Sligo shore and the mountains of Donegal and Arranmore in the distance; to the north is the ocean; and to the south, mountains rising above each other in majestic grandeur. Near Binwee is Renval, and near that are the ruins of an ancient stronghold, of which only the gateway is remaining. At Ross Ferry, or Ross Port, on the south side of Gutta mountain, are huge hills of sand, now covering a tract which, 60 years since, was as fertile as any in the barony. Between Renval and Ross Ferry a gradual subsidence of the land, or an elevation of the level of the sea, seems to have taken place; rocks appear in two places projecting above the surface of the strand, and a ridge of bog rises through the shingle to a level with high-water mark.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £255. The church has been lately rebuilt at a cost of £581, raised by subscription; divine service was previously performed in the court-house at Belmullet, and at a coast-guard station. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 35½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms three districts; Ballycroy, in which is an old thatched building at Cross Hill, used as a chapel; Kilcommon West, in which is a chapel built in 1832, at an expense of £300, by subscription; and Kilcommon East, the chapel of which is at Bangor. At Kiltairn, on the banks of the Owenmore, are the remains of an ancient abbey; at Kilgalligan, the ruins of a monastery; and at Doona, the remains of a castle belonging to the celebrated Grace O'Malley, known by the name of Gran-Uile. Near Pallatomas is an old burial-ground. The parish is rich in minerals, among which are the Greenland pot-stone, the rutil, kyanite, white limestone, felspar, rock-crystal, garnet, micaceous quartz, and other varieties. In the townland of Enver is a Druidical altar, consisting of three upright stones supporting a large flagstone. In January, 1835, a labourer discovered several gold coins in a field on that townland; and shillings of the reigns of the Edwards and Henry VIII. are frequently dug up in various parts. The Rev. W. Maxwell wrote the greater portion of his works at Croy Lodge, the neighbourhood of which was the scene of his Wild Sports of the West.—See BELMULLET.

KILCOMMON, a parish, in the union of BALLINROBE, barony of KILMAINE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Hollymount, 7456 inhabitants. It comprises 17,395¾ statute acres, of which about 400 are woodland and 500 bog. Agriculture is improving; and near Hollymount is a model agricultural school, established by the Mansion-House Relief Committee of 1822: the building and stock cost £3000, but the school, which was built on an acre of land given by Mr. Lindsey, has very few pupils. Limestone is found here. The surrounding country is agreeably diversified, and adorned with numerous well-planted demesnes: among the seats in the parish are Hollymount House, Closecormack House, and Clooney Castle. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, united by act of parliament, in 1703, to the rectories and vicarages of Robeen and Taghkeen, forming the union of Kilcommon or Hollymount, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £254. 15. 6., and of the entire union £488. 5. The old church, which was in Hollymount, was a chapel of ease, built in 1688 by Archbishop Vesey, who was buried in it; and was made the parish church on the church of Kilcommon becoming ruinous. The present church, which is in Robeen parish, was enlarged in 1818, the late Board of First Fruits having granted a loan of £1000; it is a handsome building, with a cast-iron spire, and is fitted up with English oak. The family vault of Lord Clanmorris, and monuments of the Lindsey and Ruttledge families, are in the churchyard. For the erection of the glebe-house, the Board, in 1821, gave £100 and lent £1200: the glebe comprises 8 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising Kilcommon and Robeen, and has two chapels: that at Carra, built in 1830 at an expense of £1200, is a handsome building, with galleries; that at Roundfort has a tall square tower. Of several schools, two were built and are supported by Mr. Lindsey. Here are the remains of some ancient forts; and elks'-horns, coins of Queen Elizabeth's reign, and military weapons have been discovered at different times.—See HOLLYMOUNT.

KILCOMMON, a parish, in the barony of SOUTH BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the post-town of Tinahely, 3479 inhabitants. It comprises 11,209 statute acres of land, mostly in a good state of cultivation, the system of agriculture having been greatly improved under the influence of the Shillelagh Agricultural Society: there are some mountain land and peat-bog. The principal seats are Ballybeg, Rockingham, Town View, and Ballyshonogue: the residence of the parish priest was built by Earl Fitzwilliam. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and is a rectory, forming part of the union and prebend of Crosspatrick in the cathedral of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge is £342. 14. The church, an old but neat building, was enlarged in 1821, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £700. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcommon is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilcommon, Preban, and Kilpipe, and called Killavany and Tinahely: there are chapels at Killavany and Crossbridge, both of which were erected by Earl Fitzwilliam.—See TINAHELY.

KILCOMMON, or KILCOLMAN, a parish, situated in the union of RATHDRUM, partly in the barony of NEWCASTLE, but chiefly in that of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (N. E.) from Rathdrum, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Wexford; containing 972 inhabitants. This parish, in the civil divisions, is regarded as one of the four constablewicks constituting the parish of Wicklow: it comprises 4807¾ statute acres; the land is generally of good quality, and the system of agriculture improving, but there are some tracts of waste and bog in the mountainous parts. It is a chapelry, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Wicklow: the tithe rent-charge is £83. 6. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilcommon forms part of the union or district of Wicklow. The parochial school is aided by Archdeacon Magee, and has a house and an acre of land given by Mr. Bailey, of Ballyarthur. Within a mile of Rathdrum are the ruins of the parish church, and at Ballynakill are the remains of an old castle.

KILCONDUFF, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of GALLEN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Swinford, 7072 inhabitants. It comprises 16,522½ statute acres: the greater part is in tillage, but there are large tracts of bog and mountain land; flagstones are abundant. Pearls are found in the river Moy, and there are chalybeate and sulphureous springs. The principal seat is Brabazon Park, the residence of Sir W. Brabazon, Bart. The parish is in the diocese of Achonry: the rectory is impropriate in W. S. Bourke, Esq.; the vicarage was united episcopally, in 1805, to those of Kilbeagh and Meelick, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £274. 11., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar; and of the entire vicarial union, £302. 17. The church, in Swinford, is a plain building, erected in 1810, when the late Board of First Fruits gave £600, and recently repaired by a grant of £209 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1819, by a gift of £400 and a loan of like amount from the same Board; and has a glebe of 13 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Meelick, and containing a chapel in each. Some of the ruins of Kilconduff and Kinaff churches still exist.—See SWINFORD.

KILCONERAN, a parish, in the union of LOUGHREA, partly in the baronies of ATHENRY and LOUGHREA, but chiefly in that of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Loughrea, on the road from that place to Galway; containing 1552 inhabitants. It comprises 5478 statute acres; the land is of good quality. The parish is in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is appropriate to the bishopric and the deanery, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilconickny. The tithe rent-charge is £105. 2. 6., of which £11. 16. 9. are payable to the bishop, £3. 9. 3. to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house of the union, situated in this parish, was built in 1827, by a gift of £400, and a loan of £344. 10., from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe here contains 27½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilconeran forms part of the district of Carrabawn, or Lickerrig, and contains a chapel. Here are the ruins of Seafin Castle.

KILCONICKNY, a parish, partly in the baronies of ATHENRY and LOUGHREA, but chiefly in that of DUNKELLIN, union of LOUGHREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (W. by N.) from Loughrea, on the road from that place to Galway; containing 2564 inhabitants. It comprises 8352¾ statute acres; the land is of good quality, and limestone is procured for burning. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, episcopally united to the vicarages of Lickerrig, Kiltullagh, and Kilconeran, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the bishopric, the deanery, the prebend of Killaspicmoylan, the rectory of Loughrea, and the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £182. 14., of which £20. 15. 6. are payable to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the vicar is about £214. The church is at Lickerrig: it was built in 1816, by aid of a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £183 for its repair. There is a glebe-house at Kilconeran, and the glebes of the union contain 32½ acres. Some remains of the ancient castle of St. Cleran yet exist.

KILCONLY, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of DUNMORE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5½ miles (N. W.) from Tuam, on the road from that place to Castlebar; containing 3070 inhabitants. The parish comprises 9677½ statute acres; the land is good, with the exception of a large tract of reclaimable bog, and limestone of tolerable quality is abundant. There are meal and flour mills on a large scale. Milburn is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held at the station-house every Friday. The principal seats are Castlegrove, Ironpool, Rockwell, Newborough, Belmont, Ashgrove, and Blindwell. The last-mentioned estate has been in the possession of the Kirwan, or O'Quirivawn, family for many centuries: in 1822, part of the laud suddenly sank, and the abyss was filled with water. Within the demesne are the ruins of a fortress, consisting of a keep, inclosed within four strong walls, with a turret at each corner; the entrance arch is in the Norman style, and in good preservation. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Tuam, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £108. 8., which is equally divided between the vicars-choral and the incumbent. The church is a neat building, erected in 1831, by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilconly is united to Kilbannon; a large chapel was lately erected.

KILCONLY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 10½ miles (W. by S.) from Tarbert, and on the southern shore of the estuary or mouth of the Shannon; containing 2210 inhabitants. Near the shore are the ruins of the ancient castles of Beale and Lick, the former of which (designated "Beau-lieu" in the Pacata Hibernia) was once a residence of the earls of Kerry. In 1600 its fortifications were demolished by Patrick, the then earl: in the same year the brave Maurice Stack, one of Queen Elizabeth's officers in the desultory war then carried on, was invited here by the earl's lady and treacherously murdered by her attendants. A dangerous bar, or quicksand, extends about a mile north from Beale Point, and nearly opposite Carrigaholt bay. The parish comprises 5742 statute acres; 188 are coarse pasture, 114 bog, and the remainder arable land, for manuring which sea-weed and sand are generally used. The mountain of Knockanure, 665 feet above the level of the sea, is partly in this parish; from its summit an extensive view is obtained of the Shannon, the shores of which are in this vicinity extremely pleasing. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: it is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the corps of the treasurership of Ardfert; the tithe rent-charge is £62. 6., and there are two glebes, containing together about four acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilconly forms part of the district of Lisseltin. Near the ruins of Lick Castle is a columnar cliff, called by the peasantry the "Devil's Castle," and inaccessible except to sea-fowl; its summit is sometimes frequented by eagles. In the vicinity are several caves, formed by the dashing of the waves against the cliffs.

KILCONNELL, a post-town and a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of KILCONNELL, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 30¼ miles (E. by N.) from Galway, and 78¼ (W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 1880 inhabitants, of whom 191 are in the town or village. It derives its name from St. Conall, who was abbot here in the time of St. Patrick. A monastery of Franciscan friars was founded about 1400, by William O'Kelly, and was reformed by his son Malachy, in 1460: at the Dissolution it was granted to Charles Calthorpe, Esq. The ruins are extremely interesting, and contain several inscriptions, coats of arms, &c.; the monastery was a favourite burial-place for many of the most respectable families in Galway. The town contains 46 houses; it is a constabulary police station, and has a post-office under Aughrim: fairs are held on May 9th, Aug. 4th, Nov. 11th, and Dec. 18th; and a manorial court occasionally. The parish contains 6082 statute acres, including a small quantity of bog: the chief seats are Hillwood, Ballinderry, Carrowmanagh, Killagh, and Mount Evans. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming, with the rectories and vicarages of Killane and Fohenagh, the union of Kilconnell, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £86. 10. 9., of which £69. 11. 8. are payable to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £200. 1. 6. The glebe-house was built in 1827, by aid of a gift of £400 and a loan of £350 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe contains 37 acres, besides 9½ acres in Killane and Fohenagh. A church has been built at a cost of £677, of which £420 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder was raised by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Aughrim, in which is a chapel; that of Kilconuell is a large building. On the lands of Calla are the ruins of an old castle, and a lake nearly a mile in circumference. A village in the parish, called in Irish Bollin Whin Shouge, or "Ash Village," gives the title of Baron to Lord Ashtown.

KILCONNELL, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E.) from Cashel, on the road from that place to Fethard; containing 655 inhabitants, and 2345 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and forms part of the ecclesiastical union of Fethard: the tithe rent-charge is £106. 18. 8. Here is a square tower in good preservation.

KILCONNY, a village, in the parish of DRUMLANE, union of CAVAN, barony of LOUGHTEE LOWER, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER; containing 450 inhabitants.

KILCONRY, a parish, in the union of ENNIS, barony of BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W. by S.) from Bunratty; containing 739 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the junction of the rivers Fergus and Shannon, by the former of which it is bounded on the west and by the latter on the south; and comprises 2926½ statute acres, of which 471½ are in islands. The principal islands are Dynish, Fynish, and Innismacnaughten, which contain land of superior quality for fattening cattle; and the rich corcass lands on the banks of the Fergus and Shannon yield a succession of 14 or 15 crops without manure of any description. At Isle Ruagh is a small quay, where sea-weed and turf are landed, and whence corn is occasionally sent in boats to Limerick. The gentlemen's seats are Stonehall and Carrigeary, both commanding extensive views of the estuary of the two rivers. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Tomfinlough or Traddery, in the patronage of the Wyndham family; and the vicarage is part of the vicarial union of Kilfinaghty, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £78. 15., two-thirds payable to the rector and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcony forms part of the district of Newmarket, which is held by the administrator of the Roman Catholic bishop: the chapel is at Carrigeary.

KILCOO, a parish, in the union of KILKEEL, barony of UPPER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Castlewellan, and on the road from Newry to Downpatrick; containing 6583 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern coast, at the base of Slieve Donard, and comprises 18,205½ statute acres. The surface is very uneven, and the soil, with the exception of that around the village of Bryansford, cold, wet, and unproductive; its cultivation is also much impeded by the great number of stones scattered over it in every direction. Slieve Donard (which has an elevation of 2796 feet above the level of the sea) and Slieve Bingian (of 2449 feet) are both within the parish, forming part of a chain rising at Newcastle and extending to Rosstrevor, a distance of 20 miles; the northern sides are here covered with verdure, but the south and west sides present chiefly large tracts of bog. The principal seats are, Tollymore Park, the elegant residence of the Earl of Roden, situated in a richly wooded and well watered demesne; and Donard Lodge, the handsome mansion of Earl Annesley, erected in 1830 on the acclivity of Slieve Donard, and commanding some fine views. The parish is in the diocese of Down, and the rectory forms part of the union of Kilkeel and corps of the treasurership of the cathedral of Down; the tithe rent-charge is £225. The church, with the village of Kilcoo, was burnt in 1641, and in 1712 a church was built at Bryansford, which, being too small for the congregation, was considerably enlarged in 1806, when a tower was added to it; the edifice was repaired by aid of a grant of £200 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1812. There is also a handsome church with a lofty spire at Newcastle, built in the year 1833, at the expense of Earl Annesley, who appoints the minister and pays his stipend. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish includes the districts of Bryansford and Kilcoo: there are two chapels, situated respectively at Bryansford and Ballymony; and at Newcastle is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school at Fofeny was founded in 1822, by the Earl of Roden, who also built another at Bryansford for boys, with a house for the master, in 1826, and by whom both are supported. A school for girls at Bryansford, with a cottage for the mistress, the whole built in 1822, is supported by the Countess of Roden; and a large and handsome school-house has been lately built at Slievenaman, on Earl Annesley's property. There are schools also at Lower Kilcoo, Ballymony, and Ardaghy. On the western side of the parish, at Lough Island Reavy, a reservoir has been constructed for supplying water to the river Bann in dry weather; it covers an area of 255 acres, and when filled will contain a supply for 13 weeks: the expense to the Bann Company has been estimated at £20,000. A new quay was lately erected at Newcastle, to afford shelter to vessels passing the channel in stormy weather; the expense was defrayed by a grant from government, aided by a subscription from Earl Annesley: it is however at present in great need of repair.

KILCOOLE, or AGHOOLE, a parish, in the union of RATHDRUM, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (E. N. E.) from Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and on the lower road from Bray to Wicklow; containing 2460 inhabitants, of whom 296 are in the village. It is situated on the eastern coast, and originally formed part of the territory called Crioch Cualan, the maritime portion of the country of the O'Byrnes, and subsequently of the district of Ranelagh, which for more than two centuries has given the title of Viscount to the family of Jones. The village comprises 59 houses; a few are well built, and roofed with slate, but the greater number are small thatched dwellings. Annual fairs for live stock are held on Whit-Monday and Sept. 4th. On one side of the village green is a vast mass of clay-slate, called the Rock of Kilcoole, 149 feet above the sea, interspersed with broad white veins of quartz, and presenting a singular appearance; near its base are the ruins of the ancient church, overspread with ivy, and surrounded by a cemetery, in which are many memorials of the Coolans and O'Byrnes. The parish comprises 4476¼ statute acres, comprehending the Downs Hill, where are the ruins of an ancient church and burial-ground within the demesne of the late Arthur Hume, Esq. The soil varies greatly, but though in some parts rough and stony, is well adapted for tillage, producing good crops, and some of the earliest potatoes brought into the market of Dublin are raised here. Towards the sea are large tracts of bog, affording excellent fuel. Numerous streams descending from the mountains intersect the parish; the largest of them is called the Three-Trouts' River. Clay-slate and marl are found in great quantities; the former is used for repairing the roads, and the latter as manure. Among the gentlemen's seats is Altidore, situated in a long narrow demesne of pleasing character, to which have been added the adjoining grounds of Hermitage, the whole forming an interesting and truly picturesque demesne; a deep glen penetrates the hill here, and is embellished with various kinds of timber, some of which has attained a remarkable growth, and with a mountain stream that forms numerous cascades, above which is a grotto of shells of great variety and beauty. The other seats are Kilquade House, Spring Farm, Darragh Villa, Ballygannon, Bromley, Bellefield, Tinny Park, Ballyronane, and Dromin, all beautifully situated in tastefully disposed grounds, and commanding fine views of the sea and mountain scenery. Four fairs are held in the village of the Downs, chiefly for live stock.

The parish is in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Delgany: the tithe rent-charge is £201. 15. 3. The ruins of the old church and cemetery are inclosed with a stone wall, and part has been converted into a mausoleum for the Scott family, of Ballygannon. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Kilquade and Kilmurry, comprising also the parishes of Newcastle and Delgany, with parts of those of Bray and Powerscourt; there are two chapels, situated respectively at Kilquade and Kilmurry, the former a handsome edifice of modern erection, dedicated to St. Patrick, and the other dedicated to St. Catharine. Of several schools, two were built by Lady Harriet Daly, and are supported by Miss Daly. There are the remains of an old church on the farm of Ballyhorsey; great numbers of human bones and skeletons have been dug up in the vicinity. On the demesne of Holywell is a spring, the water of which is considered efficacious in ague and palsy.

KILCOOLEY, a parish, in the union of TRIM, barony of UPPER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (E. by N.) from Trim, on the road from that place to Navan; containing 303 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2455 statute acres: the land is principally under tillage, and there is some good pasturage; also limestone, which is quarried for building. Here is a large flour-mill. Rathnally is a handsome seat, pleasantly situated in a well-planted demesne on the banks of the Boyne. The parish is in the diocese of Meath; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Drogheda, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Trim: the tithe rent-charge is £81, of which £62. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcooley is considered to be part of the union or district of Churchtown.

KILCOOLEY, or KILHOOLY, a parish, in the barony, union, and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Strokestown, on the road to Frenchpark; containing 2005 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3476 statute acres, and is principally under tillage, with some good grazing-land; it is in a good state of cultivation, and there is no waste, and but a small quantity of bog. Limestone of very fair quality is quarried both for agricultural purposes and for building. Petty-sessions are held every Wednesday. The parish is in the diocese of Elphin; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Kilcooley in the cathedral of Elphin, and the vicarage is part of the union of Ardclare: the tithe rent-charge is £84. 11. 10., the whole payable to the incumbent, one-half as prebendary and the other as vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Killuken and Ogulla, and containing two chapels; that of Kilcooley is on the townland of Cloncullane. A monastery was founded here by St. Bolcan, or Olcan, but at what period is unknown; and there are some remains of ancient forts.

KILCOOLY, a parish, in the union of LOUGHREA, barony of LEITRIM, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (E.) from Loughrea, on the road to Eyrecourt; containing 576 inhabitants. It is said to have been formerly the residence of the celebrated chieftain Norah Oge, one of the ancestors of the present family of Clanricarde; there are still some remains, in good preservation, of the ancient castle, which appears to have been a place of formidable strength. The parish comprises 1616 statute acres; the lands are in a tolerable state of cultivation, and there is only a very inconsiderable portion of bog. It is in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery of Clonfert, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilcolgan: the tithe rent-charge is £29. 15. 6., of which £20. 15. 6. are payable to the dean, and £9 to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcooly forms part of the union of Leitrim, and contains a chapel.

KILCOOLY, a parish, in the union of THURLES, partly in the barony of CRANAGH, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, and partly in the barony of ELIOGARTY, but chiefly in that of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Johnstown; containing, with the town of New Birmingham, 4066 inhabitants. Donagh Carbragh O'Brien, King of Limerick, about 1200, founded an abbey here for Cistercian monks, which, at the Reformation, was granted to the Earl of Ormond: the ruins are extensive, and contain a fine east window, and some handsome tombs of the Ikerrin branch of the Butler family; the proprietor, W. Barker, Esq., lately erected a study, or summer-house, in them. The parish comprises 11,508 statute acres, of which the whole is arable and pasture, except about 300 acres of woodland: limestone abounds, and coal and culm are found on Mr. Barker's estate. The residence of Kilcooly Abbey stands in a well-planted demesne of above 1600 statute acres: on the eastern verge is a tower built to commemorate the battle of Waterloo, which, being on a high hill, serves as an excellent landmark. On the hills is a colony of Palatines, brought from the county of Limerick about 70 years since, by Sir W. Barker, Bart. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £380. 15. 6. The church is a handsome structure, built in 1829, by a loan of £2000 from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1818, gave £350 and lent £450: the glebe comprises 23 acres, for which £42. 12. per annum late currency are paid by the rector. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Gurtnahoe, or Fennor, and has a chapel at New Birmingham. There is also a meeting-house for Wesleyan Methodists. Some ruins exist of the castle of Grange.—See BIRMINGHAM, NEW.

KILCOONEY, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Headford, and on Lough Corrib; containing 1609 inhabitants. It comprises 6057 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Headford: the tithe rent-charge is £148. 18. St. Columb is said to have founded an abbey here.

KILCORCORAN, a parish, in the barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Kanturk, on the road to Newmarket; containing 532 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1292 statute acres, and consists only of the townlands of Rossrine and Coolavota, is entirely isolated by the parish of Kilbrin. It is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter, of whose economy fund the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £45, forms a part, and who allow the perpetual curate of Kanturk a small stipend, £5 per annum, for performing the occasional duties. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kanturk, and has a chapel at Coolavota. The ruins of the ancient church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILCORKEY, a parish, in the union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. E.) from Frenchpark, and on the mail-coach road from Longford to Ballina; containing 3076 inhabitants. It comprises 9090 statute acres, consisting of gently rising grounds intermixed with bogs, and including some excellent pasture; the land on the banks of the streams that flow into Lough Gara produces rank grass, from being frequently inundated. Limestone, freestone, and sandstone are obtained. It is in the diocese of Elphin; the rectory was till lately part of the corps of the precentorship, and the vicarage of the archdeaconry: the tithe rent-charge is £67. 10., and was equally divided between the precentor and the archdeacon. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel at Belanagare. Here are the ruins of a church, and of several raths.—See BELANAGARE.

KILCORMUCK, KING'S CO.—See FRANKFORD.

KILCORMUCK, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, partly in the barony of GOREY, but chiefly in that of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Oulart, and on the roads from Enniscorthy and Ferns to the sea; containing 2743 inhabitants. The Wexford insurrection of 1798 broke out in this parish, under the direction of the Rev John Murphy, priest of Boulavogue, who, on the burning of the chapel at that place by the loyalists, collected his forces from the surrounding district, and advanced to Oulart Hill, where he encamped. The parish comprises 10,055 statute acres, chiefly under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture has been greatly improved under the auspices of the North Wexford Agricultural Association. Marl, which is found in the parish, and lime brought from a considerable distance, are used for manure. Oulart Hill, at the southern extremity of Kilcormuck, is cultivated nearly to the summit, but the absorbent nature of the soil scarcely repays the expense of tillage. There are two bogs, containing about 20 acres; good building-stone is found; and slate has been discovered. Extensive plantations have been made at Mount George by Mr. Lee, and at Garryduff by Mr. Goodison. At Dranagh are several neat cottages with gardens attached, and the peasantry of this district generally exhibit in their persons and dwellings an appearauce of neatness and comfort. Spinning and weaving are carried on by them at their own homes. Fairs are held at Harrow on March 21st, June 24th, Sept. 30th, and Dec. 1st. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £394. 12. The church, a neat structure, was rebuilt in 1766, by aid of a gift of £200, and was enlarged and modernised in 1831, by a loan of £600, from the late Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1804, at an expense of £1800, of which the Board gave £100: near the church is a glebe of 24 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the district of Monageer, and partly in that of Oulart: the chapel is at Boulavogue.

KILCORNAN, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, barony of KENRY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (W.) from Pallas-Kenry; on the river Shannon, and the lower road to Askeaton; containing 3856 inhabitants. This place was one of the chief stations, in this part of Ireland, of the Danes, who in 1041 erected a very strong fortress near the present village of Castletown; and the Danish chieftain, having soon afterwards embraced the Christian faith, built a church near the fort of Moige. In 1164 another castle was erected, which eventually fell into the hands of the O'Donovans, by whom it was given up to the English; it afterwards became part of the possessions of the Earl of Desmond, on whose rebellion in the reign of Elizabeth it was forfeited, together with the manor, and was granted to Sir Hardress Waller, ancestor of the present proprietor. In the war of the 17th century, it was garrisoned for the king, but was taken the year following by the Irish under the command of General Purcell, who kept possession of it till its surrender to Ireton, by whom it was garrisoned for Cromwell. The PARISH comprises 9346 statute acres: towards the Shannon the lands are fertile and under good cultivation, but towards the south much encumbered with stones scattered in every direction, and with portions of rock rising above the surface; they are, notwithstanding, well fenced and drained, and the whole forms one of the most fertile and best cultivated districts in the south of Ireland. The principal seats are, Castletown, the elegant residence of the Waller family, beautifully situated in a richly wooded demesne of 200 Irish acres, sloping gently to the river; Holly Park, the ancient residence of the Taylor family, now the property of Sir Vere Edmond de Vere, Bart.; Summerville, the ancient seat of Lord Charleville; Castle Grey; Stonehall; and Bushy Island. There are many large and substantial farmhouses, and several very neat cottages.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Waller family: the tithe rent-charge is £484. 12. The church, a spacious and handsome edifice with a lofty embattled tower, was built, entirely of hewn marble, in 1832, at an expense of £1500, of which £800 were a loan from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder a gift from the late J. Waller, Esq., who also undertook to repay the loan. The glebe-house is a very commodious residence, built in 1810, by the then incumbent; and the glebe comprises 60 acres of profitable land. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district called Stonehall and Cappagh, comprising also the parishes of Cappagh and Nantinan; the old chapel is in the village of Stonehall, and a handsome chapel of hewn marble was built at Boherbuie, in 1832, at the expense of the late J. Waller, Esq. The two public schools of this parish are supported by the Rev. William Waller. Of the castle built by the Danes nothing is now remaining, and of that subsequently erected the vestiges are very slight. In the south-western part of the parish are some fragments of the castle of Carrigonan; and on the new line of road, near Holly Park, are the interesting ruins of the old church or priory of Killeen. Not far from Carrigonan are the remains of the small church of Cillenalotor, 12 feet long and 8 feet wide, lighted by one narrow lancet window in the east gable, and having a very low pointed entrance on the west. Near Stonehall are some small but interesting lakes, on the shores of which are vestiges of ancient buildings.

KILCORNAN, or KILCORAN, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5½ miles (W. N. W.) from Tipperary; containing 631 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1157 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, forming part of the union of Drumkeen and corps of the archdeacoury of Emly: the tithe rent-charge is £39. 17. 6.

KILCORNEY, or KILCORNANE, a parish, in the barony of BURREN, union of ENNISTYMON, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Curofin, and near the road from Kilfenora to Ballyvaughan; containing 330 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3352½ statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, united from time immemorial to the rectories and vicarages of Kilheny and Oughtmanna, together constituting the union of Kilcorney and corps of the chancellorship of Kilfenora, in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £15, and of the whole union £123. 15. There is neither church nor glebe-house, but a glebe of 14 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Carrune. The ruins of the ancient church still remain, in the burial-ground. Near the village is a remarkable cave, the mouth of which is level with the ground: from the interior of this cave, which is of considerable extent, water is occasionally spouted into the air to a great height, and inundates the plain, although it is at some distance from any river or lake, and nearly six miles from the sea.

KILCORNEY, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E. S. E.), from Millstreet, on the Bogra road to Cork; containing 1761 inhabitants, and comprising 8836 statute acres. Of this area 3474 acres consist of good arable land, and the remainder of mountain pasture. In 1651, a desperate battle was fought at Knockbrack, or Knockiclashy, on the borders of this parish, between the parliamentary forces under Lord Broghill and those commanded by Lord Muskerry. Towards the south and south-east the parish is mountainous, and on the east borders on the Bogra moors: good building-stone is found in several places. Kilcorney House is an old mansion to which was formerly attached an extensive and finely wooded demesne. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £110. 14. 6. There is neither church nor glebe-house, but a glebe of about 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clonmeen: the chapel, a plain edifice, is situated on the road to Cork. Some vestiges of the old church still exist, in the burial-ground.

KILCOWAN, or KILCOAN, a parish, in the barony of BARGE, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 10 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wexford, and on the lough formed by the burrow of Ballyteigue; containing 492 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2082½ statute acres: the land, which is chiefly in tillage, is partly manured with sea-weed, procured from the lough, and partly with lime, quarries of good limestone being worked on the townland of Baldwinstown. Some neat cottages have lately been erected in the village of Baldwinstown by Joseph Swan, Esq. Kilcowan is in the diocese of Ferns; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of W. Bell, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Mulrankin. The tithe rent-charge is £121. 18. 8., of which £83. 18. 8. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Rathangan. Near the village is the castle of Baldwinstown, consisting of a lofty tower, about 30 feet square, the walls of which at the base measure nearly 13 feet in thickness.

KILCOWANMORE, a parish, in the union of ENNISCORTHY, barony of BANTRY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Enniscorthy, on the road to Ballyhack; containing 703 inhabitants, and comprising 2760¾ statute acres. It is an impropriate cure in the diocese of Ferns, held with that of Clongeen, and in the patronage of F. Leigh, Esq., in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £52. 10., is entirely payable to Mr. Leigh, who allows a stipend of £5 to the curate of Clonmore for discharging the occasional duties. There is no church.

KILCREAGH, an ancient parish, in the barony of NETHERCROSS, poor-law union of BALROTHERY, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N. E.) from Swords; the population is included in the return for Donabate, into which this parish has merged. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, incorporated with Donabate, and in the patronage of the Archbishop; the rectory is appropriate to the economy fund of St. Patrick's cathedral: the tithes are included with those of Donabate. The church, which was small, is in ruins.

KILCREDAN, a parish, in the union of MIDLETON, barony of INOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. E.) from Castlemartyr; containing 620 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south by the Atlantic Ocean, comprises 1014 statute acres. The northern part is very hilly, and the soil shallow, resting on a substratum of clay-slate; but from the vicinity of the sea, whence abundance of sea-weed and sand is procured for manure, it is rendered tolerably productive. In other parts the land is of good quality, and in an excellent state of cultivation, and at Ballycrenan considerable improvements in agriculture are in progress; about three-fourths of the parish are in tillage, and the remainder in grazing-farms, with some rough pasture. From its situation about midway between Cable Island and Ballycotton bay, and from its fine beach of sand extending in a bold semicircular sweep for nearly four miles, this place is much resorted to for sea-bathing. At Ballycrenan is a coast-guard station belonging to the district of Youghal. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, episcopally united to those of Kilmacdonough and Garryvoe, forming the union of Kilcredan, in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory forms part of the union of Lisgold and corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Cloyne. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £90, of which £60 are payable to the precentor, and £30 to the vicar; the aggregate tithe of the union of the vicar is £341. 6. 6. The church, erected in 1636, has been lately rebuilt; it contains some monuments to the Tynte family, formerly proprietors of the castle. There is no glebe-house; the Kilcredan glebe comprises 11 acres, and there are two other glebes in the union, of 10 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Ladies-bridge. The parochial male and female schools, in which are about 120 children, are supported by Captain Hoare (who gives the house rent-free), Mrs. B. Fitzgerald, B. J. M. Praed, Esq., and the vicar. The fine ruins of Ballycrenan Castle occupy an eminence at a short distance from the coast, commanding an interesting view of the sea and the beautiful bay of Ballycotton: this castle was built by the Carew family early in the 15th century, and was destroyed in 1641; it was afterwards restored, and occupied till 1798. The Wallis family, who purchased it soon after the abdication of James II., were the last occupiers.

KILCREDANE, or KILSHIDEEN (commonly called KILKNEEDAN), a parish, in the union of KILLARNEY, barony of MAGONIHY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (N. by W.) from Killarney, on the old road to Tralee; containing 764 inhabitants, and comprising 2486 statute acres, mostly in tillage and of good quality. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, forming part of the union of Molahiffe; the rectory is impropriate in W. Talbot Crosbie, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £55. 7., payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar: the townlands of East and West Inchicarriganes and Aughnablaha pay half tithes with the parish of Kilcummin. In the Roman Catholic divisions, Kilcredane forms part of the district of Fieries; the chapel, at Ballyhar, is a modern building. On an eminence overhanging the Gheestan river, which bounds the parish on the north-east, are the ruins of the old church.

KILCROAN, a parish, in the union of Castlerea, barony of Ballymoe, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 11 miles (N. W. by W.) from Roscommon, on the road from that place to Dunmore; containing 2178 inhabitants. This parish comprises 7701½ statute acres, including a large quantity of bog. The chief seats are, Glinsk, that of Sir John J. Burke, Bart.; Dundermott; Roseberry; and Turla. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Donamon; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Rauelagh, and the tithe rent-charge is £80. 2., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcroan is the head of a district called Glinsk and Kilcroan, including the parishes of Kilcroan, Ballynakill, Ardclare, and Oran, and containing chapels at Glinsk and Ballymoe. Here are the ruins of an ancient church, and at Tubberroe are the remains of an abbey.

KILCROHANE, or Mweentervawra, an ancient parish, in the union of Bantry, West division of the barony of West Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, about 10 miles (S. W.) from Bantry, and on the southern coast; containing 4856 inhabitants. This district, which was a separate parish until the year 1792, when it was united by act of council with the western division of the parish of Durrus, is situated between the bays of Dunmanus and Bantry, and forms a peninsula terminating in Sheep's Head; it comprises 14,588 statute acres, whereof 10,526 are mountain, 1667 coarse pasturage, 2125 arable, 260 good pasture land, and about 10 acres bog. The soil is generally rocky and unproductive, and much of the land is uncultivated; the exposed situation of the district between the bays lays it open to the full force of the westerly and north-westerly winds, and is unfavourable to agricultural improvement. A ridge of mountains of clay-slate intersects the district from east to west. On a high point near the western extremity is a signal tower communicating with those of Bere Island and Three-Castle Head. There are some small lakes. Manganese is found in different places; and there are indications of copper-ore, and abundance of slate of good quality; but no attempt yet made to work either the manganese or copper has produced any very profitable return. At Gurtavallig, however, on the north coast, a mine has been lately opened, which is said to afford great promise; and the slate-quarries are now beginning to return some considerable profit. The gentlemen's residences are, Donovan's Cove, Fort Lodge, and two picturesque cottages. Sheep's Head is situated in 51° 32′ (N. Lat.) and 9° 39′ (W. Lon.), and is four miles (N. N. E.) from Three-Castle Head; between them is the entrance into Dunmanus bay. The parish is in the diocese of Cork. There is a small glebe of 5½ acres, on which stand the ruins of the old church surrounded by the churchyard: the present church is nearly in the centre of the union of Durrus-Kilcrohane. See Durrus. On the shore of Dunmanus bay are the ruins of the ancient castle of the O'Donovans, built in the 16th century; and there are also in the district some remains of a building said to have been a college or school of learning.

KILCROHANE, a parish, in the union of Kenmare, barony of Dunkerron, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 14 miles (S. W.) from Kenmare; containing 10,776 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the northern shore of the great river or bay of Kenmare, along which it extends nearly 14 miles. It is bounded on the east by the river Blackwater, on the west by the bay of Ballinaskelligs, and on the north by a range of lofty mountains which separate it from the barony of Iveragh; it comprises 63,702 statute acres, the greater part of which consists of rocky mountain pasture, waste, and bog, there being but a very small portion in tillage, and that chiefly for potatoes, for which sea-manure is used. The land is usually computed by gneeves, of which there are 768. Nearly in the centre of the parish, an inlet in the bay of Kenmare receives the river Sneem, and forms the harbour of that name, where vessels of considerable size may lie securely when not exposed to south-western gales. The western extremity of the parish terminates in the peninsula called Hog Head, which forms the southern side of the bay of Ballinaskelligs. Along the shore in Kenmare bay are several islands, the principal of which is Rossmore; and about a league off the western shore are those of Scariff and Dinish, generally called the Hog Islands. There was till lately but one main line of road through the parish; but a new line has been constructed from Sneem to the pass of Cameduff, where it meets the new road between Killarney and Kenmare about midway. Several of the inhabitants, including some of the small farmers, are occasionally employed in the fishery of the bay, on which they partly depend for their support; but it is expected that the new road from Sneem will tend materially to develop the agricultural resources of this wild and mountainous district. The bogs, which are deep and extensive, were surveyed about 40 years since, by Mr. Nimmo, who reported to the government that the greater part of them were capable of being drained and brought into cultivation at a moderate expense. On the summit of the mountain called Finabagough, 1200 feet above the level of the sea, is an extensive tract of common, where cattle are grazed during the summer months. The seats are, Derrynane, the residence of Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P.; Derriquin; Hollywood; Aska; and Castle Cove. Derrynane, sometimes called Derrynane or Darrynane Abbey, from its proximity to the ruins of the ancient monastery of that name, is situated near the shore of the Atlantic, at the western extremity of the parish: it is an extensive but irregular pile of building, partly in the castellated style, and has been much enlarged by the proprietor, who has also greatly improved the approaches, and extended the shrubberies and plantations as far as the situation, so much exposed to the western gales, will allow. The surrounding scenery, which is of the most wild and romantic description, is terminated on the north by a range of rugged and lofty mountains, from the summit of which an extensive view of the western coast is obtained, embracing the entrances to the bays of Bantry and Kenmare, the bay of Ballinaskelligs, Dursey Island, and the Skellig Isles. The house of Derriquin, also partly castellated, is situated in a finely wooded demesne on the bay of Kenmare, which is here studded with small islands. The prostrate juniper is found on the shore at this place. A receiving house for letters in connexion with Cahirciveen has been established at Ballybrack, and is of great benefit to the inhabitants of the district.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, united prior to any existing record to the rectory and vicarage of Templenoe, and in the patronage of the CROWN: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £193. 17., and of the whole union £285. 11. 6. The parish church, at Sneem, is a plain structure, erected in 1810, by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; there is a church also at Templenoe. The glebe-house was built in 1817 by a gift of £150, and a loan of £420, from the same Board; the glebe comprises 23 acres, subject to a rent of £30. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms two separate districts: the eastern, called Ballyhog, contains the chapels of Sneem and Thahilla; and the western, called Derrynane, those of Derrynane and Lohurt. The chapel at Sneem is a large plain building; that at Derrynane is a neat modern edifice, erected at the joint expense of the late General Daniel Count O'Connell, Mr. O'Connell, and Mr. Hartop. The parochial school at Sneem is supported by Mr. Bland, of Derriquin, and the incumbent; a school held in Sneem chapel is chiefly supported by the priest; and a free school at Derrynane by a bequest of £10 per annum from the late Count O'Connell (at whose expense the school-house, a neat building, was erected), and by annual donations from Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Hartop.

The ruins of Aghamore or Derrynane Abbey, founded in the seventh century by the monks of St. Finbarr, Cork, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine, stand on a peninsula which becomes insulated at spring tides, and has therefore acquired the name of "Abbey Island." A portion of the walls has been washed away by the violence of the waves, but the remains are still considerable, and the eastern window nearly entire. Here is the family vault of the O'Connells. At Coode are the ruins of the old church; and on a hill about a mile from it is a curious hermitage, hewn out of the solid rock, and said to have belonged to St. Crohane, the patron saint of the parish. At Cahirdaniel are the remains of a large fortification, consisting of a rampart seven feet high, constructed of large stones, and attributed to the Danes; and at Money Fluch are those of a similar one. But one of the most remarkable ancient structures in Ireland is Staigue Fort, which is generally considered to be unique. It stands on a low hill nearly in the centre of an amphitheatre of barren mountains, open from the south to the bay of Kenmare, from which it is about a mile and a half distant. The building, which is nearly of a circular form, is constructed of the ordinary stone of the country, but bears no mark whatever of a tool, having been evidently erected before masonry became a regular art. The only entrance is by a doorway barely five feet high, through a wall upwards of 13 feet thick, which opens into an area of about 90 feet in diameter. The circumference is divided into a series of compartments of steps, or seats, ascending to the top of the surrounding wall, in the form of the letter X, and in two of these compartments are entrances to cells constructed in the centre of the wall. The average height of the wall on the outside is 18 feet, battering as it rises by a curve, which produces a very singular effect: the wall also batters on the inside, so as to be reduced from about 13 feet at the bottom to 7 at the top. On the outside the stones are small, and the joints are so filled with splinters of stone as not to be removed without violence. The fort is surrounded by a broad fosse. Various conjectures have been formed as to its origin and use, the most probable of which appears to be, that it was erected as a place of refuge for the inhabitants and their cattle from the sudden inroads of the pirates of former times.—See BLACKWATER, DINISH, SCARIFF, and SNEEM.

KILCRONAGHAN, a parish, in the union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Tubbermore, 4345 inhabitants. It comprises 7992¾ statute acres, and includes some of the richest portions of the valley of the Mayola, the principal part of which is pasture; there are also above 500 acres of mountain land in pasture. Great quantities of reddish limestone and much valuable freestone are quarried, some of which is exported from Portballyronan: here are likewise some thin seams of coal. The principal seat is Fort-William. The living is a rectory in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £262. 10. The church is a small and old building, and has near the communion-table a beautiful niche in the Norman style, which was part of the original edifice: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £132 for the repair of this church. The glebe-house, which adjoins it, was built in 1794, at a cost of £600: the glebe contains 184 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Desartmartin, and has a chapel at Keenaght. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians at Tubbermore; it was built in 1728, and is in connexion with the General Assembly. There is also a meeting-house for Independents in the town. Dr. Adam Clarke, the celebrated biblicist, was born at Moybeg, in this parish.—See TUBBERMORE.

KILCRUMPER, a parish, partly in the barony of FERMOY, but chiefly in that of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, union of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, at the junction of the rivers Funcheon and Blackwater, and nearly adjoining the town of Kilworth; containing 1928 inhabitants, and comprising 3516 statute acres. The land is in general of a good quality, and chiefly under tillage: limestone and brownstone abound, and are worked to a considerable extent for manure and building. At Araglyn are extensive woollen-mills for the manufacture of broad-cloth. The parish is in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in Messrs. E. & B. Norcott, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilworth: the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £330. 2., is payable in equal portions to the impropriators and the vicar. The glebe-house of the union, which is in Kilcrumper, was built in 1821, at an expense exceeding £2000, of which £100 were a gift and £1300 a loan from the Board of First Fruits; it is beautifully situated on an eminence peninsulated by the Araglyn, the Funcheon, and the Blackwater, and commands one of the most luxuriant and picturesque scenes in the county: the glebe contains 44 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly included in the district of Kilworth, but chiefly in that of Fermoy. On a rocky eminence overhanging the Funcheon are the extensive remains of the castellated mansion of Ballyhindon.

KILCULLANE, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK.—See KILRELLANE.

KILCULLEN, a parish, in the union of Naas, barony of Kilcullen, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Naas, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Athy and Carlow; containing 3020 inhabitants. This place, which since the erection of the new town of Kilcullen-Bridge, has been called Old Kilcullen, derived its name from the foundation of a church and monastery in the district of Coulan, of which St. Patrick appointed St. Isernine bishop; Isernine died in 469, and was succeeded by St. Mactalius. The monastery, and the town which grew up around it, were plundered repeatedly by the Danes, between the years 883 and 1037; but when the English obtained a settlement in the country, the town was fortified, and greatly increased in importance. Soon after the invasion, a castle was erected here by the Fitzmartins, which eventually became the property of the Fitz-Eustace family, of whom Thomas Fitz-Eustace, afterwards Viscount Baltinglass, was created Baron of Kilcullen by Henry VIII. Previously to the year 1319, the town was surrounded with strong walls and defended by seven gates; but Maurice Jaques having in that year built a bridge over the river Liffey, about two miles from this place, the town of Kilcullen-Bridge began rapidly to increase, and the ancient town to decline. During the civil war the castle was garrisoned for the parliamentarians, in 1641, but was taken two years afterwards by the Marquess of Ormonde. In the same year, the commissioners appointed to treat for a cessation of hostilities assembled here, but afterwards adjourned to Jigginstown, near Naas; and in 1647 the castle was taken and burnt by the parliamentarians. In the disturbances of 1798, a large number of the insurgents posted themselves in the churchyard, on the summit of a very steep hill, and Captains Erskine and Cookes, who advanced to dislodge them, were killed in the attempt, and their party repulsed. The insurgents afterwards assembled in great numbers on the heights above the town, from which, however, they were driven with great loss by General Dundas, who was stationed here; and several thousands of them subsequently surrendered to him on the hill of Knockawlin, about a mile distant, where they had occupied an intrenched camp. The town, which stood on a bleak eminence in a very commanding position, is now only an insignificant village; its market, which belongs by patent to the Rev. Thomas O'Moore, has been removed to Kilcullen-Bridge, and fairs only are now held here on June 22nd and Oct. 2nd.

The parish comprises 7344¾ statute acres, of which more than four-fifths are in tillage, and the remainder, with the exception of a small portion of woodland and exhausted bog, is in pasture. The soil is fertile, and the lands are in a high state of cultivation; the system of agriculture has, within the last 15 years, been very greatly improved, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. Castle-Martin, an elegant residence, occupies the site of the ancient castle of the Fitz-Martins, near Kilcullen-Bridge: the present mansion was occupied by the king's troops as a barrack, in 1798; it is surrounded with a highly improved and richly wooded demesne. Halverstown, another seat, is finely situated in the midst of extensive and thriving plantations, which, covering an elevated part of the demesne, are a great ornament to a large tract of country around.

The living is a vicarage (otherwise called a perpetual curacy), in the diocese of Duhlin, united, in 1833, to the impropriate curacies of Davidstown, Giltown, and Brannickstown, together forming the benefice of Kilcullen; the rectory is chiefly united to the half rectory of Glasnevin, together constituting the corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £249. 5. 6., of which £148 are payable to the chancellor, and £73. 5. 6. to the perpetual curate. The church, for the erection of which, in 1815, the late Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1000, has lately undergone enlargement, which renders it cruciform, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners having granted £238 towards the expense. Divine service is also performed during the summer in a school-house at Calvertstown. The glebe-house is a neat residence, built in 1824, by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: there is a chapel at Gormanstown, and also at New Abbey; the latter stands within the cemetery, and is built partly with the materials, of the ancient abbey, some of the ornamental sculptures of which are preserved in the present building. New Abbey was founded in 1460 for Franciscans of the Strict Observance, by Sir Roland Fitz-Eustace, many years lord chancellor and treasurer of Ireland. After its dissolution it was granted, in 1582, by Queen Elizabeth to the poet Spenser; and though the tower fell in 1764, and a great portion of the materials was used in building the Roman Catholic chapel, the ruins are still highly interesting. The tomb of the founder and his lady is still visible in the churchyard, but so deeply sunk in the ground that the inscription, ascribing the foundation of the abbey to Roland Fitz-Eustace, who died Dec. 19th, 1496, can with difficulty be read. In the churchyard at Old Kilcullen are the remains of a slender circular tower, and the erect shaft of an ancient cross divided into compartments, each containing an emblematical sculpture.

KILCULLEN-BRIDGE, a market and post town, partly in the parish of Carnalloway, barony of South Naas, but chiefly in the parish and barony of Kilcullen, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 5½ miles (S. by W.) from Naas, and 21 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 1056 inhabitants. This town had its origin in the erection of a bridge over the river Liffey, in 1319, from which period it continued gradually to increase, so that it at length totally superseded the ancient town of Kilcullen, the market of which has been removed to this place. It is two miles to the east of the former town, and within a short distance of the great Bog of Allen, and consists of one street containing 187 houses; it lies chiefly on the western bank of the river, and is adequately supplied with water: the bridge has a venerable and interesting appearance, and not far from the eastern end of it is a large rath. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied; fairs are held on Feb. 2nd, March 25th, June 22nd, Sept. 8th and 29th, Oct. 2nd, and Dec. 8th. A constabulary police station has been established here; and petty-sessions are held every Friday. There are a dispensary, and a fever hospital.

KILCULLIHEEN, or Kilcloheen, a parish, partly in the city of Waterford, but chiefly in the barony of GAULTIER, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (E. N. E.) from Waterford; containing 1515 inhabitants. It comprises 2238 statute acres, of which about 729 are in tillage, and 1296 in pasture; and was originally part of the county of Kilkenny, but by grant of Charles I. was transferred to Waterford, with the main portion of which city it is connected by a wooden-bridge over the Suir from Ferry bank. Near the bridge is a large ship-building establishment. The principal seats are, New Park, the residence of the Rev. Sir John Newport, Bart.; Belmont House, of Sir H. Winston Barron, Bart.; Killaspy; Rockshire; and Sion Lodge. The parish is in the diocese of Ossory; the rectory is impropriate in the corporation of Waterford, and the vicarage has been united from time immemorial to the rectory of Muckalee. The tithe rent-charge is £82. 10., of which £48. 15. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was built in 1823, by aid of a loan of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits, and has been repaired by a grant of £300 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Slieruagh, and contains a chapel. In 1151, Dermot Mac Murrough, King of Leinster, founded a nunnery here as a cell to that of St. Mary de Hogges, near Dublin, and it was afterwards richly endowed by King John and David Fitz-Milo: it was sometimes called the Nunnery De Bello Portu, and at the Dissolution was granted to the corporation of Waterford.

KILCULLY, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2¼ miles (N.) from Cork, on the road from that city to Kealavollen; containing 488 inhabitants. It comprises 1760 statute acres, and consists principally of dairy-farms: the land is based upon clay-slate, and is generally fertile and well cultivated. Here is a very large flour-mill. The living, which was lately suppressed, was a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £90. Divine service is at present performed in a house licensed by the bishop; but a church is in course of erection, partly by grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who now hold the living. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Upper Glanmire. Here are some remains of the old church, and not far distant are the ruins of Rahinisky Castle.

KILCUMMER, a parish, in the union and barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (S. E. by S.) from Castletown-Roche; on the road from Mallow to Fermoy, and on the rivers Awbeg and Blackwater; containing 783 inhabitants, and comprising 2613 statute acres. The land, with the exception of the portion on the south side of the Blackwater, forming part of the Nagle mountains, is of medium quality, and chiefly in tillage. Fairs are held on the 21st of April, July, Sept., and Dec., for cattle and pigs. Renny was formerly part of the estate, and the occasional residence, of the poet Spenser; it is finely situated at the junction of the Awbeg with the Blackwater, and some vestiges of the old castle of Renny still exist near the present house. At a short distance from this place the Awbeg is crossed by the long bridge of Kilcummer, and near the high road leading to the bridge are the ruins of the ancient church. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £99. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe; but a small church erected in Bridgetown parish is intended for the use of the inhabitants of this parish also. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilcummer forms part of the district of Castletown-Roche.

KILCUMMIN, a parish, in the barony of MOYCULLIN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Oughterard, 10,824 inhabitants. It comprises 108,791 statute acres, of which 10,281¼ are in Lough Corrib; and includes within its limits several islands. The principal seats are Lemonfield, Port Carrin, Ardvarn, Clareville, and Lodge. The living is a perpetual cure, in the diocese of Tuam, united to those of Rahoon, Moycullen, and Ballinacourty, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly impropriate in T. B. Martin, Esq., and partly forms a portion of the union of St. Nicholas and wardenship of Galway. The tithe rent-charge is £105, one-half of which is payable to the impropriator, one-fourth to the warden of Galway, and one-fourth to the perpetual curate. The church, in Oughterard, is a small neat building, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £600, in 1810. For the erection of the glebe-house, the same Board, in 1817, gave £450 and lent £50: the glebe comprises 16 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the diocese of Galway, and partly in that of Tuam: the former portion is called Oughterard, from the chapel being at that place; the latter is united to part of Kilanin, forming the union or district of Killeen, in which are three chapels. The town of Galway and a large portion of the adjoining country are supplied with turf from the district that stretches along the headlands of Kilkerrin and Greatman's bays, in this parish; and the inhabitants of the interior, through the medium of Lough Corrib, are hence supplied with sea-sand and seaweed for manure. Several hundred boats are constantly employed in the conveyance of these articles, and during the intervals between the fishing seasons many of the fishing-boats are similarly occupied. From this place to Galway there are two sailing courses; one by the bay of Kilkerrin round Galin Head, where there is a tremendous sea with strong currents; the other by Greatman's bay, by which vessels may keep in smooth water within the islands. This passage is, however, obstructed by the rocky pass of Dangan, which can only be sailed through at high tide, so that 200 boats are sometimes waiting for a passage. To remedy this evil, it was lately proposed to clear that channel and construct piers, which would render the passage easy at most heights of the tide. The estimated expense of this great improvement was only £480. 3., and the Board of Public Works recommended that half should be paid by government. A pier has been erected by the Fishery Board on the north-east side of Garomna Island, in Greatman's bay.—See OUGHTERARD.

KILCUMMIN, a parish, in the union of KILLARNEY, barony of MAGONIHY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (N. E.) from Killarney, on the roads from that town to Castleisland and Millstreet; containing 7360 inhabitants, and comprising 38,953 statute acres. A considerable portion consists of mountain pasture, bog, and coarse arable land. The soil is in general heavy; but in consequence of an abundant supply of lime, the state of agriculture has of late been much improved. The quarry at Carrigdulkeen, isolated in the midst of an extensive district of mountain and bog, produces a fine blue limestone, equally adapted for building and manure, and is worked to a large extent, there being no other within a circuit of several miles. A court is occasionally held at Five-mile-bridge, by the Earl of Kenmare's seneschal, for the manors of Ross and Molahiffe; at which debts not exceeding 40s. late currency are recoverable. The seats are Shanagh House and Rathmore, the latter now occupied by a society of monks of the order of La Trappe, a branch from the parent establishment at Mount Melleray, in the county of Waterford. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Killarney. The tithe rent-charge is £394. 17., of which £228. 14. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic arrangements this parish is divided into East and West Kilcummin: the former, with the greater part of the adjoining parish of Nohoval-daly, forms the district of Knocknacoppel; and the latter forms a separate district, the chapel of which is situated at Kilcummin. In the district of Knocknacoppel are the chapel of that name, a large plain building; Griorguillea chapel, recently rebuilt; and that of Knocknagree, in Nohoval-daly: there is also a chapel attached to the establishment at Rathmore open to the public. The late Mr. Cronin, of the Park, near Killarney, bequeathed £30 per annum for the establishment and support of a school in each of the parishes of Kilcummin and Nohoval-daly. On the southern confines of the parish are two remarkable mountains, which from their peculiar shape are called "the Paps," rising 2280 feet above the level of the sea, and forming striking features in the mountain scenery on the road from Killarney to Cork. At their base is an ancient fort or rath, near which is a holy well resorted to by numbers of the peasantry on May-day. The ruins of the old church are situated on an eminence commanding an extensive prospect: the late Lord Barrymore was interred here.

KILCUMMIN, or KILCOMMIN, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (N.) from Killala, and on the western side of the bay of Killala; containing 2791 inhabitants. It comprises 4195½ statute acres; the land is generally good and well cultivated, except on the coast, where the drifted sand injures the soil. Good stone is obtained here. At the northern extremity of the parish is Kilcummin Head, where is a coast-guard station, being one of the six in the district of Killala. The parish is in the diocese of Killala; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery and the precentorship of Killala, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Lacken: the tithe rent-charge is £120, of which £69. 15. are payable to the dean and the precentor, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Kilcummin forms part of the union or district of Lacken. At Ballinglena are some remains of the old church, near which the French army under General Humbert landed, in 1798.

KILCUMNEY, or DRUMCREE, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of DELVIN, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S. E.) from Castle-Pollard, on the road from that place to Athboy; containing 959 inhabitants. It comprises 2921 statute acres, principally in tillage: there is a considerable quantity of bog; also some good limestone. The chief seats are, Ralphsdale, the demesne of which is entered by a beautiful gate; and Drumcree, the residence of Robert Smyth, Esq., to whom the whole parish belongs, and in whose demesne is a fine lake. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, episcopally united in 1818 to the rectory of Dysertale and the vicarage of Kilweilagh, and in 1821 to the rectory of Killagh: this parish and Dysertale are in the patronage of the Bishop; Kilweilagh is in the gift of the Marquess of Drogheda, and Killagh in that of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £90; and the gross value of the benefice, including tithe and glebe, separate from its episcopal union, is £170. The church, a handsome place of worship, was rebuilt in 1811, chiefly at the charge of the late William Smyth, Esq., proprietor of Drumcree, and father of the present owner of that estate: towards defraying the cost, which exceeded £2300, the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £850. The Board also lent £450 for the erection of the glebe-house: the glebe of Kilcumney comprises 36 acres, part unreclaimed bog; and there is a glebe of 18 acres at Killagh, valued at £20 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of St. Mary and St. Feighan, or Collinstown. A hermitage existed here in the ninth century.—See DRUMCREE.

KILCUMREAGH, or KILCOMRAGH, a parish, in the union of ATHLONE, partly in the barony of KILCOURSEY, KING'S county, partly in that of CLONLONAN, but chiefly in that of MOYCASHEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (E. N. E.) from Moat-a-Grenogue, and on the road from Dublin to Athlone; containing 3922 inhabitants. This parish comprises 9257 statute acres, mostly of good quality, and including a small quantity of bog and some limestone. The seats are Ballintobber, Rosemount, Grouse Lodge, and Springfield. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, formiog part of the union of Ardnorcher; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. The tithe rent-charge is £187. 6. 9., of which £111. 0. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; there is a glebe of 105¼ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmanaghan and Kilcumreagh, and has a chapel at Ballagh. A monastery of Dominican friars was founded at Ballintubber, in 1488, by Edmund de Lantu Laici, and was granted to Henry Matthews at the Dissolution. Here are the ruins of a church, and of an old fort; also several raths.

KILCURFIN.—See CARRIGTOHILL.

KILDALKEY, a parish, in the union of TRIM, barony of LUNE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Athboy, on the road from that place to Kinnegad; containing 3055 inhabitants, of whom 179 are in the village. The parish comprises 10,415½ statute acres; about one-half is in tillage, and there are 500 acres of bog, and a good limestone-quarry. The village contains 32 houses, and fairs are held there on Feb. 27th, May 14th, Aug. 9th, and Dec. 13th. Moyrath Castle was built in 1219, by Lord Geoffry de Montemarisco, and was subsequently a seat of the Nugent family, but is now the property of Henry Grattan, Esq. The parish is in the diocese of Meath: the rectory is impropriate in Joseph Ashe, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Athboy; the tithe rent-charge is £285, the whole of which is payable to the impropriator. There is also a district curacy comprising the parish of Kildalkey, the minister of which has a stipend paid by the bishop, the Earl of Darnley, and the Additional Curates' Fund Society. A large and commodious school-house, built in 1842 by subscription and aid from the Board of Erasmus Smith's charity, on a site presented by H. Potterton, Esq., has been licensed for divine worship. Kildalkey, in the Roman Catholic divisions, is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Killoghconnoghan and Castle-Rickard, and containing two chapels, of which the chapel here is a neat modern building. The Earl of Darnley, some years ago, gave an acre of land and £20 towards the erection of a school-house, and J. Stack Murphy, Esq., subscribed £20: that gentleman also contributed £30 towards the erection of a school at Carnisle. A third school is under the Church Education Society. The late Mr. Hodgens, of Dublin, bequeathed £1000 for the erection of almshouses, and £60 per annum for the inmates, who must be natives of this parish; but they have not yet been erected.

KILDALLOCK.—See KILDOLLOGH.

KILDALLON, a parish, in the barony of TULLYHUNCO, or TULLOGHONOHO, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Killeshandra, on the road from that place to Ballyconnell; containing 4480 inhabitants. It comprises 11,989¼ statute acres, of which 211½ are water; 3233 acres are applotted under the Tithe act, and there is a large tract of waste, called Ballyheady moor: the land is chiefly cultivated by spade husbandry. At Ardlougher is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Ballyconnell and Killesandra. The principal seats are Greenville, Aughabawn, Mackenwood, Belberry, and Carn. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £152. 6. The church is a handsome building with a tower, erected in 1816, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £1000; it was enlarged in 1827, by a further loan of £400. The Board also gave £100 and lent £1200 for the erection of the glebe-house: the glebes comprise 339 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Tomregan, and containing a chapel in each: the chapel here is a large building, with a neatly planted burial-ground. At Croghan is a Presbyterian meeting-house in connexion with the General Assembly. On the summit of the hill of Carn is a heap of stones surrounded by a Danish rath; at Drumboo or Drumbagh is a holy well, at which patrons have been held.

KILDANGAN, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of OPHALY WEST, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Kildare, and on the river Barrow; containing 115 inhabitants. It comprises 988¾ statute acres, almost equally divided between pasturage and tillage. A patent exists for three fairs, but none are held. Kildangan Castle is situated in a highly improved and well-planted demesne, formed by the taste and skill of the late proprietor, D. W. O'Reilly, Esq. A large and ancient castle is said by tradition to have stood here, which was destroyed during the civil wars by the rival factions of the Fitzgeralds, and the O'Dempseys, viscounts of Clanmalire; it was rebuilt on a smaller scale, but was soon afterwards accidentally burnt. The castle, with his other possessions, was forfeited in 1641 by Maurice Fitzgerald, of Allen, and became the property of an ancestor of the present owner, in the early part of the last century: it is a ruin in high preservation, beautifully ornamented with ivy, and stands in the centre of the demesne. The parish is in the diocese of Kildare, and the rectory forms part of the union of Nurney: the tithe rent-charge is £34. 9. 6. The church is in ruins, the roof having fallen in about 1812. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kildangan is in the district of Monastereven, and contains a very handsome chapel, built at the expense of the late D. W. O'Reilly, Esq.

KILDARE (County of), and inland county of the province of LEINSTER, bounded on the east by the counties of Dublin and Wicklow, on the north by Meath, on the west by the King's and Queen's counties, and on the south by Carlow. It extends from 52° 51′ to 53° 26′ (N. Lat.), and from 6° 30′ to 7° 12′ (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of 418,436 statute acres, of which 356,787 are arable land, 51,854 uncultivated, 8288 in plantations, 490 under towns and villages, and 1017 under water. The population, in 1821, was 99,065; in 1831, to 108,424; and in 1841, to 114,488.

This county, in the time of Ptolemy, was principally inhabited by the Coriundi, whose territory lay to the west of the rivers Liffey and Slaney, being bounded on the north and west by the Boyne and the Barrow, and having the tribes of the Cauci and Menapii on the east, the Eblani on the north, and the Brigantes on the south. Subsequently, the district of Caellan, or Galen, included the greater part of the present county, together with a part of those of Wicklow and Carlow; the county of Kildare portion being bounded on the east by the Wicklow mountains, on the south and west by the Barrow, and on the north by the Liffey and the Bog of Allen. This latter name signifies the woody country, by much the greater part having been an extensive forest, many traces of which are still discernible in the bogs. The native chieftains of the district were the heads of the family of Hy Caellan, or M'Kelly, whose principal residence was at Rath-Ardscull, near Athy. The last aboriginal owner of this fortress, Gicrode Crone M'Kelly, defended it against the efforts of the English during his life: after his decease the country was possessed by the Fitzgeralds, the Fitz-Henrys, and the Keatings. The territory of the O'Tothils or O'Tooles, who ruled over the southern part of the county of Wicklow, extended into this county; Tristledermot, or Castledermot, being one of their places of residence.

After the landing of the English, and upon the death of Dermod M'Murrough, last king of Leinster, which occurred soon after, this county devolved upon STRONGBOW, in right of his wife Eva, as part of the kingdom, or, as it was called by the English, the palatinate, of Leinster; and it is generally considered to have been one of the twelve counties into which the part of the island that acknowledged the British jurisdiction was divided by King John. But it was not till the end of the reign of Edward I., in 1296, that an act was passed for separating a large district from the county of Dublin, and more especially for constituting Kildare, which had been a liberty appendant to the county of Dublin, a shire of itself, discharged from the jurisdiction of the Dublin sheriff, and having county officers of its own. In the general division of Kildare among the first English settlers, by Strongbow and his heirs, Carbery was given to Meyler Fitz-Henry; and Naas Offallia, to Maurice Fitzgerald, from whom the three great families of Kildare, Kerry, and Desmond descended: Narragh was assigned to Robert, and Adam Fitz-Hereford had Salt, with its appendages. On the division of the palatinate of Leinster among the five coheiresses of William Marshal, who had inherited in right of his wife Isabel, Strongbow's only daughter, the county of Kildare was given to the fourth daughter, Sibilla, who married William de Ferrars, Earl of Derby. William de Vescy succeeded in right of his wife Agnes, the only daughter of this marriage; but he lost the property shortly after in consequence of his fleeing into France to avoid a single combat with John Fitzgerald, who had charged him with treason; and his possessions were bestowed on his accuser. In 1234, Richard Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, the successor of William, having united with the O'Conors against the English government, was killed in a battle on the Curragh of Kildare by the Lord Justice, aided by the Fitzgeralds, De Lacys, and Burghs. The power of the Fitzgeralds, or Geraldines, from this period became paramount in the county; insomuch that, in 1264, Richard de Rupella, lord justice, was made prisoner, together with the Lords Theobald Butler and John Cogan, by Maurice Fitzgerald, who had come to a conference at Castledermot, in order to put an end to a dispute between the Geraldines and Burghs.

The county is partly within the diocese of Dublin, but chiefly in that of Kildare. For purposes of CIVIL jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Carbery, Clane, Connell, Ikeathy and Oughterany, Kilcullen, Kilkea and Moone, East Narragh and Rheban, West Narragh and Rheban, East Ophaly, West Ophaly, North Naas, South Naas, North Salt, and South Salt. It contains the assize and market towns of Naas and Athy; the ancient disfranchised borough and market town of Kildare; the market and post towns of Kilcock, Maynooth, Celbridge, Monastereven, Timolin, Rathangan, Leixlip, Kilcullen-Bridge, and Newbridge; and the post-towns of Castledermot, Clane, and Ballytore: the largest villages are Prosperous, Kill, Johnstown-Bridge, and Sallins. Prior to the Union it sent ten members to the Irish parliament,—two knights of the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs of Naas, Athy, Kildare, and Harristown; but since that period its representation has been confined to the two members for the county at large. The constituency, as registered in 1841, was 978, of whom 310 were £50, 129 £20, and 539 £10, voters. The election, if held between the spring and summer assizes, takes place at Naas; if at any other period of the year, at Athy. The county is included in the Home circuit: the spring assize is held at Naas, and the summer assize at Athy, at each of which are a county court-house and gaol. The general quarter-sessions are held at Athy and Maynooth in January, at Kildare and Naas in April, at Maynooth and Athy in July, and at Naas and Kildare in October. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 14 deputy-lieutenants, and 53 other magistrates, with the usual county officers, including two coroners. There are 45 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, 5 sub-inspectors, 6 head-constables, 40 constables, and 200 sub-constables, with 7 horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £11,477, defrayed by grand jury presentments and by government. The district lunatic asylum for the county is at Carlow, and the county infirmary at Kildare; there are fever hospitals at Celbridge, Naas, Athy, and Kilcullen; and dispensaries at Athy, Ballitore, Castledermot, Celbridge, Clane, Donadea, Johnstown-Bridge Kilcock, Kilcullen, Maynooth, Monastereven, Naas, Newbridge, Rathangan, and Robertstown: the infirmary and fever hospitals are supported by grand jury presentments, and the dispensaries by equal presentments and voluntary subscriptions. The total amount of the grand jury presentments for 1844 was £20,800. In the military arrangements Kildare is included in the Dublin district, and contains three barrack stations; two for cavalry at Newbridge and Athy, and one for infantry at Naas.

The general SURFACE is rather level. In the barony of West Ophaly, however, are several gently rising hills, and others occur towards the eastern boundary of the county: the greatest elevation of the plain country is around Naas. Both of the baronies of Naas, and their vicinity, present an appearance of great fertility, which is also exhibited generally throughout the eastern and southern, and a portion of the western parts of the county; but towards the north and north-west are vast tracts of the Bog of Allen, comprising more than 50,000 acres, having a flat dreary surface, relieved here and there by verdant elevations, called "islands." Near the southern extremity of this immense bog are the hills of Grange Allen, Cheelow, Dunmurry, Redhills, and Knocknagylogh, generally fertile, and cultivated to the summit. There are also small hills in the vicinity of Timolin and Moone; others stretching from Killan, by Kilrush, Davidstown, Calverstown, and Thomastown, and terminating in the hills of Old Kilcullen and Ballysax; and small detached elevations near Arthurstown, Lyons, Longtown, &c.

The Bog of Allen and the Curragh of Kildare are two distinguishing features of the county. Most of the bogs which lie eastward of the Shannon, occupying considerable portions of Kildare and the King's county, comprehended, in common parlance, under the former of these names, The Bog of Allen, which does not, therefore, apply to any single morass. On the contrary, the tracts of bog to which it bears reference are often separated by high ridges of dry land inclining towards different rivers, as their natural vents for drainage. The portion of the bog within Kildare lies, as before observed, in the northern part of the county; and near its southern margin, the Island of Allen (a name given to an elevated tract of cultivated soil), surrounded like an oasis in the African desert by the solitude of the uninhabited morass, presents a gratifying feature of variety; it rises abruptly from the bog, is nearly conical, and composed of limestone-gravel. Towards the west is the Hill of Allen, a steep elevation of a conical form, about 300 feet in height. The Curragh is a fine undulating down, six miles long and two broad: it lies in a direction from north-east to south-west, having the town of Kildare near its western extremity, and being crossed by the great road from Dublin to Limerick; and is, in fact, an extensive sheep-walk of above 6000 acres, forming a more beautiful lawn than the hand of art ever made. Nothing can exceed the extreme softness and elasticity of the turf, which is of a verdure that charms the eye, and is still further set off by the gentle inequality of the surface: the soil is a fine dry loam on a substratum of limestone. It is depastured by numerous large flocks turned on it by the occupiers of the adjacent farms, who alone have the right of pasture, which greatly enhances the value of these farms. The plain has long been celebrated as the principal race-ground in Ireland, and is equal, if not superior, to that of Newmarket, in all the requisites for this sport.

The SOIL varies but little, as compared with that of some adjoining counties. The prevailing is deep and mellow, in some parts inclining to clay, but principally a rich loam, varying from 10 to 16 inches in depth, and resting on a hard and compact substratum, in some places impervious to water; when first turned up it is cold and arid, but when mellowed by the influence of the atmosphere, it becomes fertile. In some parts the upper, or surface, soil rests on a substratum of limestone-gravel; in others, on limestone, or clay-slate. In general the county is fertile and well cultivated, particularly around Athy, and thence along the banks of the Barrow, extending to the borders of the county of Carlow. The districts around the towns of Kildare, Naas, Kill, and Clane are also fertile, well fenced, and tolerably well cultivated; but in wet seasons much water remains on the surface, shewing the want of a good system of drainage, which is much neglected. Agriculture is systematically practised in some parts, especially by the noblemen and resident gentlemen, and their example is beginning to produce its beneficial effects among the small farmers. Wheat is cultivated generally, and the quality is remarkably good; the barley is also bright and sound; the oats are good, clean, and heavy, except in a few low, cold, and clayey situations. Potatoes are extensively grown, and in great varieties of sorts, large quantities being sent to Dublin; turnips and mangel-wurzel are cultivated by a great number of the wealthy farmers, clover and vetches by nearly all; and rape is grown extensively around Monastereven.

The Scotch plough is general, the old heavy wooden plough being rarely seen; indeed, agricultural implements of all kinds are greatly improved, except the spade, which is still a long narrow tool. The heavy wooden wheel-car has given place to one of much lighter construction, with low spoke-wheels, iron-bound; the kish, so general in the western counties, is scarcely ever seen here; some of the vehicles are made exactly after the plan of the Scotch cart, some of them with, and some without, the high sides. Great attention is manifested in collecting manure, and large composts are raised in the vicinity of bogs by the mixture of bog-mould and stable-manure or ashes. The burning of subsoil in kilns was introduced by the late Mr. Rawson, who compiled the statistical survey of Kildare for the Royal Dublin Society; and has now become general, producing the finest crops of potatoes and turnips. A kind of indurated sand found in banks, and the adhesive property of which is so great that the bank, when cut perpendicularly, will never yield in any kind of weather, is considered by some agriculturists as a sort of golden mine for the farmer who can avail himself of the benefit of it. The cottagers in the neighbourhood of the Curragh collect the sheep-dung, which they mix in tubs with water, stirring it until it forms a thick solution, which they call "mulch;" in this they steep the roots of their cabbage plants for some hours; a quantity of the substance consequently sticks to the roots, and ensures a full crop. In the smaller farms a very disadvantageous custom is prevalent of dividing the land into long narrow inclosures, which occasions an unnecessary and therefore injurious extent of fence in proportion to the land included. The fences generally are tolerably good, but they every where occupy too much ground; the usual kind is a bank of earth thrown up from a wide ditch, and covering five or six feet of surface, so that the bank and ditch seldom occupy less than nine feet in width: in the breast of this bank, about halfway up, a single row of quicksets is placed, sometimes accompanied by seedlings of forest-timber.

In those parts which have not been subjected to tillage are very rich fattening grounds; but where the soil has been much exhausted by the plough, the pasture is poor and light. The grasses in the meadows and feeding pastures are of the most valuable kinds; in low bottoms, especially in those subject to floods, Timothy grass is the principal herbage. Dairies of any extent are not frequent, except in parts convenient to the Dublin market, where they are kept for the purpose of fattening calves. Great improvement has been made in the breed of CATTLE, the old long-horned Irish cow being now rarely seen. The most esteemed are the short-horned or Dutch breed, crossed with the Durham; some of the gentry and wealthy farmers have introduced the pure Durham breed, which commands large prices; others have the North Devon, which also answers remarkably well. The small farmers mostly prefer the old Irish long-horned cow, crossed with the Durham; and in some districts scarce any other is seen: in the northern baronies, bordering on Meath, the large and heavy long-horned cattle are very common, and grow to a size equal to those of Meath or Westmeath. Great numbers of cattle are brought from other counties, and fed here for the Dublin market. Much improvement has been made in the breed of sheep, and vast flocks are every year reared on the Curragh: the prevailing breed is a cross between the New Leicester and the Ayrshire, but many of the principal agriculturists have the pure New Leicester; sometimes they are crossed with the Kerry sheep. The lower class of farmers have brood mares as part of their tillage stock, but they do not pay sufficient attention to the breed of the sires, and are too desirous of crossing with racers. Planting has been carried on for many years extensively and successfully. Many of the demesnes are ornamented with full-grown timber. The timber-sallow thrives particularly well in the wet grounds with which the county abounds; beech and larch are also of very quick growth. In the demesne of Moore Abbey is one of the best-planted hills in Ireland; and the woods of Carton and Palmerstown are extensive, and the timber remarkably fine. In draining the bogs, remains of ancient forests have been discovered.

The GEOLOGY of Kildare may next be noticed. The great mountain range of granite of which the county of Wicklow is nearly composed, terminates in this county at Castledermot. Thence by Ballitore, Kilcullen, and to the south-east of Naas, almost as far as Rathcoole, is clay-slate; the rest of the county belongs to the great field of floetz limestone which covers the larger part of the flat country of Ireland, and which is here interrupted only by the chain of central hills. The low group of hills west of Rathcoole, which includes windmill Hill, Athgoe, Lyons, and Rusty Hill, is composed of clay-slate, greywacke, greywacke-slate, and granite. The greywacke consists of small, finely rounded, and angular grains of quartz, numerous minute scales of mica, small fragments of clay-slate, and sometimes portions of felspar. The rock at Windmill Hill ranges 10° north of east and south of west, which is the general direction of these hills, exhibiting also at times an undulating curved slaty formation: the dip is towards the south-west, and generally at an angle of about 45°. The greywacke-slate of Windmill Hill is remarkable for containing subordinate beds of granite, the uppermost at the depth of four fathoms; they are 50 or 60 yards apart, separated by the greywacke-slate, and all dip from 45° to 50° to the south-east. Some of these granite beds may be traced westward to the turnpike-road opposite to Rusty Hill: they consist of a small and finely grained intermixture of yellowish and greyish white felspar, greyish vitreous transparent quartz, and flakes or scales of mica, white and silvery, with some scattered portions of schorl; the grains are sometimes so minute that the stone appears almost compact. Occasionally also small particles and cubical chrystals of iron pyrites are disseminated through the rock, which, when decomposing, communicate an iron-shot spotted appearance to the stone. The red sandstone conglomerate occurs in situ at the northern foot of the Hill of Lyons, where it is exposed for about 10 fathoms in length, in strata four feet thick, ranging east and west, dipping 30° to the north, and resting on greywacke-slate; it re-appears in the central range. Red Hill, Dunmurry Hill, and the western foot of Grange Hill, consist of alternating beds of finely grained greywacke, greywacke-slate, and clay-slate, ranging 10° north of east and south of west, and dipping 60° towards the south-east, but in many places being nearly vertical. At the northern foot of Red Hill is a small patch of red sandstone conglomerate, which was quarried for millstones some years since: enough of the firm rock is visible to shew that the strata range east and west, and dip 17° west.

The Chair of Kildare consists of floetz limestone, extending southwards to the northern foot of Dunmurry Hill, and covering the greywacke and slaty rocks: to the north it rests on the trap of Grange Hill, which also covers the same kind of rock. Strictly speaking, these two elevations are but parts of the same hill, with a slight hollow between them. The floetz limestone of the latter appears to be disposed in massy strata, from four to five feet thick, dipping 45° towards the south-east: it is generally greyish-white, but sometimes mottled reddish-brown, being intermixed with shades of blueish-white and grey; and it contains bivalves and entrochites. In its outgoing to the north-west the limestone presents a rocky face, or small escarpment, beyond which is a slight hollow forming the southern face of Grange Hill. In the road leading to the hill, above the rock which appears at the surface, is compact greenstone, in some places porphyritic: but near the surface it is easily frangible, and being much decomposed acquires almost the appearance of wacke. From the dip of the limestone and the general form of the Chair of Kildare, it is highly probable that the greenstone is subjacent to the limestone; an opinion confirmed by the fact that the greenstone just described contains marine exuviæ, and, where adjacent to the limestone, appears to be intermingled with calcareous matter. The organic remains are principally bivalves, ammonites, and terebratulites, with entrochites in smaller number. These organic remains seem to be confined to that portion of the rock which is in the vicinity of the limestone; for none can be discerned in the remaining mass of the hill, which exhibits every where rocky protuberances from one continuous body of grecnstone and porphyry. The only other rock visible is clay-slate, standing in strata nearly vertical; it appears low down on the western side, and at the base of the hill in that quarter.

The Hill of Allen is separated from Grange Hill by an intervening vale, their summits being about two miles apart: it is composed of one great body of granular and compact greenstone and greenstone-porphyry, which appears all round the base, on the sides, and on the summit, in numerous protuberant rocky masses, without any mark of stratification. Some of the greenstone is remarkably crystalline, consisting of large masses of hornblende, with crystals of felspar. Whether this hill be a distinct mass or connected with Grange Hill is not easily ascertained, from the depth of the alluvial soil. About a quarter of a mile from the northern extremity of the Hill of Allen is a slight eminence called the Leap of Allen, composed of red sandstone conglomerate, arranged in beds which vary from 9 to 18 inches and even to $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet thick, and are separated by thin layers of reddish sandy slate-clay. It contains the same components as the conglomerate already noticed, with the addition of fragments of greywacke-slate, which are, however, comparatively rare; it is quarried for millstones. The beds range north-north-east and south-south-west, dipping south-south-east at an angle of from 15° to 20°, and therefore they probably underlie and support the trap of the Hill of Allen. Indications of Copper having been observed in Dunmurry Hill, miners were employed to explore them in 1786, when detached masses of sulphuret of copper were found of nearly 40 per cent. purity, accompanied with a strong vitriolic water: the principal bed seemed to lie deep in the hill, and even to dip under the adjoining valley. Near the base of the hill was also found an alkaline argillaceous earth of a light-grey colour, possessing many of the qualities of fullers'-earth. In the veins of the rocks, and in the matrix of the ore, were quantities of fine yellow ochre proper for painting. The surface of the Hill of Allen also presents indications of copper: the loose stones and the projecting points of rock appear as if vitrified by fire, and in many places impregnated with carbonate of copper.

Several attempts were made near the close of the last century to establish the cotton manufacture, and some mills were built near Clane, Leixlip, and other places, but they all fell to decay. A very large mill for manufacturing cotton was, however, built a few years since at Inchyguire, near Ballytore, which is still in full operation; and a small woollen manufacture is carried on at Celbridge. But these are the only manufactures of note which the county possesses, although the numerous falls on the rivers offer most advantageous sites for the erection of works, and there is great facility for the transit of goods. All the small rivers abound with trout, and the Barrow formerly gave a copious supply of salmon, yet there are now no fisheries: the weirs thrown across this river for forming mill-dams have presented such impediments to the passage of the fish, that they are nearly banished from it.

Among the principal rivers is the Boyne, which rises in the Bog of Allen, in the parish of Carbery, close on the boundary of the King's county, running along which it enters the county of Meath at Clonard, and, passing by the towns of Trim, Navan, and Slane, flows into the sea at Drogheda: its principal tributaries are the Blackwater and Deel, in Meath. The Barrow enters the county from the Queen's county; it forms the greater portion of the western boundary of Kildare, and passing by the towns of Monastereven and Athy, enters Carlow at the parish of Painstown: in its course it is joined by the Feagile, the Little Barrow, the Finnery, the Gris, and the Ler or Lune. The Liffey enters the county from that of Dublin at Kilteel, and running a circuitous course to Leixlip, receives the Rye water, which forms part of the northern boundary of Kildare, and its tributary the Lyreen: it also receives the Morrel between Celbridge and Clane. The Grand Canal enters this county near Lyons, nine miles from Dublin, and quits it for the King's county near the source of the Boyne, in the Bog of Allen. Near Sallins it is carried over the Liffey by an elegant aqueduct, whence a branch leads to the town of Naas; and from Naas is another branch to Harbourstown, in the direction of Kilcullen, which was intended to be continued to Wexford. From Robertstown, just where the canal enters the Bog of Allen, a branch diverges, and passing through the Queen's county falls into the Barrow at Athy, opening a communication with Carlow, New Ross, and Waterford. From this line a branch, called the Miltown canal, leaves it near Robertstown, and proceeds in the direction of the Curragh; and at Monastereven, where the Athy line crosses the Barrow by a noble aqueduct, another branch leaves it for Portarlington and Mountmellick. The summit level of the canal is in this county, from which each branch is amply supplied with water in the driest seasons without the expense of a reservoir. The Royal Canal enters near Leixlip, seven miles from Dublin, and passes a little south of Maynooth and Kilcock to Nicholastown, near which it leaves this county and enters Meath; it re-enters it by an aqueduct over the Blackwater, and continues to the Boyne, over which it is conveyed by an aqueduct, again entering Meath near Clonard.

Among the existing RELICS of ANTIQUITY are five ancient round towers, situated at Kildare, Taghadoe, Kilcullen, Oughterard, and Castledermot; the first is the most remarkable. Raths are numerous. Three miles south-east of Athy, that called the Moat of Ardscull stands prominent. A mile farther is the Hill of Carmon, which was the Naasteighan, or place where the assembly of the states of the southern part of Leinster was held: here are sixteen small conical hills, supposed to be the seats on which the elders sat. Not far from the rath is a single pillar-stone, called Gobhlan, about seven feet high, supposed to have been erected for the worship of Baal. Similar stones are to be seen at Kilgowan, Furnace, and Punch's Town, all in the vicinity of Naas. At Harristown, near Kilcullen, is another of those taper upright stones, with a conical top; and about two miles from Jigginstown are two, known by the name of the Long Stones. The rath of Knock-Caellagh, near Kilcullen, consists of a tumulus surrounded by a circular intrenchment, 20 feet wide and 10 deep, with a rampart outside the trench: Cromwell is said to have encamped here on his way to the south. Others less remarkable, yet worthy of notice, are to be seen near Rheban, two miles north of Athy, at Kildare, at Naas, near Kilkea Castle, at Moone, at Clane, at Lyons (across which rath the boundary line of the counties of Kildare and Dublin passes), and at Rathsallagh, near Duncavan. On the Curragh are numerous earthworks, most of which appear to be sepulchral, forming a chain of fourteen small raths or circular intrenchments without ramparts, in a line of nearly three miles, extending east and west. A tradition has long prevailed of a stupendous heathen monument of huge stones existing here; but no vestige of it can now be discovered.

There were many celebrated and richly endowed MONASTIC institutions in the county. At Athy was one for Crouched friars and another for Dominicans. Castledermot possessed a priory for Regular Canons, a house of Crouched friars, and a Franciscan abbey, the ruins of which last still serve to attest its former magnificence. The ruins of another Franciscan abbey are to be seen at Clane, where was also a house for Regular Canons. At Graney are the ruins of an Augustinian nunnery; and a gateway and some other remains of a monastic building, said to have belonged to the Knights Templars, are still shewn there. The ruins of Great Connell Abbey are on the banks of the Liffey, near Newbridge. In Kildare was a nunnery and abbey united, founded by St. Bridget, and of which the ruins are still pointed out; also an abbey of Grey friars, situated south of the town, and a house of Carmelites or White friars. At Old Kilcullen is a monastery as old as the time of St. Patrick, which in 1115 was elevated to the dignity of an episcopal see; but it does not appear that it long retained that rank. Near the ruins of the old church are the remains of two crosses, one of which still retains some very curious specimens of ancient sculpture. Maynooth had a convent of Black nuns, and a college of priests founded by the Earl of Kildare; the abbey of Killossy has been converted into the parish church, and is remarkable for the singularity of the architecture of its steeple tower; the monastery of Kilrush was surrounded by a broad ditch faced with masonry ten feet high; the abbey of Monastereven has been converted into the residence of the Moore family, the representative of which is the Marquess of Drogheda. At Moone was a Franciscan friary, the brotherhood of which retained possession of it subsequently to the Reformation: here is a fragment of a very old cross, one of the most curious in Ireland, covered with numerous grotesque figures. In Naas were three religious establishments; namely, a convent of Augustiniaus, another of Dominicans, and one for friars Eremites of the order of St. Augustine. Some remains of the buildings of New Abbey, on the banks of the Liffey, are still to be seen; and of St. Wolstan's, also on the Liffey, near Celbridge, two towers and two gateways yet exist. Timolin had a monastery of Regular Canons, and a nunnery; at Tully, a mile south of Kildare, was a preceptory of the Knights Templars, the possessions of which are held in in commendam with the bishopric of Kildare: the abbeys of Clonagh, Cloncurry, Disert-Fulertagh, Glasnaoidhun, Grangenolvin, Kilbeggs, Knocknacrioth, Leixlip, and Tulachfobhair, are known only by name.

The remains of many castles are scattered through the county: the principal were Kilkea, Athy, Castledermot, Rheban, Kilberry, Woodstock, Timolin, Castle-Carbery, Ballyteague, Clane, Rathcoffy, Donadea, Lackagh, Kildare, Leixlip, Corifig, Morrestown-Nenagh, Cloncurry, and Maynouth. The modern mansions of the nobility and gentry are noticed in the articles on the parishes in which they are respectively situated. The farmhouses in general consist of a long thatched building of one story, containing in the centre a large kitchen, with lodging-rooms at each end: the front door opens into a yard, here called a bawn, on the sides of which are the out-buildings. The COTTIERS' cabins exhibit a mode of construction different from that of the more northern districts; the lower half being built of stone and clay-mortar, and the upper of clay or sods, topped with a thick covering of straw thatch. Oatmeal, potatoes, herrings, and some milk and butter, constitute the food of the poorer class; their fuel is turf; their clothing principally home-made frieze. Even in the midst of summer a heavy frieze loose coat, called a "trusty," is worn over the rest of the garments. The dress of the women is much better than it formerly was. The circumstances and appearance of the population located on the bogs, or their immediate vicinity, are very unfavourable. On each side of those parts of the Grand Canal that pass through the Bog of Allen, the land is let in small lots to turf-cutters, who take up their residence on the spot, however dreary and uncomfortable. Their first care is to excavate a site for a habitation on the driest bank that can be selected, the hovel being sunk so deep that little more than the roof is visible; this is covered with scanty thatch, or, more frequently, with turf pared from the bog and laid with the herbage upwards, which so perfectly assimilates with the aspect of the surrounding scenery that the eye would pass over the spot unnoticed, were it not undeceived by the appearance of children and domestic animals sallying from a hole in one side, and by the occasional gush of smoke from the numerous chinks in the roof. The English language is every where spoken. The customs of gossipred and fosterage are closely adhered to. Gossips will fight most pertinaciously for each other; in all conversations they call each other by the endearing name; and not to have gossips at baptism would cast a deep reflection on the parents.

KILDARE, a market and post town, a parish, and the seat of a diocese, in the union of NAAS, partly in the barony of CONNELL, but chiefly in that of EAST OPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Naas, and 25 miles (W. S. W.) from Dublin, on the coach-road to Limerick; containing 2654 inhabitants, of whom 1629 are in the town. This place derived its name either from Chille-dara, "the wood of oaks," or from Kill-dara, "the cell or church of the oaks," on account of the situation of the first Christian church founded here among trees of that kind. The source of its ancient importance appears to have been the foundation of a MONASTERY by St. Bridget, the daughter of a native Irish chieftain, who in the fifth century is said to have received the veil from the hands of St. Patrick. This monastery, which was both for monks and nuns under the same roof, and had only one church, soon caused other habitations to be erected on the spot, which, on its being subsequently made the seat of an episcopal see, became a town of importance. It is recorded that, in 638, Aed Dubh, or Black Hugh, King of Leinster, resigned his authority, and took the habit of the Augustine order in this monastery, of which he afterwards became abbot and bishop. The town and monastery were consumed by fire in 770, and again about four years after; and in 830 they suffered greatly from the depredation of Ceallach Mac Brann, who slew many of the clergy in their own house. Farannan, abbot of Armagh, attended by a retinue of his clergy, visited the abbey in 835; and during his stay, Fethlemid, at the head of an armed force, seized the church and carried off the clergy prisoners. In the following year, a Danish fleet of thirty ships arrived in the river Liffey, and another also in the Boyne, and, making an irruption into the country, not only plundered every church and abbey within the territories of Magh-Liffe and Magh-Breagh, but also destroyed the town with fire and sword, and carried away the shrines of St. Bridget and St. Conlaeth.

From this period till the commencement of the 11th century, the annals of Kildare present only a continued series of Danish rapine and massacre; and scarcely had the ravages of these invaders ceased, when the town was plundered by the people of Hyfaolan. It was either wholly or in part destroyed by fire in 1038, 1040, 1071, 1088, and 1089; and, in 1135, the abbess of the monastery was forcibly taken from her cloister by Dermod Mac Murrough, King of Leinster, who compelled her to marry one of his followers; on which occasion not less than 170 inhabitants of the town and inmates of the abbey were slaughtered. Till the time of the English invasion, the town and monastery were continually exposed to depredation by fire and sword; but shortly after that event, one of the English adventurers who had obtained possession of this territory erected a castle for its defence. In 1220, the sacred fire, which had been maintained here from the time of St. Bridget, was extinguished by Henry de Londres, archbishop of Dublin; it was, however, soon afterwards rekindled, and continued to burn till the Reformation. In 1260, a monastery was founded by William de Vescy, for Grey friars, which was completed by Gerald Fitzmaurice, Lord Offaly; the same William also founded a convent for Carmelite friars in 1290; and in 1294, Calbhach O'Connor of Offaly took the town and castle by force, and destroyed all the rolls of the Earl of Kildare. A parliament was held here in 1309, or the beginning of the following year; and in 1316, the castle and town were granted to John Fitzgerald, who was at that time created Earl of Kildare; but in the wars during the reign of Elizabeth, the town was reduced to a state of entire ruin and depopulation. In 1641, the castle was garrisoned by the Earl of Castlehaven, but in 1647 was taken by Colonel Jones for the parliament; it fell again into the hands of the Irish, but was finally retaken by the Lord-Lieutenant in 1649. During the disturbances of 1798, 2000 of the insurgents, under a leader named Perkins, having agreed to surrender themselves on the 28th of March, on condition of being allowed to return unmolested to their several homes, and of the liberation of Perkins' brother from the gaol of Naas, Major-General Sir James Duffe advanced at the head of 600 men to the Gibbet-rath on the Curragh, where they had assembled for that purpose; but some imprudent firing taking place on their part, they were charged by the troops, and more than 200 of them were killed.

The TOWN, consisting of 327 houses, is situated on boldly rising ground, and, from the numerous remains of its ancient religious edifices, and its former importance, is a place of considerable interest. It is badly supplied with water, raised from a very deep well near the market-house, by a forcing pump, into a public cistern; the principal streets are portions of the public roads, and are kept in repair by the county. Kildare is a great resort during the races, which are held on the Curragh in the last week of April, the second Monday in June, and the second Monday in October, when the king's plates are contested. A gift of two annual plates of £100 each was obtained through Sir W. Temple; and, in 1821, George IV. attended a meeting at this place. The Jockey Club have a house in the town, for the use of the members during the races, which are well attended and under good regulations. The Curragh is under the care of a ranger appointed by the crown, and is distinguished as the "Newmarket" of Ireland, not only as the principal race-meeting, but as a central spot for the breeding and training of the best horses in the country. No manufactures are carried on in the town, nor any trade except what arises from its public situation and for the supply of the neighbourhood. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on Feb. 12th, April 5th and 26th, May 12th, June 29th, and Sept. 19th: the market-house is a neat building. There is a constabulary police station. By charter of James II. the town was governed by a corporation consisting of a sovereign (who was a justice of the peace), two portreeves, 20 burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The charter was granted in the fourth year of the king's reign, and recites that the town of Kildare had been an ancient borough, but that its franchises, liberties, and privileges, had been seized into the sovereign's hands by a judgment of the court of exchequer; it then declares that the place shall be a free borough having the same boundaries as those it had formerly possessed, and lays down the necessary regulations for its government. The corporation returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to William, Duke of Leinster. The borough court had jurisdiction to the extent of five marks, but no proceedings have issued from it for several years; since 1828 neither sovereign nor any other officer has been elected, and the corporation is virtually extinct. The quarter-sessions for the county are held here in April and October, and petty-sessions every alternate Thursday.

KIL—DA

Arms of the late Bishopric.

The DIOCESE of KILDARE appears to have been founded towards the close of the 5th or about the commencement of the 6th century, by St Conlaeth or Conlaid, who, with the assistance of St. Bridget, then presiding over the monastery, erected the cathedral and became first bishop. The first English bishop was Ralph of Bristol, consecrated in 1223, who was at great expense in repairing and beautifying the cathedral. The first bishop after the Reformation was William Miagh, whom, in opposition to the Pope's appointment, and in vindication of his own supremacy, Henry VIII. advanced to the see, in 1540. During the prelacy of Alexander Craik, who succeeded in 1560, the see was reduced to great poverty by the alienation of several valuable manors, which that bishop exchanged with Patrick Sarsfield for some tithes of very inconsiderable value; and it was further impoverished by Bishop Pilsworth, in 1604, after a fruitless attempt to recover the alienated property. The estates which had been alienated to Sarsfield became forfeited to the king during the prelacy of Bishop Price, who succeeded in 1660, and might have been recovered by a clause in the Act of Settlement; but the bishop could not be prevailed upon to take the necessary measures at the time, and all the subsequent efforts of his successors were unavailing. Anthony Dopping, who succeeded in 1678, in consideration of the poverty of the see, procured the annexation of the preceptory of Tully, and several rectories in the diocese of Meath, to be held in commendam with the bishopric; and William, Dean of Christ Church, Dublin, who was advanced to the prelacy in 1681, was for the same reason allowed to retain his deanery, which was thenceforward held by the bishops of Kildare; who ranked next to the bishops of Meath, the other bishops taking precedency according to the dates of their consecration. Under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV., the see, on its recent avoidance, was annexed to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin, and its temporalities, including those held in commendam, are now vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

It is one of the sixteen dioceses which constitute the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, and comprehends part of Queen's county, a large portion of King's county, and the greater part of the county of Kildare; it is 36 miles in length and 23 in breadth, and comprises an estimated superficies of 332,200 acres, of which 49,000 are in Queen's county, 121,000 in King's county, and 161,000 in Kildare. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, and four canons; and there are an archdeacon, and the eight prebendaries of Lulliamore, Rathangan, Nurney, Ballysonan, Castropetre, Geashill, Harristown, and Donadea, who are not of the chapter, but have a vote in the election of the dean. The consistorial court, held in Kildare, is presided over by the vicar-general. In the registrar's office are the diocesan records, which consist of modern documents, those prior to 1641 having been lost during the insurrection. The total number of parishes in the diocese is 85, comprised in 41 benefices, of which 20 are unions of two or more parishes, and 21 single parishes: 12 benefices are in the patronage of the Crown, 10 in lay and Corporation patronage, 4 in joint or alternate presentation, and the remainder in the patronage of the Bishop or Incumbents. The total number of churches is 38, and of glebe-houses 19. The quantity of land belonging to the see is 911 acres; and the gross revenue of the bishop, including the preceptory of Tully and the deanery of Christ Church, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £6451. 13. The CATHEDRAL, dedicated to St. Bridget, was nearly destroyed in the parliamentary war, and the choir is now the only part kept in repair. The walls of the nave still remain, presenting some plain pointed arches, and those of the south transept are entire; but the north side of the tower, which rose between the nave and choir, is levelled with the ground. The choir, which is also the parochial church, has no interesting details; the south transept contains the sepulchral vault of the earls of Kildare. In the churchyard is a remarkable stone, reputed to be the pedestal of an ancient stone cross, but by some considered, and with an appearance of probability, to be the altar on which the "holy fire" was kept burning; in the surrounding walls are numerous fragments of sculptured monuments, removed from the interior of the cathedral, and of which several are curious both from their subjects and their execution. A few yards distant is a remaining portion of the chapel of St. Bridget, called "the Fire house," a low and narrow stone cell in which the sacred fire was preserved. There is neither chapter-house nor episcopal palace, nor are there residences for any of the dignitaries. In the Roman Catholic divisions the diocese is united with that of Leighlin, together forming one of the three suffragan dioceses to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin: the joint diocese comprises 46 parochial benefices or unions, containing 110 chapels served by 108 clergymen, of whom 46, including the bishop, are parish priests, and 62 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of the bishop is Carlow, near which is his residence, Braganza House. The cathedral, in Carlow, built during the prelacy of the Right Rev. Dr. Doyle, and chiefly through his exertions, is an edifice of much architectural elegance.

The parish comprises 9215½ statute acres. It is a rectory, appropriate to the dean and chapter: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is the head of a district, called Kildare and Rathangan, comprising the parishes of Kildare, Rathangan, Carne, Dunmurry, Pollardstown, Thomastown, Tully, Lackagh, and Knavenstown: there is a chapel in the town, and also one at Rathangan. Near the town chapel is a convent of nuns of the order of the Presentation, the sisters of which devote their time to the gratuitous instruction of poor girls; and not far from the ruins of the monastery of St. Bridget is a Carmelite friary, a neat building recently erected on the site of the ancient house of that order, and attached to which is a chapel. The county infirmary is situated in the town. About thirty yards from the church is an ancient round tower, 132 feet high, which within the last century has been crowned with graduated battlements; and part of the ancient castle is still remaining. On the Curragh, according to Giraldus Cambrensis, was formerly a circle of large stones, of which no traces remain; but there are numerous earthworks, most of which appear to have been sepulchral. On this plain, Richard Marshal, Earl of Pembroke and Earl Palatine of Leinster, who had been invited by De Burgo, De Lacy, and other lords to negotiate a truce, was betrayed by Geoffrey de Marisco, his attendant, into the power of his enemies, and put to death, in 1234. David O'Bnge, who, in the early part of the 14th century, was eminently distinguished as a philosopher, rhetorician, and divine, was a native of the town; he was provincial of the Carmelites in Ireland, and was interred in the monastery of that order at this place, of which he had been a friar. Kildare gives the inferior titles of Earl and Marquess to the Duke of Leinster.

KILDARTON, a district parish, in the poor-law union of ARMAGH, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (E.) from the city of Armagh. This district has been formed from the parishes of Armagh, Mullaghbrack, and Loughgall, and comprises 4875 statute acres, all arable land; it lies on the road from Armagh to Hamilton's-Bawn and Tanderagee, and includes Lowry's lough, which is on the borders of the three baronies of Armagh, O'Neilland West, and Lower Fews. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in hand-loom linen-weaving, which branch of industry is carried on in most of the farm and cotters' houses. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Incumbents of the parishes of Armagh, Mullaghbrack, and Loughgall, by turns. The church, a plain structure in the early English style, was built in 1841, at a cost of £950, whereof £233 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder from private sources; it affords accommodation for 350 persons. The Presbyterians have a small place of worship; and eight schools are supported by his Grace the Lord Primate and the Church Education Society. There are several Danish forts within this district. Lowry's lough, which is close to the church, supplies the city of Armagh with water.

KILDAVIN, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (S. by W.) from Wexford, on the road to Bridgetown; containing 1099 inhabitants, and comprising 3411¼ statute acres. It includes part of the mountain of Forth; the land is chiefly under tillage, and the state of agriculture gradually improving. Good building-stone is found in several places. At Mourntown Cross is a manufactory for coarse woollen-cloth, and blankets and flannel are also made here, chiefly for the neighbouring farmers, who supply their own wool. Kildavin is in the diocese of Ferns, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of St. Patrick's, Wexford: the tithe rent-charge is £93. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Piercestown: the chapel, at Mourntown, together with the school-house attached to it, was lately rebuilt by subscription, on an acre of ground presented by N. A. Vigors, Esq. A parochial house for the Roman Catholic clergyman has been also erected near the chapel. The old castle, or tower, of Rathlannan stands in that part of Johnstown deer-park which is in this parish; but of the castle of Mourntown, burnt during the disturbances in the early part of the 17th century, not a vestige can be traced.

KILDECAMOGUE, a parish, partly in the barony of CARRA, but chiefly in that of GALLEN, union of CASTLEBAR, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Castlebar, and on the road from Ballinrobe to Foxford; containing 3923 inhabitants. It comprises 7553½ statute acres. The surface is mountainous; the lands are almost exclusively under tillage, and there is a moderate proportion of bog. A customary market is held on Wednesday, during the winter; a fair is held at Keelogues on Sept. 6th, and fairs in the village of Ballyvary on May 29th, Aug. 17th, and Nov. 14th. The parish is in the diocese of Tuam, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Castlebar, and also of the perpetual curacy of Turlough: the tithe rent-charge is £96. 18. 6., payable to the incumbent of Castlebar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Turlough, and has a chapel at Keelogues. On the banks of a small river which flows from Lough Lanach into Lough Culleen, at Currawn, are the remains of an ancient fortress; and at Danganmore are the ruins of another.

KILDELLIG, or KILDELLYGLY, a parish, in the barony of CLARMALLAGH, union of ROSCREA, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3¾ miles (S. E. by S.) from Burros-in-Ossory, and on the road from Mountrath to Rathdowney; containing 342 inhabitants. It comprises 1251 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Rathdowney: the tithe rent-charge is £43. 2. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Aghaboe. A religious establishment existed here at an early period, the last mention of which is in 885, when the abbot was killed by the Danes.

KILDEMOCK, or KILDERNOCK, a parish, in the union and barony of ARDEE, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (S. S. E.) from Ardee, on the road from that place to Drogheda; containing 1104 inhabitants. It comprises 3246 statute acres, principally under tillage, with no waste or bog; there is a good limestone-quarry. At Drakestown is a constabulary police station. The parish is in the diocese of Armagh, and is a rectory forming part of the union of Ardee: the tithe rent-charge is £150. The glebe-house of the union, built in 1781, at an expense of £1010. 1., is situated here; the glebe comprises 40 acres, valued at £120 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ardee, and has a handsome chapel at Drakestown. The church is in ruins.

KILDERRY, a parish, in the barony of GOWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Kilkenny; containing 575 inhabitants. It comprises 2192¼ statute acres; and is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, until lately forming part of the union of Mothell: the tithe rent-charge is £130. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of St. John's.

KILDIMO, or KILDEEMO, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, barony of KENRY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Pallas-Kenry, and on the road from Limerick to Tarbert; containing 3670 inhabitants, of whom 218 are in the village. It comprises 6183 statute acres, 600 of which are rich corcass land, 200 bog, and the remainder arable, which produces particularly fine wheat: the substratum is limestone. At the foot of the finely wooded hill of Dromore is a deep lake of about 30 acres, separated from another of about 45 by a small bog. The surrounding country is fertile and picturesque, particularly to the south of the village. The village consists of nearly 40 houses; and another, called New Kildimo, is rising up on the new road which was made for the mail from Limerick to Tralee, and which is very level and good, but has been superseded by that through Newcastle, which is much shorter. The parish is in the diocese of Limerick: the rectory forms part of the union of St. Michael's and corps of the archdeaconry; and there is a perpetual curacy, instituted in 1815, endowed with the tithes of five townlands containing 672 acres, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Limerick. The tithe rent-charge is £304. 13. 6., of which £207. 14. are payable to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the perpetual curate. The church, which is small, was rebuilt in 1705. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £150 and lent £50, in 1810; the glebe comprises 6½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kildimo, Ardcanny, and Chapel-Russell, and containing two chapels, one a large plain building in the village of Kildimo, and the other at Whiteforge. The parochial school-house is at present occupied by a family. Near the western extremity of the parish are the ruins of a church, only 12 feet long and 8 broad, the walls and doors of which are tolerably perfect; it was built about 1290 by the Knights Templars, on lands given by Dermot O'Donovan. Kildimo Court, which is nearly entire, was the seat of the Hartstonge family. In the grounds of Bollane Cottage are the ruins of Bollane Castle, built by the O'Donovans in the 15th century; near the river Mague are the remains of Cullan Castle, built by one of the Fitzgeralds in 1514, and taken by Sir Hardress Waller in 1651; and at Ballyculhane are the ruins of a third, the history of which is unknown.

KILDOLLAGH, or KILDALLOCK, a parish, in the union of COLERAINE, partly in the barony of UPPER DUNLUCE, county of ANTRIM, but chiefly in the north-west Liberties of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Coleraine, and on the river Bann; containing 969 inhabitants. It comprises 2006 statute acres, of which 1984 are in Londonderry; the land is fertile, and well drained, fenced, and cultivated. Ecclesiastically, the parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming part of the union of Rasharkin. Near the village of Loughans are the ruins of the ancient church; also the foundations of the castle of M'Quillan, where a sanguinary battle was fought, in 1534, between the rival septs of O'Kane and M'Quillan. Not far distant is a lofty fort, containing a large cave.

KILDORRERY, a post-town or village, and a parish, in the union of FERMOY, partly in the barony of FERMOY, but chiefly in that of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 27 miles (N.) from Cork, and 137 (S. W.) from Dublin; at the intersection of the roads from Fermoy to Limerick and from Mallow to Mitchelstown; containing 1994 inhabitants, of whom 544 are in the town. This parish comprises 3337 statute acres. The land, with the exception of about 500 acres of mountain pasture, is chiefly under tillage, and is in general good; but although there exists an abundance of limestone, the state of agriculture is rather backward. Springvale, the property of the Earl of Kingston, is within the parish. In the town, which comprises about 90 houses, are a dispensary and a constabulary police station; and fairs are held on May 1st, June 27th, Sept. 3rd, and Nov. 27th, chiefly for the sale of horses and cattle. The parish is in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in J. Nason, Esq., and the vicarage is united to the rectory and vicarage of Nathlash or St. Nicholas: the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £239. 6. 6., is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kildorrery, which also comprises the parishes of Farihy, Templemollogga, Carrigdownane, and Nathlash: the chapel near Kildorrery has been rebuilt. The pass of Redchair, on the border of this parish, is memorable for the artifice practised by Lord Mountgarret on the Lord-President St. Leger, who, having collected his forces to oppose the passage of the insurgents from the county of Limerick, was deceived by a fictitious commission which Lord Mountgarret produced as from the king, on which the lord-president disbanded his forces and retired.

KILDRESS, a parish, in the union of COOKSTOWN, barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Cookstown, and on the road from Omagh to Belfast; containing 8192 inhabitants. This parish anciently formed part of the O'Hagans' country, and subsequently belonged to the earls of Tyrone, by whose rebellion it was forfeited: in 1638 it was granted by Charles I. to R. Richardson, Esq., whose descendant, Captain W. Stewart Richardson, is the present proprietor. It comprises 26,251½ statute acres; part of the land is under an excellent system of cultivation. The mountain tracts consist of sienite, granite, quartz, and basalt, and in the valleys are found clay-slate, limestone, coal, and valuable freestone. The principal seats are, Oaklands, the residence of the Richardson family; Drumshambo; and Wellbrook. A manorial court for Manor-Richardson is held at Legnacash the second Monday in every month, for the recovery of debts under 40*s*. At Wellbrook is a large bleach-green. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £265. 10. The church is a large and handsome building with a lofty square tower, erected in 1818, and for which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1200, and £200 were raised by assessment; it was lately repaired by aid of a grant of £151 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £100, in 1791, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebes consist of 862 acres, of which 225 are unprofitable land. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a small plain chapel at Killanan and another at Dunamore. At Oritor is a Presbyterian meeting-house in connexion with the General Assembly; and there are various schools in the parish, to one of which the Rev. R. Stewart gave £50 and two acres of land. The ruins of the old church are about a mile eastward from the present church; it was burnt in the war of 1641, but restored in 1698, and used for divine service till 1818. Here are also the ruins of Maheraglass priory, which was founded by Terence O'Hagan in 1242, and fortified by the O'Hagans in the rebellion against Queen Elizabeth, from which circumstance it is sometimes called Maheraglass Castle.—See ORITOR.

KILDROUGHT.—See CELBRIDGE.

KILDRUM, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 2¾ miles (W.) from Dingle, on the road to Ventry; containing 1217 inhabitants, and comprising 2889 statute acres. Of this area, about one-fourth consists of coarse mountain pasture. The southern part of the parish forms the peninsula which separates the harbours of Dingle and Ventry: a small cove of the latter comes up to the village, the inhabitants of which are chiefly employed in fishing. The seats are Monadee and Ballyameen. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in Lord Ventry, and the tithe rent-charge is £83. 1. 6., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator and the remainder to the vicar. There is a glebe of three acres, but neither church nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Dingle. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground; and at Ballycunneen is an ancient oblong inclosure of about half an acre, called Cahircullane or Collin's Castle, in one angle of which is a circular building somewhat similar to Staigue Fort, in the parish of Kilcrohane, but of much smaller dimensions.

KILDRUMFERTON, or CROSSERLOUGH, a parish, partly in the baronies of UPPER LOUGHTEE and CLONMAHON, but chiefly in that of CASTLERAHAN, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 9 miles (N. W.) from Oldcastle, and on the left of the road from Ballynagh to Mount-Nugent; containing 10,466 inhabitants. It comprises 16,436¾ statute acres, including 207½ under water. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Richard, Earl of Westmeath, and the tithe rent-charge is £504, of which £204 are payable to the impropriators and £300 to the vicar. In 1831, four townlands were separated from this parish to form part of the perpetual curacy of Ballyjamesduff, to the incumbent of which the vicar of Kildrumferton pays an annual stipend of £20. The parish church is a very neat structure, rebuilt in 1812, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £450, and recently repaired by aid of a grant of £114 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built about 1802, by the then incumbent, at a cost of £1100: the glebe comprises 343¾ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is nearly co-extensive with that of the Established Church, but is commonly called Crosserlough; there is a large and well-built chapel at Crosserlough, erected in 1830, and another is in course of building at Drumkeely. In the parish are five national schools, and two schools under the Church Education Society, one of which is supported by the Hon. Mr. Maxwell and the other by the vicar.

KILDYSART, or KILLADYSERT, a post-town and parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (S. S. W.) from Ennis, and 122 miles (S. W.) from Dublin; at the confluence of the rivers Shannon and Fergus, and on the old mail-road from Ennis to Kilrush; containing 5130 inhabitants, of whom 604 are in the town or village. The parish comprises 12,859½ statute acres, which are chiefly in tillage. Sea-weed and sand are in general use for manure, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving: there is still, however, a considerable portion of bog. Culm exists in some places, and is partially worked; and good building-stone, which is also used for flagging, is procured. Off the western shore of the Fergus, and within the limits of the parish, are several islands. The town, which contains about 60 houses, is irregularly built, but has latterly been much improved: a steam-boat passes daily either to or from Limerick. It has a market on Wednesday under a patent; and fairs are held on May 22nd, July 15th, Aug. 27th, and Oct. 11th: there are petty-sessions every alternate Monday; and a court for the manor of Crovreahan is held by Colonel Wyndham's seneschal, about once in six weeks, in which small debts are recoverable. Here is a chief station of the constabulary police, who have a substantial barrack. Application was lately made to the Board of Public Works for aid in the erection of a pier at Carriginriree, and to improve the quay near Kildysart, both of which objects have been effected: pigs, corn, butter, and other agricultural produce are sent to Limerick in boats; and building materials, grocery, &c., are brought in return: vessels of 105 tons have been freighted at the quay. The gentlemen's seats are, Ballyartney, Ross Hill, Shore Park, Lanesborough, Crowhan, Ballylane Lodge, and Toulagee. Part of the beautifully situated demesne of Cahircon, the seat of Bindon Scott, Esq., also extends into this parish, from the more elevated parts of which extensive views are obtained of the rivers Fergus and Shannon, and of the islands by which the former is studded at its confluence with the latter.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, united to the vicarage of Kilchrist and the rectory of Kilfarboy, coustituting the union of Kildysart, in the patronage of the Wyndham family: the rectory is impropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £311. 10. 9., of which £207. 13. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, a small plain building, was erected in 1812, the late Board of First Fruits giving £500; it has been lately repaired, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners having granted £122 for that purpose. The glebe-house is a substantial building, for the erection of which the late Board in 1818 gave £400 and lent £240; the glebe comprises about 12 acres, and has been much improved by the present incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish gives name to a district, which also comprises the parish of Kilfedane and contains the chapels of Kildysart, Coulmeen (or Rockmount), and Cranny-bridge: the first is a handsome and spacious building of recent erection; and contains a well-executed altar-piece; the other chapels are in Kilfedane. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground, near the shore; and there are many Danish forts and tumuli in the parish. A monastery is said to have been founded on Low Island by St. Senan of Inniscattery, before St. Patrick came into Munster; and St. Moronoc is said to have had a cell here at the time of Senan's death, called "the Penitentiary of Inisluaidhe."

KILFANE, a parish, in the barony of Gowran, union and county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Thomastown, and on the road from Dublin to Waterford; containing 931 inhabitants. This parish is supposed to have derived its name from the foundation of a church here at a very early period by St. Phian: it comprises 3971½ statute acres, and is principally under tillage; the agriculture is moderately good, and there is plenty of limestone, which is used for manure. The principal seats are, Kilfane House, the handsome residence and demesne of the Power family; Summer Hill; and Castlefield. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, united by act of council, in 1676, to the vicarages of Tullowherin and Blanchevillestown, together forming the union of Kilfane and the corps of the archdeaconry of Ossory, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £205. 10., and of the whole benefice £410. 7. 8. The church is a neat edifice with a spire, built in 1832, at a cost of £800, whereof £500 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits, and £300 were raised by subscription; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £114 for its repair. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £600, in 1811, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 46 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Thomastown. Here are some remains of the ancient church, and of Kilbline and Ballynaboola Castles.

KILFARBOY, a parish, in the union of Ennistymon, barony of Ibrickane, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Ennistymon, and on the western coast; containing, with the post-town of Miltown-Malbay, 7498 inhabitants. It was anciently called Kilfobrick, from the monastery of that name, founded in 741, and of which Cormac, who died in 837, is said to have been bishop, but of which no traces now remain. In the reign of Elizabeth, part of the Spanish Armada was wrecked on this coast, at a place since called "Spanish Point." The parish comprises 13,981½ statute acres, a considerable portion of which consists of mountain pasture and bog; sea-weed abounds, and is in general use for manure, but the state of agriculture is rather backward. Mount Callan, which forms a conspicuous landmark, is chiefly in this parish, and rises 1288 feet above the sea: in one of its hollows is Loughnamina, noted for its fine trout. Indications of coal and ironstone appear in several places; slate is found at Freagh; and at Ballard, near Miltown, stone of superior quality is quarried for building. At Freagh is a station of the coast-guard, having a detachment at Liscanor. The gentlemen's seats are, Miltown House, Merville Lodge, Seaview, Westpark, and Spanish Point; and there are several neat lodges in the vicinity of Miltown-Malbay (which see) for the accommodation of the numerous visiters who frequent that fashionable watering-place during the summer.

The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the union of Kildysart; the vicarage was episcopally united, in 1801, to that of Kilmihill or Kilmichael, together constituting the union of Kilfarboy, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £415. 7. 8., of which £236. 5. are payable to the rector and the remainder to the vicar; the vicarial union produces a total rent-charge of £234. 10. 5. The church, at Miltown, is a small plain edifice with a square tower, built in 1805, and towards which £500 were granted by the Board of First Fruits: it was lately repaired, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners having granted £104 for that purpose. The glebe-house was erected in 1814, a gift of £337 and a loan of £79 having been granted by the Board: the glebe comprises about eight acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Miltown, which also comprises the parish of Kilmurry-Ibrickane and contains two chapels, situated respectively at Miltown and Mullogh: the former has been rebuilt on a larger scale. On the shores of this parish are several springs of a chalybeate nature, but not much used for medicinal purposes. At Freagh are the ruins of the castle of that name, and there are several ancient raths or forts. At the side of Loughnamina, on Mount Callan, a very large and remarkable sepulchral stone of great antiquity was discovered, about 1784; it bears an inscription, in the ancient Ogham character, having the peculiarity of being read in five different ways, to the memory of the chief Conan, whose death is alluded to in one of the legends of the 8th century (ascribed to Ossian) as having taken place the year before the battle of Gabhra, which was fought in 296. From the hard texture of the stone the inscription, when discovered, was perfectly legible. On the south side of the mountain is a large cromlech, or Druidical altar, nearly perfect, supposed to have been dedicated to the sun, and popularly called Darby and Grane's bed; and near it are two smaller ones, and the remains of a stone rath, in which part of a covered way is still visible.

KILFAUGHNABEG, a parish, in the union of Skibbereen, Western division of the barony of East Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Rosscarbery, and on the road from Cork to Skibbereen; containing 2556 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by St. George's Channel, and on the west by the harbour of Glandore, and comprises 3127 statute acres. The surface is gently undulating. The soil is light, and the system of agriculture in a very unimproved state; the old heavy plough is yet in use, and the practice of carrying manure to the land and removing the produce on the backs of horses is still retained, except on the lands of Drumbeg, the proprietor of which has introduced the most approved implements and practice of husbandry. There are some quarries of good slate; manganese of superior quality has been raised; and rich indications of copper were lately discovered on the lands of Glandore. The scenery around the bay and harbour is beautifully picturesque, especially near the pleasing village of Glandore on one side, and of Union Hall on the opposite side, of the bay. Considerable improvements have taken place at Glandore, which see. The bay is spacious and secure, affording good anchorage; and on the point of land of Reenogreenagh is a signal tower, which was built after the descent of the French on this part of the coast in 1796. The principal seats are, Drombeg, Glandore House, Stone Hall, Westview House, Chateau Maria, Prospect House, Glandore Castle, Kilfinnan Castle, Glen Villa, and Glandore Lodge. The parish is in the diocese of Ross: the rectory till lately was part of the union and corps of the archdeaconry of Ross; and the vicarage was part of the union of Kilmacabea, but the two parishes were separated on the demise of the late incumbent, and Kilfaughnabeg is now a distinct benefice, in the patronage of the Bishop: a church has been fitted up at Glandore. The tithe rent-charge is £223. 4., all payable to the incumbent, who is both rector and vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmacabea, and has a chapel at Glandore. There are some interesting remains of the old church; those of the ancient castles of Glandore and Kilfinnan, which were extensive, have been modernised and enlarged, forming the handsome residences previously noticed.

KILFEACLE, a parish, in the barony of Clanwilliam, union and county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 3½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Tipperary, on the road from that place to Cashel; containing 2176 inhabitants. It comprises 6501 statute acres; some of the land is of excellent quality, and good limestone is abundant. A fair is held on July 10th, chiefly for wool and lambs. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel, and is a rectory, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Tipperary: the tithe rent-charge is £276. 18. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilfeacle forms part of the district of Golden, and has a chapel near the Moat. There are the remains of castles at Grantstown and Castle-Field; also a large Danish moat.

KILFEARA, a parish, in the barony of Shillelogher, union and county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Kilkenny, and on the river Nore; containing 218 inhabitants, and comprising 964½ statute acres. Here is a constabulary police station. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Burnchurch; the rectory is impropriate in Lady Tynte Caldwell, to whom the whole of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £34. 4. 6., is paid. In the demesne of Sheestown are the ruins of an ancient church, which is the burial-place of the Shee family.

KILFEDANE, a parish, in the union of Kilrush, barony of Clonderlaw, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Kildysart, and on the river Shannon, near its junction with the Fergus; containing 4661 inhabitants. It comprises 13,733½ statute acres, including a large tract of improvable mountain and bog: the portion in tillage is generally manured with sea-weed and sand. Culm is found at Shanahea, and partially worked. Within the parish are the mansion and principal part of the demesne of Cahircon, the seat of Bindon Scott, Esq., beautifully situated at the confluence of the Fergus and Shannon, of which an eminence near the house commands an interesting view, embracing a large portion of the shores of those rivers and the numerous islands by which their estuary is studded. Adjoining the demesne is Clifton House, lately erected by Mr. Scott; it occupies a beautiful situation contiguous to the shores of the Shannon, of which it commands an extensive view. There is a ferry from Clifton to Foyne's Island, on the opposite shore of the Shannon. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is impropriate in Mr. Scott, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilmurry-Clonderlaw. The tithe rent-charge is £200. 15. 5., of which £124. 12. 4. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilfedane forms part of the district of Kildysart: the chapel at Coulmeen is a large building of recent erection; and at Cranny bridge, on the border of the parish, is another. There are some ruins of the old church. About 1760, when an East India fleet took refuge in the Shannon, an encampment was formed in the deer-park of Cahircon.

KILFEGHAN.—See KILBRONEY, in the county of DOWN.

KILFEIGHNEY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Listowel, on the road to Tralee; containing 2388 inhabitants. It comprises 11,408 statute acres: the land is chiefly in tillage, but there is a large portion of coarse mountain pasture, and some bog; limestone is quarried for manure. The chief seat is Banemore House, romantically situated on the brow of a mountain, which is extensively planted. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the vicarage, with one-fifth part of the rectory of Ardfert and the vicarage of Ballyconry, constitutes the corps of the precentorship in Ardfert cathedral, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £166. 15., payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the precentor. The glebe lands of the precentorship comprise 115 statute acres; and the gross value of the dignity, tithe and glebe inclusive, previously to the passing of the Rent-charge act was £207. 14. 10. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Abbeydorney, but chiefly in that of Lixnaw. The ruins of the ancient church, in the burial-ground, form a very picturesque object.

KILFENNY, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, Eastern division of the barony of UPPER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Adare, and on the road from Croom to Ballingarry; containing 1090 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2438 statute acres; about 320 are common and 90 bog, and of the remainder, two-thirds are under tillage, and one-third in pasture. The surface is uneven, rising in some places into hills of considerable elevation; the soil is in general fertile, and the system of agriculture improved. Fairs are held on the common on May 15th, July 14th, Sept. 12th, and Dec. 22nd, chiefly for cattle. Kilfenny is in the diocese of Limerick, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Nantinan and corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Limerick: the tithe rent-charge is £101. 3. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Croagh and Kilfenny; the chapel is a small edifice. There are some remains of the old church, in which is a tablet to the Pigot family; and near it are the remains of Ballynakill House, which, having been converted into a barrack, was burnt by the Rockites in 1822. At the foot of a hill are the remains of Kilfenny Castle, built by Cormac Mac Einery in the reign of John; it afterwards belonged to the Kildare family, by whom it was forfeited in the reign of Elizabeth. It was besieged by the Irish under Colonel Purcell, in 1641, and resolutely defended by the widow of Sir John Dowdall for some time, but ultimately surrendered. Near the boundary of the parish are the picturesque ruins of Finnitterstown Castle, which was also forfeited by the same family in 1598.

KILFENORA, a town and parish, and the seat of a diocese, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ennistymon, on the road to Curofin; containing 3286 inhabitants, of whom 621 are in the town or village. This place, called anciently Fenabore, and Cellumabrach, though evidently of great antiquity, has not been much noticed by the earlier historians; the first mention that occurs of it is in the Annals of Ulster, in which it is stated that Murrough O'Brien, in 1055, burnt the abbey, and slew many of the inhabitants. In the 12th century, the religious establishment which had been founded here (by whom or at what date is unknown) became the head of a small diocese. The town appears to have been of some importance, and a general market was held here, but since the increase of Ennistymon, the place has been till lately gradually declining; the original market is no longer held, and it has dwindled into an inconsiderable village. Fairs are, however, still held on the 4th of June and 9th of October, for cattle and sheep. The town contains 112 houses, and has been lately much improved by the proprietor, John O'Brien, Esq., who has rebuilt many of the houses of his tenants; an extensive butter-market is held every Thursday; and there is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Ennistymon.

The SEE is of very uncertain origin, neither is it precisely known who was the first bishop; though many are of opinion that St. Fachnan, to whom the cathedral is dedicated, must have been the founder. Of his successors, who were called bishops of Corcomroe, there are but very imperfect accounts; and of the history of the see, as of the town, very little is preserved. In the ancient distribution of the bishoprics, made by Cardinal Paparo in 1152, this see was suffragan to the Archbishop of Cashel. It remained a separate diocese till after the Restoration, when it was annexed to the archbishopric of Tuam; and it continued for 81 years to be held with that diocese, till, on the annexation of Ardagh to Tuam, it was separated from it and given in commendam to the bishopric of Clonfert, with which it was held till 1752, when it was united to the see of Killaloe, with which it still remains. Kilfenora is one of the sixteen dioceses which constitute the archiepiscopal province of Dublin, and is the smallest in Ireland; it lies wholly within the county of Clare, and comprehends only the baronies of Burrin and Corcomroe, which formed part of the ancient territory of Thomond. The diocese extends 23 miles in length and 11 in breadth, comprising an estimated superficies of 37,000 acres. The lands belonging to the see comprise 9237 acres, of which 2350 are profitable land; the gross annual revenue of the bishopric is returned with that of Killaloe. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, treasurer, and archdeacon; there are neither minor canons, prebendaries, nor vicars-choral: a consistorial court is held occasionally by the vicar-general. The diocese comprises 19 parishes, included in six ecclesiastical unions; there are three parish churches, one other place in which divine service is performed, and three glebe-houses. The cathedral, dedicated to St. Fachnan, and which is also used as the parish church, is a venerable structure with a massive square tower, commanding a very extensive and interesting view; the aisle lately underwent repair, and is fitted up as the parish church, for which purpose the Ecclesiastical Commissioners granted £421. In the Roman Catholic divisions this diocese is united to that of Kilmacduagh, and comprises eight unions, in which are 15 chapels, served by eight parish priests and two coadjutors.

The parish comprises 10,776¾ statute acres, a considerable portion of which is good grazing-land, and the remainder mostly under profitable cultivation; the system of agriculture is improving, and there is a large tract of valuable bog. To the east of the town is a turlough, which in summer affords very rich pasture for fattening cattle, but in the winter is under deep water after heavy rains. A new road has been made between the town and Ennistymon, with great benefit to the intervening district. The chief seats are Ballykeale and Kilcarragh. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, united from time immemorial to the rectories of Clouney and Kiltoraght, together constituting the corps of the deanery of Kilfenora, in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £187. 10., and of the whole union £312. 10. In the church are two monuments, one of which is supposed to be that of the founder, bearing a full-length effigy rudely sculptured; and to the north of the transept is another. The deanery or glebe-house, now occupied by the dean's curate, the Rev. Thomas Lyon, and towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits contributed a gift of £300, and a loan of £450, was built about the year 1813; and has been greatly improved by the Very Rev. W. H. Stackpoole, D.D., the present dean, who has added an extensive range of out-offices to the house: in the shrubberies is a perfect ancient rath, thickly planted. The glebe and deanery lands comprise 231 plantation acres, of which 70 are good pasture and the remainder mountain land; the gross annual value of the deanery, tithe and glebe inclusive, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £482. 18. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is held with that of Kiltoraght; the chapel here is a neat modern edifice in the village, and a chapel has been just erected in the parish of Kiltoraght. There is an excellent dispensary. At Kilcarragh, very near this place, on the estate of Sir W. M'Mahon, was anciently an hospital or monastery, endowed with a quarter of land, and which, after the Dissolution, was granted to John King. Near the cathedral is a stone cross of very light and beautiful design; and in the churchyard is a plain cross of great antiquity: there were formerly seven crosses around this place, but these are the only two remaining.

KILFENTINAN, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; contiguous to the post-town of Six-mile-bridge (of which it includes a small portion); containing 2633 inhabitants, and comprising 6115 statute acres. It is situated on the northern shore of the river Shannon, and comprehends the two small inhabited islands of Grass and Graigue, containing respectively six and five plantation acres of rich pasture land. Near the latter is a rocky shoal called "the Scarlets," on which is a low tower erected as a guide to the navigation of the river. On the shores of the parish are some of the rich corcasses, which yield a succession of abundant crops without any manure. The land is mostly in tillage, and the state of agriculture has been latterly improved. A court for the manor of Bunratty is occasionally held at Cratloe, by Colonel Wyndham's seneschal, in which small debts are recoverable. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The seats are, Cratloe Woods, the occasional residence of Augustus Stafford O'Brien, Esq.; and Ballintlea, of J. Kelly, Esq. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of Colonel Wyndham, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £200. 12. 6., of which £148. 2. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the principal chapel is at Cratloe Cross, and there is another at Ballyliddane, near Six-mile-bridge. The ruins of the castles of Cratloe, Cratloe Kail, and Ballintlea, still remain; also those of an old church on Gallows hill, and of another at Crochan. Near the latter is a very perfect Druidical altar or cromlech.

KILFERGUS.—See GLINN.

KILFIERAGH, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Kilrush, and on the western coast; containing 7137 inhabitants. It comprises 9870¾ statute acres, the greater part of which is under tillage: sea-weed is in general use for manure. Near Kilkee is a quarry of good building-stone; and nearly in the centre of the parish lies Dough bog, containing about 200 plantation acres, from which and other bogs extending into the adjoining parishes a vast quantity of turf is cut, and sent from Poulanishery harbour (formed by an inlet of the river Shannon) to Limerick. The boats employed in conveying the turf return with building materials and with limestone from the Limerick side of the Shannon. At Farahie bay, near the northern extremity of the parish, about 50 canoes are employed in the fishery; and at Kilkee or Moore bay, about half that number are similarly employed. A seneschal's court is occasionally held at Lisdeen for the manor of Kilrush, in which small debts are recoverable. The seats are Atlantic Lodge and the House of Kilkee; and there are several neat bathing-lodges in the vicinity of Kilkee village. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is partly impropriate in the representatives of Lord Castlecoote, but chiefly, with the vicarage, forms part of the union of Kilrush and corps of the prebend of Inniscattery. The tithe rent-charge is £215. 5., of which £27. 15. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the incumbent. The old church, a small plain edifice, is said to have been rebuilt by the M'Donnell family early in the last century; it was repaired a few years since, at an expense of £100, defrayed by the Board of First Fruits. A new parochial church has been built at Kilkee, at a cost of £1384, whereof £1184 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £200 from private sources; it affords accommodation for 400 persons, and is situated conveniently to the most populous part of the parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilfieragh is within the district of Kilkee, where the principal chapel, a large and handsome building of recent erection, is situated; there is another chapel at Lisdeen. At Kilnahallagh, on the western side of Poulanishery harbour, a nunnery is said to have been founded by St. Senan: it is called Kilnacaillech, or "the Church of the Nuns;" and the ruins of the chapel still exist, with a burial-ground attached. Near Moore bay is a small rocky island, nearly inaccessible from the height of its cliffs; it is traditionally stated that a bishop was at some former period here starved to death, and the place is still called Ilawn an uspug usthig, or "the Island of the Starved Bishop." Near Kilkee is a large rath, attributed to the Danes.—See KILKEE.

KILFINAGHTY, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; on the river Ougarnee, and on the old road from Limerick to Ennis; containing, with the greater part of the post-town of Six-mile-bridge, 3801 inhabitants. It comprises 8109¾ statute acres, including a large portion of coarse mountain pasture and bog; the remainder is in general of good quality and chiefly under tillage. Slate exists, but is not worked. The gentlemen's seats are Castle Crine, Mount Ivers, Castle Lake, Springfield, and Mount Ivers Lodge. Kilfinaghty is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the union of Omullod, and the vicarage is united to those of Kilmurrynegaul, Tomfinlough, Finogh, Clouloghan, Kilconry, and Bunratty, constituting the union of Kilfinaghty, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £133. 6. 6., of which £64. 0. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar, who receives the entire tithe of the townland of Ballysheenmore, containing 180 plantation acres; the entire tithe of the vicarial union is £247. 17. The church of the union is at Six-mile-bridge, and the glebe-house in the parish of Bunratty; the glebe consists of 17½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Six-mile-bridge, where the chapel is situated. At Ballysheen are the ruins of an ancient church, with several tombs of very early date; and within the limits of the parish are the remains of the old castles of Cappa, Castle Crine, Mountcashel, and Ballycullen: those of the last are extensive, and some vestiges of the outworks are still visible; those of Mountcashel stand on an eminence near a lake, which thence takes its name.—See SIX-MILE-BRIDGE.

KILFINANE, a market-town and parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Kilmallock, on the road from that place to Mitchelstown; containing 4356 inhabitants, of whom 1782 are in the town. The town is situated in the midst of a group of mountains, by which it is surrounded on all sides but the north, where it opens upon the rich vale of Kilmallock. It consists of two principal and several smaller streets, containing 308 houses, many of which are large and well built, and have been recently erected by the Misses Gascoigne, coheiresses of the late R. Oliver Gascoigne, Esq., to whom the property belongs, and who have also built and furnished an hotel, flagged the foot-paths, and made other improvements, which will in a little time change the aspect of the district for the better. Many Palatine families were brought hither from Rathkeale, about 1740, by the Right Hon. Silver Oliver. In 1793, the attacks made on the town by the Defenders were repelled twice, and the assailants were ultimately defeated by the Palatines and other inhabitants, under Charles Silver Oliver, Esq.; at a later period, also, when an attack from the disaffected was anticipated, the respectable inhabitants armed themselves in defence of the place. The people are mostly engaged in agricultural occupations; a few are employed in the weaving of linen and cotton goods; and not far from the town are oatmeal-mills, besides others at Sunville, about two miles distant. The market is on Saturday, and is well attended; fairs, for farming stock and implements, are held on May 19th, Aug. 9th, and Oct. 25th: the market-house is a large and commodious building, substantially repaired in 1836. Here is a constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays. Quarter-sessions were formerly held here, but have been removed to Bruff; it is, however, in contemplation to restore them: a small bridewell, consisting of two day-rooms, two yards, and four cells, has been built; and the sessions-house, which is large and convenient, has been repaired. A spacious and handsome fever hospital was erected in 1836, at an expense of £700; an accident-ward and a dispensary are attached. The PARISH comprises 6487 statute acres. The mountains consist principally of coarse conglomerate and red sandstone; silver and iron ores are found, and coal is supposed to exist; limestone-gravel is abundant, and is much used for manure. The land is generally good, and there are large dairy-farms, and a considerable tract of bog and mountain pasture; much of the mountain land has been brought into cultivation, and in a great measure provides for many poor families. The principal seats are Spa Hill, Spring Lodge, Bossonstown, and Brookville Cottage. A splendid mansion, to be called Glenortly Castle, is now in progress of erection in the demesne of Castle-Oliver, by the Misses Gascoigne.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, united by act of council to the vicarage of Daragh, forming the union of Kilfinane, in the patronage of the Earl of Cork, partly in whom and partly in the family of Freeman the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £247. 10., of which £78. 15. are payable to the Earl of Cork, and £123. 15. to the vicar; the rectorial tithe of Bossonstown, Bosnitstown, and Moorestown, amounting to £45, is payable to the family of Freeman. The church was rebuilt in 1760, and is a large plain edifice. The glebe-house was built in 1813, the late Board of First Fruits giving £400 and lending £386: the glebe comprises 4¼ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilfinane, Particles, and Ardpatrick, and containing two chapels; one a large plain building at Kilfinane, erected in 1835 at an expense of £1000; and one at Ardpatrick. Adjoining the church are the ruins of an ancient castle, built by the Roches. Near the town are a rath and three strong forts; also a large artificial cave. Castle Oliver, which was successively occupied by the Fitz-Harrises and the Roches, and since 1641 by the Olivers, is now in ruins. Eastward of the town is a fine sulphuro-chalybeate spring, of great efficacy in cutaneous diseases. Outside the town is "the Danes' fort," a mound about 130 feet high, 50 feet in diameter at the base, and 20 at the summit, encircled by seven earthen ramparts about 20 feet apart, gradually diminishing in height from the innermost to the outermost, which is about 10 feet high and 2000 feet in circuit: an extensive view is obtained from the summit.

KILFINURA, a village, in the parish of BALLYNAHAGLISH, union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Tralee, and on the bay of that name. A fishery is carried on here, which is gradually increasing: about fifteen large boats employed in it are also engaged in conveying corn and other produce from Blennerville to this place, and merchandise from the larger vessels up the shallow part of the bay to Tralee. Several pilots reside in the village, which is a station of the coast-guard, removed some years ago from Barra harbour. In the vicinity is a quarry, producing large blocks of fine limestone, raised with very little blasting, and lately used in the construction of the Tralee ship-canal. A regatta is generally held in the bay about the month of August.

KILFITHMONE, or FITHMONE, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Templemore, and on the road from Cashel to Burris-o-leigh; containing 695 inhabitants. It comprises 1330 statute acres, of which about three-quarters are arable and one-quarter pasture land; there is a bog of about 50 acres, and plenty of limestone. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, united by act of council, in 1789, to the rectories and vicarages of Barnane and Killoskehan, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £75, and of the whole union £236. 15. The church was rebuilt in 1832, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £500. The same Board, in 1794, had given £100 towards the erection of the glebe-house: the glebe comprises 19¾ acres.

KILFLYN, or KILFLIN, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Tralee, on the upper road to Listowel; containing 1088 inhabitants, of whom 147 are in the village. It comprises 6697 statute acres, of which upwards of one-half consists of coarse mountain pasture; the remainder, with the exception of about 270 acres of bog, is good arable land. A vein of limestone extends into this parish from Kilfeighney, but at too great a depth to be properly worked: coal is also supposed to exist. A patent for fairs on May 11th and 12th, July 8th and 9th, Oct. 7th and 8th, and Nov. 5th and 6th, granted by Charles II., has been revived by T. Ponsonby, Esq., whose seat, Crotto House, is situated in an extensive and finely wooded demesne, which extends into the parish of Kiltoomy. From a bridge over the small river Shannow, Glenballema, which here presents the form of an amphitheatre, has a highly picturesque effect. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, united about 1750 to those of Kiltoomy, Killaghin, Kilshinane, Ballinacourty, Minard, and Stradbally, together constituting the union of Kilflyn, in the patronage of the Earl of Cork. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £63. 14., payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar; and the tithe of the entire union of the vicar is £412. 7. 6. The church, a plain structure, was erected in 1811, £800 being given by the Board of First Fruits; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £217 for its repair and the erection of a tower. The glebe-house of the union is at Ballinacourty; and there are also a church, and a glebe of 10 acres, at Ballinacourty, which now generally gives name to the union. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Abbeydorney: the chapel is a plain building. Some vestiges exist of the old church; and at Kill is a holy well, still frequented by the peasantry for devotional purposes.

KILFLYN, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (S. E.) from Kilmallock, and on the road from Limerick to Kildorrery; containing 1778 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the midst of a group of mountains separating the counties of Cork and Limerick, was waste and uncultivated previously to the year 1740, when a considerable number of Palatines, a branch from the colony of Rathkeale, settled here, and contributed to its improvement. It contains 4819 statute acres; a great portion is still unproductive, but much of the waste has been brought into cultivation, and at the head of Glenroe is a large tract of land equal to any in the barony for fertility. The principal mountains are Kilcruig and Coolfrie, or Houndscourt. Slate of good quality is quarried in the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £120. The church, a neat edifice with a square tower, was built in 1811, by a gift of £700 from the Board of First Fruits, who, in 1819, gave £200 towards the erection of the glebe-house, which is a handsome residence; the glebe comprises 15 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Glenroe; the chapel, situated in the village of Ballyorgan, is a small thatched building. There are remains of a Trinitarian monastery founded by St. Finian about the year 547, and rebuilt in 1296 by the Fitzgeralds, whose property in this parish now belongs to the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin. A considerable portion of the building fell down in 1835, having been undermined in digging for treasure supposed to have been deposited there.

KILFREE, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of COOLAVIN, county of SLIGO, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (W.) from Boyle, on the road from that place to Ballina; containing 6048 inhabitants. It comprises 14,313¾ statute acres; the soil is good, the land principally in tillage, and there is abundance of turf and limestone. Here is a constabulary police station, and a manorial court is held occasionally. The principal seats are, Kilfree, Mount Irwin, and Red Hill. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Killaraght; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton, and the tithe rent-charge is £215. 5. 6., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. The church is a plain building with a square tower, erected in 1826, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £600 towards defraying the expense. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Gurteen, which comprises this parish and Killaraght, and has a large chapel in Gurteen, built in 1829, and one in Killaraght. A friary was erected at Knockmore in the 14th century, by O'Gara; the doorway and windows are in good preservation, and it is still a favourite burial-place. Here are also the ruins of Gara Castle, the residence of that O'Gara who had the Psalter of Ballymote written, and whose descendant, Colonel O'Gara, left Ireland after the battle of Aughrim, having forfeited his possessions, and entered the Austrian service.

KILFRUSH, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Bruff, and on the road from Hospital to Galbally; containing 335 inhabitants. It comprises 1526 statute acres; the soil, which rests on limestone, is generally good and well cultivated. Kilfrush House is the residence of the Gubbins family, and is situated in an extensive and well-planted demesne, in which are the ruins of the church. The parish is in the diocese of Emly; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of the Earl of Arran, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Aney: the tithe rent-charge is £94. 2. 9., of which £62. 5. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilfrush is part of the district of Hospital.

KILFYAN, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Killala, and on the road from Crossmolina to Ballycastle; containing 6040 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from an abbey that was founded here by St. Finan, and, according to Colyan, existed but for a short time, comprises $28{,}735\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, chiefly under tillage. The system of agriculture is improving; there is much waste land, and in several parts are tracts of bog, which are, however, being rapidly reclaimed and brought into cultivation. Limestone is quarried for agricultural uses and for building, and there are several quarries of slate: iron-ore has been found in the picturesque glen of Cleedagh, which is watered by a small river and commands some fine views of the sea. The principal seats are Greenwood Park; Woodville, in the same demesne; Rappa Castle; Fahy; Farmhill; Mount Glynne; Killina; and Smithstown. Rappa Castle is a place of very great antiquity; the grounds are profusely embellished with old timber, and the land is of the first quality. At Brideswell is a large fair for horses on Feb. 1st; fairs are held at Tonrahowen on St. Stephen's, St. Patrick's, and Corpus-Christi days; and at Fortfield, a small village, which lately obtained the grant of a market, are fairs on Jan. 1st., June 15th, Aug. 16th, Sept. 8th, Oct. 29th, and Dec. 1st. A constabulary police force is stationed in Kilfyan. The parish is in the diocese of Killala: the rectory is partly appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin, and partly to the precentorship of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Killala; the vicarage forms part of the union of Crossmolina. The tithe rent-charge is £210, of which £21 are payable to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, £84 to the precentor of Killala, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilfyan is partly in the district of Ardagh, and partly the head of a union comprising also the parish of Rathrea; the chapel is a small thatched building. In Ballynglen, about two miles from the sea, are the remains of the castle of that name; in this glen are found various incrustations of marl. There are also the ruins of a castle at Rathroe; and in different parts of the parish are raths, in some of which are several apartments: there are remains of cromlechs, and numerous cairns, in some of which are wells of water; and human skeletons of extraordinary size have been discovered. Silver coins of the reign of Anne, and others the dates of which could not be ascertained, have also been found.

KILGARRIFFE, a parish, partly in the barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, but chiefly in the Eastern division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, union of BANDON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the post-town of Clonakilty, 6342 inhabitants. It is situated on the shores of the harbour of Clonakilty, and comprises 4328 statute acres. The greater portion is under tillage, and there are some tracts of good pasture: the soil, though light and in some parts intermixed with rocks that rise above the surface, is generally fertile; and the system of agriculture is improved, though the old heavy plough is still in use. Near the town, and at Crohane, in the northern part of the parish, are about 500 acres of bog. There are several quarries of blue slate on the lands of the Earl of Shannon, and indications of copper may be seen in various parts. The scenery is pleasingly varied, and along the coast are lofty cliffs: the principal seats are Ballydevane House, Kilgarriffe House, Fern Hill, and Ballyduvane. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, united to those of Desert and Island, forming the union of Kilgarriffe, in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in Michael Roberts, and Thos. W. Foot, Esqrs. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £322. 10., half of which is payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the vicarial union, including the prebend of Island, with which it is held, amounted before the passing of the Rent-charge act to £510. The church is at Clonakilty, which see. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of five acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of the district of Clonakilty, comprising also the parishes of Kilnagross, Templeomalus, and Carrigrohane-More, and parts of Inchidony and Kilkerran-More; there is a spacious chapel at Clonakilty, and one on the lands of Donay, in Templeomalus. In the town is also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial schools, and also an infants' school, are supported by the incumbent and his lady; the parochial school-house for the girls was built in 1810 by subscription, and that for the boys, a good slated building, was erected at an expense of £150, of which £50 were given by the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £50 by the Earl of Shannon, and £50 by the Rev. Horatio Townsend. A large and handsome school-house, containing three rooms, with a residence for the mistress, was built in 1835, by subscription and a grant of £310 from the National Board, on ground given by the Earl of Shannon.

KILGARRILANDER, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Milltown; on the north side of Castlemaine harbour, and on the road from Castleisland to Dingle; containing 2889 inhabitants. It comprises 14,630 statute acres. The land partly consists of a fine alluvial soil on a substratum of limestone; but a large portion of the parish is occupied by the southern side of the mountains of Cahirconree and Bourthriggoum: it also comprises a valuable bog of considerable extent. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: it is a rectory, forming part of the union of Kiltallagh; the tithe rent-charge is £162. 13. 10., and there is a glebe of 11 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilgarrilander is part of the district of Castlemaine: there is a chapel at Boulteens. Remains of the old church still exist, in the burial-ground; and at Ardcanaught is a burial-place, used only for children.

KILGARVAN, Cork.—See Great Island.

KILGARVAN, a parish, in the union of Kenmare, barony of Glanerough, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 6 miles (N. E.) from Kenmare, on the road from that place to Millstreet and Macroom; containing 3988 inhabitants, of whom 143 are in the village. Callan, in this parish, is celebrated for the surprise, defeat, and slaughter, in 1261, of John Fitz-Thomas and his son Maurice (ancestors of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond) by the M'Cartys: tradition states that a younger son, named John, escaped the slaughter, and was afterwards called "John of Callan." The parish comprises 43,631 statute acres, a large portion of which consists of mountain and bog, the greater part reclaimable, from the abundance of limestone that exists. The want of roads having rendered improvements ineffectual, a road was opened about twenty years since towards Macroom, in the county of Cork; and a new road is now in course of formation by the Board of Works, from Kilgarvan to Bantry, through a wild glen, opening out a great extent of mountainous land which, it is hoped, will be soon brought into cultivation from the facility now presented of obtaining limestone from Kilgarvan quarries. A mining company has been formed for nine or ten years past, and is still working copper-mines at Clontoo. The river Roughty, which takes its rise in this parish, runs through a picturesque valley into the river Kenmare; it produces excellent salmon and trout. Near the village is a station of the constabulary police, and petty-sessions are held on the first Tuesday in every month.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert, united to that of Killaha, together constituting the union of Kilgarvan, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £166. 3., payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar; the gross vicarial rent-charge of the union is £173. 1. 6. The church is a neat building, situated about a mile from the village, and for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1815, gave £600; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £125 for its repair. The glebe-house, a substantial mansion was built in 1818, when the Board granted £400 as a gift and £280 as a loan for that purpose: the glebes here comprise 21 acres, subject to a rent of £27. 13.; and there is another glebe of about 7½ acres, the property of the vicar, besides one of 6 acres, which, with one-third of the tithes of the "church quarter," belongs to the Archdeacon of Aghadoe. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is in the village, and adjoining it are the ruins of the old church. The parochial school, near the church, is supported by the incumbent and other subscribers. At Ardtully are the remains of an ancient castle, which, from the thickness of the fragments of wall that remain, must have been of great strength; it was reduced by Cromwell during the civil wars. On one side of the river Roughty, which here separates a limestone soil from one of grit, a large limestone rock is seated on a bed of grit-stone; while a large rock of grit appears on the limestone, on the other side of the river. Near a small brook in the mountainous district is a rock, which, from numerous impressions like those of human feet, bears the name of "the Fairy Rock."

KILGARVAN, Donegal.—See Killygarvan.

KILGARVEN, a parish, in the union of New Ross, barony of Shelmalier West, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Taghmon, on the road to Adamstown and New Ross; containing 1060 inhabitants, and comprising 4275 statute acres. It is a rectory in the diocese of Ferns, and forms part of the union of Horetown; the tithe rent-charge is £117. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Taghmon: there is a small thatched chapel at Caroreigh; a new one is in progress of erection. Some remains of the church yet exist.

KILGARVEY, or Kilgarvin, a parish, in the union of Ballina, barony of Gallen, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Ballina, on the road from that place to Boyle; containing 4158 inhabitants. This parish includes part of the Ox mountains, and comprises 19,879½ statute acres, of which a considerable tract is reclaimable bog; it contains limestone, and lead-mines are supposed to exist. Fairs are held at Bonneconlan, or O'Dowda's-town, on the 13th of May, June, and Aug., and Nov. 2nd. That village consists of one street, and is a constabulary police station; it is an improving place, and a weekly market was lately established in it. The parish is in the diocese of Killala; the rectory is impropriate in Sir W. H. Palmer, Bart., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Ardagh: the tithe rent-charge is £211. 8. 4., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel, at O'Dowda's-town, is a slated building erected in 1800, and since rebuilt. Here are several raths and an ancient burial-ground.

KILGAVOWER, or Kilgeever, a parish, in the barony of Murrisk, union of Westport, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 11 miles (W. S. W.) from Westport, and on Clew bay; containing 12,573 inhabitants. It comprises 58,098¾ statute acres, of which a large portion is mountain and bog. Fairs, and a weekly market, are held at Lewisburgh, which see. The parish is a rectory, vicarage, and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Tuam; the rectory is appropriate to the chapter of the cathedral of Tuam, the vicarage forms part of the union of Aughaval, and the perpetual curacy is called Lewisburgh, and is in the patronage of the vicar: the tithe rent-charge is £180, of which £45 are payable to the chapter, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a neat building at Lewisburgh, erected in 1798, by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits. There are a glebe-house and glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms two districts, one consisting of Clare Island and Inisturk, and the remainder forming the district of Lewisburgh; there are two chapels, one at Goulagh, the other at Lewisburgh. The mountain of Croagh Patrick, 2510 feet above the level of the sea, is traditionally stated to have been the spot on which St. Patrick assembled all the venomous reptiles to banish them from Ireland, and is a celebrated place of pilgrimage; on the summit, which commands a fine view, is St. Patrick's chapel, built of loose stones, and there are several small piles of stones that are used as altars.

K I L—G L

KILGEFIN, a parish, in the barony of SOUTH BALLINTOBBER, union and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Stokestown, on the road from that place to Roscommon; containing 3765 inhabitants. In a skirmish which took place here in 1795, many of the peasantry were killed. The parish comprises $6060\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, and is bounded on the east by Slieve Bawn, which is supposed to contain copper and lead ores. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Kingsland: the tithe rent-charge is £119. 6. per annum, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. The church is a neat plain structure, erected in 1824, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of $10\frac{1}{2}$ acres, subject to a rent. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising Kilgefin, Kilbride, and Clontuskert, and containing chapels at Ballagh, Ballyleague, and Four-mile-house.

KILGERRIL, or KILGIRDLE, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, partly in the barony of KILCONNELL, but chiefly in that of CLONMACNOON, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Ballinasloe, on the road from that place to Abascragh; containing 1443 inhabitants. This parish comprises $6832\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which a considerable portion is bog. The chief seats are Fairfield and the Lodge. Kilgerril is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Aughrim; the rectory is appropriate to the see, the deanery, and the vicarage; and the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £78. 4. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilgerril forms part of the district of Fobana: the chapel, which stands on the road side, was erected in the year 1834.

KILGLASS, a parish, partly in the barony of ABBEYSHRUEL, partly in that of ARDAGH, but chiefly in the barony of MOYNOW, union and county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Edgeworthstown, and on the road from Ardagh to Ballinacarrig; containing 2977 inhabitants. It comprises 5744 statute acres, including about 100 acres of heathy mountain and a considerable quantity of bog; there is some good limestone. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, united by act of council, in 1737, to the vicarages of Rathrea and Ahara, forming the union of Kilglass, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £144. 14.; and the gross value of the benefice, including tithe and glebe, before the passing of the Rent-charge act was £486. 6. per annum. The church, a plain building with a square tower, was erected in 1814, at an expense exceeding £1000, towards which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £368. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £350 and a loan of £450 from the same Board: the glebe here comprises 49 acres, valued at £90. 9. 2.; and there is a glebe of 37 acres at Ahara, valued at £59. 19. 2. per annum. The Roman Catholic union is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called the union or district of Lagan, having two chapels; that of Kilglass at Lagan, and that of Rathrea at Ballycloghan. Lagan is a small village at the extremity of the parish, in which a patron is held on Sept. 8th. Two schools are partly supported by the Countess Dowager of Rosse and the rector. St. Echea, sister of St. Mell, is said to have been abbess of a nunnery here in the 5th century.

KILGLASS, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, partly in the barony of ROSCOMMON, but chiefly in that of NORTH BALLINTOBBER, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Strokestown, on the road from that place to Rooskey; containing 10,493 inhabitants. It comprises $15,970\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, including about 1400 acres of bog; the land is principally under tillage, and there are some quarries of stone. The principal seats are Gilstown, Lavagh, and Churchview. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Kingsland; the tithe rent-charge is £510. 12. $10\frac{1}{2}$., which is equally divided between the impropriators and the vicar. The church, a neat structure, was erected in 1825, by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, and was recently repaired by aid of a grant of £101 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built by aid of a loan of £400 and a gift of the same amount from the Board of First Fruits, in 1813: the glebe comprises five acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has chapels at Kilglass, Mullogh-M'Cormick, Moher, and Moyglass, the two latter lately built.

KILGLASS, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony TYRERAGH, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Ballina, and on the bay of Killala; containing 4941 inhabitants. Many of the peasantry who assembled here in 1798 were killed in an attack made by the cavalry. The parish comprises $12,884\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, chiefly under tillage, with a considerable quantity of bog: among the seats are, Carrowned; Ohil, a handsome house lately built; and Kinnaird. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, forming part of the union of Castle-Connor; the rectory is appropriate to the bishopric, the deanery, and the precentorship of Killala. The tithe rent-charge is £357, of which £175. 10. are now payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £3 to the dean, £3 to the precentor, and £175. 10. to the vicar. The church is a neat building with a spire, erected in 1829, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of 17 Irish acres, but no glebe-house. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel, built in 1825, at an expense of £600. Of several public schools, one is endowed with a bequest of £400 from the late Rev. J. Valentine, which sum has accumulated to £2000: the school-house is a good stone building, and cost £215. At Enniscronc, in this parish, the property of Robert Orme, Esq., a very handsome lodge was lately built by that gentleman, who has enabled his tenants there to erect comfortable slated houses, which now form a considerable village, having a receiving-house for letters, and a market; it is also a coast-guard station belonging to the Sligo district, and a constabulary police station. Petty-sessions are held there on alternate Saturdays, and fairs on June 15th and Sept. 18th; a fair is also held at Quiguboy on July 20th. At Pullogheany creek, on the east side of the bay of Killala, small vessels land kelp, &c., in summer: it has tolerably good shelter in most winds, behind the breakwater. Near this creek stand the ruins of a castle, and there are also ruins of castles at Enniscrone and Lacken, KILGOBAN.—See BALLINADEE.

KILGOBBIN, or KILGOBBAN, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (S. by E.) from Dublin, on the road to Enniskerry; containing 1012 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3257 statute acres; the system of agriculture is improving. Ballybrack, and the principal part of the Three Rock mountains, are within its limits; and there is an abundance of fine granite, used for building, flagging, &c., and chiefly sent to Dublin. Good turf is obtained from the mountains. The parish contains several pretty villas, which, from their elevated situation, command extensive views, embracing the bay and city of Dublin, with a great expanse of sea and adjacent country: the principal are Fern Hill, Kilgobbin Cottage, and Jamestown House. There is a constabulary police station in the village of Stepaside. Kilgobbin is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Kilternan: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Sandyford or Glancullen. A school is aided by subscriptions, and collections at an annual charity sermon; and a national school has been lately built. Here are the remains of an ancient castle, erected by the family of Walsh, by whom it was forfeited in the reign of Charles I., when it passed to the Loftus family. The church, which is said to have been the first erected after the Reformation, stands near the castle, and has been disused since 1826, when one was built at Kilternan. Near it is an ancient cross, about eight feet high; and there is another in the Jamestown House demesne, in the vicinity of which was a holy well, dedicated to St. James.

KILGOBBIN, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 7½ miles (W. S. W.) from Tralee, on the Connor-Hill road from that place to Dingle; containing 2384 inhabitants. It comprises 10,416 statute acres: part of it is well cultivated; sea-weed is much used for manure, and there is a fine bank of shell-sand at Bunnavounder. On the side of the mountain of Cahircouree is a quarry of indifferent slate, and iron is said to exist at Carraduff: at Bunnow is a large flour-mill. There is a constabulary police station at Knockglass. The principal seats are Knockglass and Garrybees. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £316. 10. The church, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £850, in 1825, is a handsome building, with a square tower surmounted with pinnacles. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the same Board gave £250 and lent £550, in 1819; the glebe comprises ten acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, called Cappaclough, comprising the parish of Kilgobbin and part of Ballinvohir: the old chapel at Cappaclough is in ruins, and a new building has been erected at Camp. At the latter place are the ruins of an ancient castle.—See CAPPACLOUGH.

KILGOBINET, a parish, in the union of DUNGARVAN, barony of DECIES-without-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Dungarvan; containing 3136 inhabitants. This parish comprises 16,109 statute acres, and includes the southern end of the elevated range of the Cummeragh mountains, which are chiefly composed of clay-slate and slaty conglomerate, with veins of quartz and sandstone. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Modeligo; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Kilgobinet in the cathedral of Lismore: the tithe rent-charge is £285, of which £135 are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilgobinet, Colligan, and Clonca, and containing three chapels, two of which are at Kilgobinet, and one at Colligan. There are some remains of the church.

KILGOGHLIN.—See BUMLIN.

KILGORMAN, a parish, in the union and barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Arklow, and on the coast-road from Wexford to Dublin; containing 1321 inhabitants. This place takes its name from St. Gorman, who, according to Archdall, was abbot of a monastery founded here at a very early period. It lies on the shore of St. George's Channel, and comprises 5164¾ statute acres, of which the greater portion is under tillage. The soil is marshy, but the system of agriculture is slowly improving, and there is neither waste land nor bog; coal has been found on the border of the parish, but no works have been yet established. Hyde Park, the seat of M. F. Beauman, Esq., is a handsome mansion, in grounds tastefully laid out, and commanding a fine view of the sea, and of the escarpment of Tara Hill. Ahare, likewise the property of Mr. Beauman, and Castletown, are also in the parish. There are considerable herring-fisheries at Clone and Saleen. Near the north-eastern extremity of the parish is Kilmichael Point, off which, about a mile from the shore and at the north end of the Kilgorman sand-bank, is stationed a light ship, sometimes called the Arklow floating-light, from its position near the south end of the Arklow sand-banks. Kilgorman bank extends more than four miles (S. W. by S.), and has six feet of water on the north and three feet on the south end, the latter running nearly opposite to the new pier and harbour of Courtown. About halfway between this great sand-bank and the shore is an oyster-bed, about half a mile in extent, to the south of which is a small sand-bank called the Saleen Patch. At the point is a coast-guard station. The parish is in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough: the rectory is partly impropriate in Messrs. D. Howell, W. Johnson, and C. Cooper, and partly forms a portion of the union of Arklow; the vicarage is part of the union of Inch. The tithe rent-charge is £157. 10., of which £34. 12. 4. are payable to the impropriators, £10. 10. to the incumbent of Arklow, and the remainder to the vicar: the glebe comprises 20½ acres, including the churchyard, where is the foundation of the church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Arklow; the chapel, at Castletown, built by subscription in 1806, is a handsome edifice, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, which was added in 1829. Adjoining it is a school-house, built by subscription. Near the site of the old church, on the sea-shore, is one of those raths or mounds usually attributed to the Danes.

KILGRANT, or POWERSTOWN, a parish, in the union of CLONMEL, barony of IFFA and OFFA EAST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Clonmel; on the high road from that place to Waterford, and the coach-road from Cork to Dublin; containing 1133 inhabitants. It comprises 3071 acres, and is watered by the rivers Anner and Suir, over the latter of which is a stone bridge built at the expense of the late Sir Thomas Osborne, Bart.; near the junction of the rivers are extensive flour-mills. The chief seats are Annerville, Wilderness, and Redmonstone House. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Kilcash, or Killaloon; the rectory is impropriate in John Bagwell, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £145. 7. 8., of which £96. 18. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilgrant is the head of a district, comprising this parish and those of Donoughmore, Lisronagh, and Kilcash, and having one chapel at Gammonsfield and another in Kilcash.

KILGULLANE, or KILCOHILAN, a parish, in the union, and partly in the barony, of FERMOY, but chiefly in the barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Mitchelstown, near the road to Glanworth; containing 1339 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3554 statute acres: the land, which is in general good, is chiefly under tillage, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving. Kilgullane is in the diocese of Cloyne: the rectory is partly impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore; the remainder, with the vicarage, forming part of the union of Glanworth. The tithe rent-charge is £171. 12. 4., of which £5. 11. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish also forms part of the union or district of Glanworth. The parochial school is chiefly maintained by the incumbent, who allows the master the use of the glebe land, containing six plantation acres, rent free: the school-house, a neat building, was erected at an expense of £60, of which £50 were granted from the Lord-Lieutenant's school fund, and the remainder was defrayed by the incumbent. Some remains of the church still exist.

KILHENY, or KILLEANY, a parish, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of BURREN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, about 11 miles (S. W.) from Burren, and near the road from Ballyvaughan to Ballyaline bay; containing 520 inhabitants. It is the estate of the Creagh family, by patent of Charles II.; and comprises $3306\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, consisting chiefly of rocky mountain pasture, but containing some very rich grazing farms, from which large droves of cattle are sent to Cork and Liverpool. About two feet below the surface is a stratum of excellent limestone, causing great productiveness in the soil, which, on the townland of Ballyconroe South, has been known to yield nine crops in succession without manuring. Kilheny is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, forming part of the union of Kilcorney and the corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Kilfenora: the tithe rent-charge is £18. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tuoclea, or Arranview, and has a small chapel at Toumavara. Within the limits of Kilheny are the ruins of a chapel, the burial-ground of which is still used; five forts, called Cahers, composed of huge blocks of limestone, with underground apartments; a cromlech; and a cave called Poul Ilva, more than 150 feet in depth, at the bottom of which is seen a subterraneous stream, which, after a course of about two miles, appears above ground near the old parish church.

KILHOOLY.—See KILCOOLY.

KILKEA, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Castledermot, on the road from that place to Athy; containing 465 inhabitants. It comprises $3096\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres; the principal seats are Milbrook, Kilkea Lodge, Kilkea House, and Kilkea Castle. This castle was built in 1180, by De Lacy, and afterwards passed to the earls of Kildare. In 1414, the O'Mores and O'Dempseys were defeated here by the Lord Justice. The castle was nearly rebuilt by Lord Kildare, in 1426, and now belongs to the Duke of Leinster. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, united to the vicarage of Castledermot, and in the patronage of David C. La Touche, Esq.; the rectory is impropriate in the Rev. Sir Erasmus Borrowes, Bart.: the tithe rent-charge is £157. 10., two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Castledermot. Near Kilkea Castle is a large conical mount covered with trees, and to the east of it are the remains of an old church.

KILKEARY, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Nenagh, on the road to Cashel; containing 794 inhabitants. It comprises 2727 statute acres; the land is generally good, and mostly under tillage. Greenanstown House is the seat of Count D'Alton. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of Ballynaclough and corps of the deanery of Killaloe: the tithe rent-charge is £90. There are remains here of an old church.

KILKEASY, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Thomastown to Waterford; containing 1247 inhabitants, and $3317\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Kilmoganny: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 15., payable to the vicars-choral of Kilkenny. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballyhale.

KILKEE, or DOOGH, a village, in the parish of KILFIERAGH, union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Kilrush, and on the western coast; containing 1481 inhabitants. In 1841 it consisted of 286 houses; since which time several houses and bathing-lodges have been erected, the village being much frequented as a bathing-place, chiefly by the citizens of Limerick, on account of its remarkably fine strand, which is sheltered by a ledge of rocks stretching across one-third of Kilkee bay. There are tepid baths, the property of Jonas Studdart, Esq. It has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Kilrush, and is a constabulary police station and a coast-guard station, the latter being one of the six within the district of Miltown-Malbay. Petty-sessions are held every Friday, and a court for the recovery of small debts is occasionally held for the manor of Kilrush. It is in contemplation to establish fairs in May and August. A new parochial church has been erected at this place; a handsome and spacious Roman Catholic chapel has been built, and there are a parochial school, and a dispensary.—See KILFIERAGH.

KILKEEDY, or KILKEADY, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of INCHIQUIN, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. E.) from Curofin, on the road to Gort; containing 3975 inhabitants. It is situated on the confines of the county, and comprises 18,629¼ statute acres, a large portion of which is rough mountain pasture. Of the several lakes, Lough Buncagh is of considerable extent. The principal seats are, Rockforest, situated in a finely planted demesne extending nearly a mile along the road; Rockvale; Carrignagoule; Ratope; and Derryowen. Fairs are held at Turraghmore on the 8th of June, and at Tubber on July 12th and Sept. 20th, chiefly for cattle; the first is numerously attended. Petty-sessions are held at Derryowen every alternate week, and a court for the manor of Inchiquin occasionally for the recovery of small debts. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is partly appropriate to the prebend of Tomgrany in the cathedral of Killaloe, partly impropriate in the representatives of the Right Hon. James Fitzgerald, and partly united with the vicarage, which forms part of the union of Kilneboy. The tithe rent-charge is £108. 3., of which £6. 6. 7. are payable to the prebendary, £9. 9. 3. to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a small plain edifice, without tower or spire; it was built in 1793, by aid of a gift of £360 from the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of 10 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a large chapel at Boston, and a smaller one at Tubber. Some remains exist of the castles of Rockvale, Fidane, Carrignagoule, Ratope, Derryowen, and Kilkeedy: the castle of Fidane is nearly perfect; that of Derryowen was a square tower, 116 feet high, with very spacious rooms, but part of it has fallen.

KILKEEDY, a parish, in the barony of PUBBLEBRIEN, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Limerick, on the road from that city to Tarbert; containing, with part of the town or village of St. Patrick's-Well, 4109 inhabitants. The castle of Carrigogunnell, or Carrig Oge Conouil, in this parish, was held by O'Brien, Prince of Thomond, in 1316, when he joined the standard of Edward Bruce. It was strengthened by Dhubh, son of Conogher O'Brien, but in 1483 was in the possession of the earls of Kildare; it seems, however, to have reverted to the O'Briens, as they were besieged in it, in 1536, by the Earl of Ormonde, and it was surrendered by and regranted to Brien Dhubh O'Brien, in 1584. The insurgents obtained possession in 1642, surrendered the castle in 1648, and retook it soon after, but finally evacuated it on Cromwell's approach in 1651. At the Revolution it was held by the adherents of King James, but the place surrendered to General S'Gravenmore, and was destroyed by gunpowder, 84 barrels being necessary on account of its great strength. The castle was built on a basaltic rock, 500 feet above the level of the Shannon; two of its towers are still moderately perfect, and several of the foundation walls have been repaired by W. Monsell, Esq. The Templars had a castle at Carrig-a-Quincy, which at the suppression of their order was granted to the O'Briens.

The parish comprises 8881 statute acres, of which about 150 are ornamental plantations, and 50 bog; the remainder is arable, pasture, and meadow land, some of which, on the banks of the Shannon, produces abundant crops of hay. The soil is based on limestone; and near Faha and Carrigogunnell the loose stones are so numerous as to impede tillage, which, however, is rapidly improving. The river Maigue is navigable here for lighters of 40 tons' burthen, which pass by means of a canal, over which is a swing bridge, and near it a small wharf. A bridge of three arches was built over the river in 1792; it is sometimes called the Ferry bridge, but more frequently Court bridge, from the old residence of that name in the adjoining parish of Kildimo. The Lord-Protector Carew built a tower to protect the ferry, which is still called the Ferry Castle. The principal seats are, Elm Park, the residence of Lord Clarina; Tervoe, commanding some fine views; Cooper's Hill; Faha; Cragbeg; and Vermont. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £637. 10. The church, which is a neat building with a square tower and octagonal spire, was rebuilt in 1814, by aid of a loan of £660 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected in 1792, at a cost exceeding £900, chiefly by the then incumbent, and by aid of a gift of £100 from the same Board: the glebe comprises 44 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has two chapels, one of which is a large plain edifice of hewn limestone, roofed with slate, commenced in 1831. The parochial school for boys and girls, situated in the modern village of Clarina, was built in 1826, and is principally supported by the rector and his family; there is also a school for the children of the tenants of Mr. Monsell, by whose family it is maintained. Mrs. Tuthill bequeathed £10 per annum to the poor Protestant parishioners, which is distributed at Christmas. In 1815, a meteoric stone, weighing 56 lb., fell in the demesne of Faha; it consists of iron pyrites strongly impregnated with sulphur, and is in Mr. Tuthill's possession. Clarina gives the title of Baron to the ancient family of Massey.—See ST. PATRICK'S-WELL.

KILKEEL, a post-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of MORNE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 15 miles (S. E.) from Newry, and 65¾ (N. N. E.) from Dublin; containing 16,269 inhabitants, of whom 1146 are in the town. This parish comprises 47,882¾ statute acres, of which about 11,000 are arable and 12,000 pasture; the remainder consists of part of the Morne mountains. The only creek in the twelve miles of coast that bounds the parish is Annalong, where a small dock for fishing-vessels has been excavated out of a rock. There are coast-guard stations at Annalong, Cranfield, and the Lee Stone, all in the district of Newcastle; also a constabulary police station. Fairs are held on Feb. 8th, May 3rd, Aug. 2nd, and Dec. 8th; and a manorial court is held in the sessions-house at Kilkeel, once in three weeks, for the manor of Greencastle and Morne, by a seneschal appointed by the Earl of Kilmorey: its jurisdiction extends over the whole of the barony of Morne, which is co-extensive with this parish and is the property of his lordship, and pleas to the amount of £10 are determined either by attachment or civil bill. The principal seats are, Morne Park, the splendid residence of the earl; and Shannon Grove.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, united in 1809, by charter of James I., to the rectories of Kilcoo and Kilmegan and the chapelry of Tamlaght (a small townland in Kilkeel), together forming the union of Kilkeel and the corps of the treasurership of the cathedral of Down, in the alternate patronage of the Marquess of Anglesey and the Earl of Kilmorey. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £600, and of the entire benefice £1200. The church was rebuilt in 1815, at a cost exceeding £5000, raised partly by parochial assessment, and donations from the landed proprietors, and partly by a loan of £2160 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is situated on a glebe of 30 acres, valued at £37. 10. per annum, but subject to a rent of £19. 7. 9., payable to the Earl of Kilmorey. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms two districts, called Upper and Lower Morne; the former containing a chapel at Ballymaguagh; the latter, one at Glassdrummond and one at Ballymartin. There are two Presbyterian meeting-houses in connexion with the General Assembly; also meeting-houses for Wesleyan Methodists, Baptists, and Moravians. Of the various schools, Needham Thompson, Esq., built the school at Mullartown; and that for girls, at Ballinahatton, was built by the Rev. J. F. Close. Here is a dispensary. The union workhouse, on a site of $7\frac{3}{4}$ acres purchased for £482, but subject to a rent of £1. 13. 5., was completed in 1841, at an expense of £4050, and is constructed to contain 300 paupers.

KILKEEL, county of KILDARE.—See KILTEEL.

KILKEEVAN, a parish, in the union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Castlerea, 10,922 inhabitants. It comprises $27,007\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres. Some of the land is of good quality, and there are large grazing-farms: the parish includes a great quantity of bog, much of which is easily reclaimable; and very good limestone. The principal seats are, Clonallis, the residence of the O'Conor Don; Arm Lodge; Dalefield; Southpark; and Harristown. Kilkeevan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Ballintobber in the cathedral of Elphin; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Essex. The tithe rent-charge is £337. 10., of which £150 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, at Castlerea, is a neat edifice built in 1818, for which the late Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £2500, and has been repaired by a grant of £200 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £850 from the late Board, in 1821: the glebe comprises 14*a.* 3*r.* 30*p.*, subject to a rent of £2. 6. $1\frac{1}{2}$. per acre. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a large chapel at Castlerea. There are some remains of an abbey at Moor; also of a church at Kilkeevan, with a cemetery attached, which is the burial-place of the O'Conor Don family.—See CASTLEREA.

KILKELLANE, or KILCULLANE, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of SMALL COUNTY, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bruff, and on the road from Limerick to Hospital; containing 1186 inhabitants. This was part of the immense estate of the Earl of Desmond, and on his rebellion was granted to Robert Bouchier, Gent., who soon afterwards erected Kilcullane House, which has been sold to Viscount Guillamore. The parish comprises 1390 statute acres: the land is fertile, and based on limestone; there are some small tracts of turbary. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, forming part of the union of Cahircorney; the rectory is impropriate in E. Deane Freeman, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £101. 5., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilkellane forms part of the district of Hospital, or Herbertstown. Near the remains of the old church are the ruins of Kilcullane Castle, which was erected in the 15th century.

KILKELLY, a village, in the parish of KILMOVEE, union of SWINFORD, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing 142 inhabitants.

KILKENNY (County of), an inland county, in the western part of the province of LEINSTER, bounded on the east by the counties of Carlow and Wexford, on the north by the Queen's county, on the west by the county of Tipperary, and on the south by the county of Waterford. It extends from 52° 14′ to 52° 51′ (N. Lat.), and from 6° 56′ to 7° 38′ (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of $509,731\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, whereof 470,102 are arable land, 21,126 uncultivated, 13,899 plantation, 1549 in towns and villages, and 3056 under water. The population, in 1821, was 158,716; in 1831, 169,945; and in 1841, 183,349. According to Ptolemy, this county was originally inhabited by the Brigantes and the Cauci. It afterwards formed part of the kingdom of Ossory. The name of Uisraigagh, modernised into Ossory, is supposed to be expressive of the situation of the district, being compounded of the Gaelic words uisge, "water," and rioghachd, "kingdom," as lying between two rivers. The portion between the Nore and Barrow is sometimes excluded from the kingdom of Ossory, and was anciently styled Hy Creoghain Gabhran; the southern part of the county was often called Comor na tri uisge, "the high district of the three waters." The countries of Ely O'Carrol and Hy Carthin comprised some of the north-western portion of this county. The kingdom of Ossory was sometimes tributary to Leinster, and sometimes to Munster. After the arrival of the English, Kilkenny formed one of the counties into which King John divided the portion of the island that acknowledged his sovereignty. At the commencement of the reign of James I., it was chiefly occupied by the Graces, O'Brenans, Wandesfords, Butlers, O'Sheas, Rooths, Harpers, Walshes of the mountains, and Shortals.

This county is partly in the diocese of Cashel, and partly in the diocese of Leighlin, but chiefly in and comprehending the greater part of the diocese of Ossory, in the province of Dublin. For purposes of CIVIL jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Callan, Gowran, Ida, Fassadineen, Kells, Galmoy, Cranagh, Iverk, Knocktopher, and Shillelogher. Besides the county of the city of Kilkenny, it contains the once incorporated market and post towns of Callan, Thomastown, and Gowran; the market and post towns of Castlecomer, Durrow, and Graig; the ancient disfranchised boroughs of Knocktopher and Inistioge, of which the latter is a post-town, and the former has a sub-post; and the post-towns of Freshford, Ballyragget, Urlingford, Johnstown, and Goresbridge. Among the largest villages are those of Piltown, Clough, Bennetts-Bridge, and Rossbercon, besides the large suburb of Ferrybank, opposite the city of Waterford. Prior to the Union this county, exclusively of Kilkenny city, sent twelve members to the Irish parliament,—two knights of the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs of Callan, Gowran, Thomastown, Knocktopher, and Inistioge: but since that period its representation has been confined to two members for the county at large, and one for the city. The constituency, as registered in 1841, was 1530, whereof 279 were £50, 83 £20, and 928 £10, freeholders; 3 £50, 20 £20, and 206 £10, leaseholders; and 2 £50, and 9 £20, rent-chargers. The election takes place at Kilkenny. The shire is included in the Leinster circuit: the assizes are held at Kilkenny; and quarter-sessions at Kilkenny, Castlecomer, Callan, Piltown, Urlingford, and Thomastown. The county courthouse and the county gaol are in Kilkenny, and there are bridewells at Urlingford, Callan, Graig, and Thomastown. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 17 deputy lieutenants, and 52 other magistrates; besides whom are the usual county officers, including two coroners. There are above 50 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, 8 sub-inspectors, 8 head-constables, 67 constables, and 304 sub-constables, with 10 horses; the cost of whose maintenance in 1842, was £17,109, defrayed by grand jury presentments and by government. The county infirmary and fever hospital are at Kilkenny; and there are fever hospitals at Freshford, Kells, Kilmoganny, and Rossbercon; and dispensaries at Kilkenny, Castlecomer, Ballyragget, Graig, Freshford, Kilmanagh, Knocktopher, Kilmoganny, Thomastown, Ida, Kells and Stonyford, Gowran, Callan, Durrow, Johnstown, Kilmacow, Urlingford, Whitechurch, and Inistioge, maintained by equal subscriptions and grand jury presentments. The total amount of the grand jury presentments, for 1844, was £30,864. In the military arrangements the county is included in the Dublin district.

An argillaceous SOIL may be considered as predominant throughout the county, within the limits of which there is very little ground unfit for tillage, or which does not form good meadow or pasture. The northern part consists chiefly of a moory turf, a few inches deep, incumbent on a bed of stiff yellow or whitish clay; this is the worst soil in the county, and the only kind liable to be injured by surface water. More southerly, the soil is in general light, covering an argillaceous schistus. The northern part of the barony of Gowran is similar in quality, until its hills subside into a rich plain covered by loam of various kinds. An excellent soil for the growth of wheat pervades the southern part of this barony from the Barrow to the Nore; its western portion consists of low hills or gently sloping grounds of good soil, dry, and sometimes deep, but diminishing in quality as it approaches the latter of those rivers. To the west of the Nore, below the city of Kilkenny, is a clayey loam immediately over a bed of limestone. In general, the nearer the limestone is to the surface, the poorer the soil; but as this kind of ground, along the banks of the river, produces close and green herbage, and is extremely dry, it seems calculated by nature to form the best kind of sheep-walks. A light soil appears all round the city of Kilkenny, frequently rising into hills of sand and gravel. Along the banks of the Nore, northwards, good meadow ground is found, apparently formed by aquatic depositions: some of it consists of a deep blackish loam, apparently the produce of decayed vegetables, and inducing the inference that the Nore, formerly obstructed by rocks or other natural impediments which the impetuosity of its water had ultimately broken down, was once an expansive lake. The edges of a lake may still be traced round the plain inclining towards Freshford; and Achadh-ur, or "the Field of Water," the old name for Freshford, strengthens the conclusion. The northwestern portion of the county is chiefly occupied by hills, the soil of which, though not deep, is of good quality and productive of fine herbage. From the whitish appearance of these calcareous hills, the district was probably called Geal-Magh, "the White field," corrupted into Galmoy. The country hence declines northwards into a varied plain of still better soil, until it is bounded by a branch of the Bog of Allen; the western part of the county, with a varied surface and a limestone bottom, possesses all the gradations between a stiff, yet rich, clayey soil and a light gravel. Proceeding southwards, the fertility of the land increases as it approaches the Suir, on the margin of which is some of the richest and deepest ground in the county. Some parts of this southern district consist of low hills covered by a light dry soil, producing good crops; and, as the soil has a large proportion of argill, it is peculiarly productive on the application of calcareous manure.

There is a considerable extent of mountain land in the county, much of which is unimproved: all the hills, when they rise a little above the calcareous districts, incline to a moory surface, and when neglected produce little but heath. The quantity of peat is inconsiderable; by far the largest tract, amounting to 1000 acres, is in the north-western extremity: several small tracts, of from 30 to 50 acres each, are scattered in various parts; and the whole may be estimated at about 1500 acres, not including mountain ground, the surface of which is often stripped for fuel. A bed of marl has been found in a bog, between two strata of black peat; also three strata of bog separated by alternate beds of indifferent marl. Some of the lesser bogs may be cut to a depth of 20 feet: considerable quantities of oak, fir, and birch are found in them. A stratum of bog has been found 33 feet beneath the surface, covered with the following strata:—vegetable mould, 3 feet; marl with black stones, 15 feet; yellow clay and hard gravel, 15 feet. There are no loughs of any extent: in the parish of Cloghmanta are some small lakes, here called Loughaus, which are formed by the surface water in winter.

The best land in the county, most of which has a limestone bottom, is applied to the growth of wheat.

which is the predominant CROP. Barley is usually sown after it; here is not in general cultivation. Oats are cultivated in all parts of the county; the species most commonly used is the Irish, a hardy but small grain, which does not shed easily. Rye, which is but little cultivated, is usually sown on land that has been pared and burned, and produces fine crops on mountainous ground. Potatoes are every where grown: every kind of manure in the county is applied in their culture; but the most approved is that from the farmyard, though the sweepings of the streets of Kilkenny are purchased at a high price, and other manures consist of composts of various kinds: lime by itself is sometimes used. In the barony of Iverk, and every where within reach of the coast, or of the Suir, sea-wrack and sand are generally used. Green crops are very rare, being cultivated only by some of the principal gentry and a few wealthy farmers. Manure is seldom used for any but the potato crop; when exhausted by repeated tillage, the land is too frequently left to recruit itself by a natural process: grass and clover seeds are, however, sometimes sown, and the advantages are beginning to be appreciated.

In the best cultivated parts of the county about one-third of the ground is under tillage, but in the hilly parts the proportion is much less. The use of green food for any species of stock is almost unknown to common farmers: many of the cattle graze abroad the whole winter, though some are housed from Christmas to April. In the Walsh mountains grass is kept for the cattle, which are turned into it in the winter without hay, straw, or shelter. The only green food used in winter is furze-tops pounded, which are commonly given to horses, and sometimes to black-cattle; the former become fat, sleek, and fine-skinned on this food: the sort preferred is the large French furze, but the small Irish furze will serve. The stalks of potatoes, dug when green, are given to cattle: sheep are remarkably fond of them, and particularly of the apples, which fatten greatly. The Jerusalem artichoke has also been used successfully as food for sheep. Less attention seems to be paid to PASTURE than to other agricultural objects; it being, in the tillage districts, such fields as will no longer bear corn, let out without any seeds. The mountain pastures are in a state of nature, uninclosed and unimproved. Sheep are banished from many places for want of fences, and the land there seems to be applied to no purpose, being left to the spontaneous growth of heath. The heaths are very liable to take fire in dry summers by accidental circumstances, and cause some damage: the fire, however, eventually improves the surface, when not too intense, and sometimes is kindled for that purpose. That the hilly tracts are capable of being improved by culture is testified by the aspect of the small inclosures near mountain villages, where the natural grass, by a little shelter and manure, becomes surprisingly green. Improvement is not much impeded by rights of common, as there are few persons to assert such rights, if they exist, and landlords seem to have an undisputed authority in partitioning lands, which, though grazed in common, confer no legal claim on the occupier. Irrigation is but little attended to; although, where it has been practised judiciously, it has been found very advantageous.

There are considerable portions of land, bordering both on the Suir and the Nore, embanked, and chiefly laid out as meadows. The most remarkable is in the parish of Roer, where the embankment is about two miles long; some of it is pastured, and was formerly tilled, but the greater part is constantly kept in meadow: it is intersected by open drains communicating with a main drain connected with the river by sluices. Besides this district, the most extensive dairies are in the barony of IVERK and around the Walsh mountains: this tract has a good depth of soil, much inclined to grass. So late as the close of the last century, the principal family residing here consisted of five branches, holding among them more than 2000 acres; they retained a remarkable degree of clanship, by constantly intermarrying, and were very comfortable in their circumstances, and hospitable. From the practice of subdividing the land amongst their descendants, the farms have become very small and the occupiers poorer. The land, however, is much improved; the chief crops are oats and potatoes, and great numbers of cattle and pigs are bred here. The milch-cows are principally fed on potatoes during the summer; the butter is of a superior quality, and brings a good price both at Waterford and Kilkenny, whence it is exported to England. The pigs are mostly fed with buttermilk and potatoes, and grow to a large size; vast numbers are annually shipped for England, and during the season the provision merchants of Kilkenny and Waterford obtain a large supply from the barony of Iverk. Throughout the whole of that part of the barony which is not immediately adjacent to the city of Waterford, the population is more or less connected by ties of consanguinity, rarely marrying out of their own district.

Limestone to a great extent is burned for MANURE; and limestone sand and gravel, raised from the numerous escars and screened, were formerly esteemed nearly as efficacious as lime, and are still frequently employed when found at a distance from limestone rocks. Before the practice of burning lime became general, they formed the principal manures, for which reason large excavations are to be found whence these substances were raised: the most remarkable is in the barony of Iverk, where, from the magnitude of the old excavations, the sand and gravel have been in use probably for a thousand years. A manure somewhat similar is employed under the name of Kilmacow sand, for hilly ground; it is carried up the Nore to Inistioge, and thence drawn for some miles up the hills. Marl is found in great quantities in different parts, generally mixed with fragments of limestone; but, in consequence of the higher estimation in which lime is held, it is not in general use. River sand, raised below Ross, is more extensively applied than marl. At the edge of the river, near Ringville, black mud, containing the decayed remains of vegetables, is raised, and proves an excellent manure for light ground: some sand is also taken up, containing thin broken shells of a species of tellina; the earth of old ditches and from boggy ground is often mixed with it. A compost of lime and earth is common as a top dressing; and the scrapings of roads, and furze, fern, and straw, spread on lanes and other thoroughfares, are also used. Burning was the usual way of bringing land into tillage, and was encouraged by many landlords under particular restrictions, but is now generally dis-countenanced, as the carbon and all volatile particles are dissipated by the fire.

The use of oxen in the plough seems to be rather increasing, though the proportion is very small in comparison with horses. The native Irish horses are lively, active, hardy, and well adapted to the uses of the farmer; few are bred in the county: of English breeds the Suffolk is most in request. The attention paid to the breeding of CATTLE is inferior to that paid in the adjoining counties of Carlow and Waterford, and some parts of Tipperary: the common breed is a cross between the old Irish and Lancashire, and some districts have the old native cow. Some noblemen and gentlemen have a superior kind, being a cross between the Irish and Durham; and crosses between the Irish and Devon, and Ayrshire and Durham breeds, appear to suit both the soil and climate. But those that attain the largest size are a cross between the Limerick and Durham, which fatten speedily and weigh well. The little Kerry cow is much sought after in some of the dairy districts, in which it improves much, and when crossed with the Ayrshire it is very profitable to the small farmer. The breed of sheep is generally little improved; the New Leicester and Ayrshire breeds are found in the lawns and demesnes of some gentlemen, but are comparatively few in number. Pigs have been greatly improved by the introduction of the Berkshire and other superior breeds. In all the minor departments of rural economy, except the rearing of poultry, the farmers are very deficient.

The fences are mostly indifferent, principally consisting of an old broad mound of earth (called a ditch), with a deep and broad trench on one or both sides, or of dry and broken stone walls, except in the immediate neighbourhood of Kilkenny or on the farms of gentlemen, where in many instances quickset hedges show to great advantage: the parks and demesnes are for the most part inclosed with high stone walls. The county generally is very deficient in woods and plantations, although there are some of considerable extent around Kilkenny, Durrow, Desart, Woodstock, Besborough, Castlecomer, Thomastown, and other places on the banks of the Nore. Callan and its neighbourhood, once so celebrated for extensive woods, are now denuded; but from Kilkenny to Callan the fences appear better, and the land more judiciously divided, than in other parts. An agricultural society, the first midland society formed, has been long established; perhaps the most beneficial result of it is the improvement of agricultural implements, which has been accomplished to a considerable degree.

As the soil is seldom much raised above the rock that forms its basis, it is not difficult to trace the SUBSTRATA: these are granite, silicious schistus, silicious breccia, argillite, sandstone, and limestone. The Granite hills, however, form a very small part of the county, being merely the extension of the Wicklow group, which, including Mount Leinster and Blackstairs in the county of Carlow, forms the hills of Brandon between the Barrow and the Nore, and ultimately terminates in the low and secondary hills that unite to the south, towards the mountains of Waterford. The stratum which usually joins the granite is silicious schistus, and, lower down, argillaceous slate. The granite varies in shades of grey, red, and yellow, and in the fineness of its grain; the best is of a light yellow tint, finely grained, and compact; black mica is found in it, together with specks of iron-ore and crystals of schorl: it can be raised in blocks of large size, and may be chiselled into any form. Below Inistioge, portions of the hills are composed of granite; on their lower part the yellow mica is sometimes found by itself in large masses. The detached stones which form the surface of these hills are called fire-stones, and are worked into hearthstones, and also applied to other purposes. Pieces of a very fine deep red and compact jasper, of various sizes, the largest ten or twelve inches long and half as broad, have been discovered in the granite district. The Silicious Schistus is blackish, sometimes containing grains of quartz; when broken it has a shivery texture and thin lamellæ, and is hard enough to scratch glass. The base of Brandon Hill, and of that extending thence to Graig, is composed of it; between Inistioge and Ross it is quarried out of the steep banks of the river, and the town of New Ross is mostly built of it: the dip of the quarries here is eastward. Martial pyrites frequently may be found between the beds of this stone; the strata are also intersected by broad veins of quartz; iron-ochre occurs in it, and it is much tinged by oxyde of iron. A few specks of copper are sometimes perceived, but no vein has been discovered. Fine-grained galena has also been detected, in small quantities and in detached fragments. Silicious Breccia forms many of the lower hills; it consists principally of fine quartz sand, united by a silicious cement, and enveloping rounded pebbles of quartz, from the size of a pea to two or three inches in diameter, and of a reddish tinge. It seems to be one of the stones styled by Kirwan semiprotolites, and wherever its base can be discovered, it appears to lie on silicious schistus. This stone is constantly accompanied by red argillite, which covers the sides of the hills, but scarcely ever the summits; the argillite prevails on the northern sides of the hills, and from its appearance is sometimes called red slate. The hills of breccia run southward from the Nore, spreading to the south and south-east till they approach the Suir: the great hill of Drumdowney, bounded by the Ross river, forms the extremity of the principal range. The stone here is of a fine grain, and is raised for millstones, which are principally quarried on the top of the hill of Drumdowney, where an inclosure of about 300 acres has been made for the purpose: they are sent coastwise to Cork, Dublin, and other ports: the largest are five feet in diameter and sixteen inches in the eye. This stone is sometimes accompanied by a fine-grained white sandstone, consisting chiefly of quartz with a silicious cement; the chief defect of the sandstone is that the strata are very thin. Slaty argillite also often forms the lower parts of those hills, varying from reddish brown to green or blue, but being very heavy it is not well adapted for roofing. In the western part of the county is an extensive quarry of excellent slates, scarcely exceeded by any in colour and lightness. The northern part, including the whole of Fassadineen and the upper part of Gowran, consists either of ferruginous argillite, or of silicious schistus: of the latter, stones are raised in several quarries for the purpose of flagging; the former is always found above the coal, and is thence called coal-cover. This coal-cover is a brittle blackish slate impregnated with iron-ochre, and more or less inlaid with nodules of iron-ore; it extends from the collieries to the south and west, forming the banks of the Dinan almost to its confluence with the Nore. The same stone forms lower hills which stretch towards the river, but in that part it is generally found of a fine soft grain; some is quarried for polishing marble, and the finer specimens are sometimes used as hones. In several parts of the county are numerous Escars, mostly near the banks of the rivers; some are seen near Urlingford, approaching the verge of the Bog of Allen, and they are also frequently found far removed from either river or bog: they are mostly composed of rounded masses of limestone, quartz, clay-slate, and ironstone, but most commonly of the first. They form gently rising hills, and may be traced from the banks of the Shannon, in the county of Limerick, through Tipperary and Kilkenny, to the banks of the Suir, whence they range through Carlow, Kildare, and near to the sea-shore a little to the south of Dublin: along their entire extent the surface is generally fertile and very picturesque.

The KILKENNY COLLIERIES are situated two miles north from Castlecomer, twelve from Kilkenny, eight from Carlow, and forty-one from Dublin, and extend in length from Cooleban to the river beyond Maesfield, continuing thence into the Queen's county. In this county the coal-field may be estimated at six miles in length by five in breadth, and the collieries are distinguished by the names of Firoda, Ballyouskill, Clogh, and Maesfield. The mines were discovered in 1728. A great number of men had been for several years employed in raising iron-ore, which was smelted with charcoal from the numerous woods of the country; and having worked through the seam, they came unexpectedly to a vein of coal. The first pits were sunk near the southern termination of the coal-field, and were consequently unprofitable; others were then opened on the ridge of hill at Cooleban, where three separate seams were worked at little expense till exhausted. The present collieries are in the plain westward from Cooleban, and are much flooded: two powerful steam-engines are constantly at work, but the water frequently accumulates to such a height as to interrupt the operations. In this field are 24 pits, varying from 31 to 39 yards in depth; and only the upper seam of coal, which varies from 34 to 38 inches in thickness, has yet been worked: more than 700 men are constantly employed. The soil of the entire district is a stiff clay, below which is a rock composed of argillite and silicious limestone, resting on an argillaceous deposit here called grey or curled rock, below which is black shale, with thin layers of rich iron-ore; beneath these are thin layers of slate, here forming the roof of the coal. The seat of the coal is a soft, black, brittle stone, or fire-clay, containing impressions of various plants: it has never been applied to any beneficial purpose, although, when pulverised and worked into cement, it becomes fire-proof, and would be very valuable for crucibles, glass-pots, and other vessels exposed to intense heat. Since the woods of the country failed, no attempt has been made to smelt the iron-ore, and vast quantities lie scattered about in every part. Wheaten bread is the principal food of the colliers, who take it with them into the pits: their chief earnings, however, are consumed in the purchase of spirits, whence it happens that, though their wages are higher than those of other workmen, they are the most wretched class in the county. Their habitations are miserably mean, being generally built and covered with sods, sometimes without chimneys or windows; their children naked; themselves ill clad and unhealthy, few arriving at the age of fifty. A consumption of the lungs is the most fatal disorder among them: those who work in wet pits live longest, as they do not inhale so much of the volatile dust of the coal. The excellent qualities of this coal for particular uses occasion a demand for it in all parts of the country. It burns dully, with little flame, but lying like charcoal in an ignited state for seven or eight hours, casts a steady and strong heat. No fuel dries malt so well, and this without any preparation; it is also excellent for the forge and for all works in iron: indeed, in every manufacture in which steady heat is required void of smoke, it cannot be excelled; nor does it dirty the flues where it is used. On being analysed, it appears to approach nearly to pure carbon, without any bituminous matter; the proportions being 97.3 per cent. of pure carbon, and the remainder uninflammable ashes. Iron has been successfully smelted with it; and it seems peculiarly calculated for cementing steel, and for potteries. In the town of Castlecomer very good, tenacious, brown potters'-clay is found, and different clays for potters' use exist in the neighbourhood: a pottery commenced here many years since failed from want of capital.

Indications of coal present themselves in other parts, extending for a considerable distance into Queen's county, and in one direction stretching to the border of Carlow. Yellow ochre is found in different places; pipe-clay of good quality, and potters'-clay, lie in the southern part of the county as well as in the northern. Manganese is considerably dispersed; it is seen on the banks of the Barrow, and in limestone-quarries, particularly near Freshford. Of copper, no certain indications have been found: lead-ore has been met with in small quantities between Inistioge and Ross; large pieces of fine-grained galena are frequently taken up near Knocktopher, imbedded in limestone-quarries. But the only lead-mine ever worked was that in the park of Floodhall, which was continued for some time with considerable profit; the ore was rich, and contained a quantity of silver. Limestone is the base of the central part of the county, and of detached portions of its north-western and south-western extremities. The quality of the stone varies considerably: that to the north of Gowran, which appears good to the eye, cannot be burned into lime, on account of its hardness, or of the quantity of silicious sand which it contains. Near Callan is a kind of white limestone, splitting into laminæ, which is little esteemed: near Durrow, the stone is full of flint. All the limestone of this county contains impressions of shells or corallines: it is stratified more horizontally than the rocks around it usually are, and appears to fill all the lower lands between the hills; no stone lies above it, and it is generally so deep that scarcely any has been found beneath it. In most cases the limestone district is terminated by a broad bed of gravel, composed chiefly of rolled calcareous pebbles. The most important quarry is that which produces the Kilkenny Marble; it is called the Black quarry, and is situated about half a mile south of the town. The stone, when polished, has a black ground more or less varied with white marks, which appear more conspicuously when exposed to the air; but the jet black specimens only are esteemed at Kilkenny. This marble contains a great variety of impressions of madrepores, and of bivalve and turbinate shells: the spar which occupies the place of the shells sometimes assumes a greenish yellow colour. In some places there are iridiscent spots; and sometimes martial pyrites is imbedded in the marble. A small specimen of pink fluor was found in it; but this is a very rare occurrence. The analysis of the most common kind gave 98 per cent. soluble in marine acid, and 2 per cent. of a black powder of carbon, which burned without leaving any ashes. The blocks raised at this quarry are finished principally at a marble-mill at some distance, which presents a very elegant combination of simplicity of structure with powers of execution: it performs the work of forty-two men daily; water never fails, and from the excellence of its construction the mill is scarcely ever stopped on account of repairs.

The WOOLLEN manufacture owes its introduction into the county to Pierce, Earl of Ormonde, who died in 1359, and his wife Margaret, who brought artists in tapestry, diaper, and carpets, from Flanders; some of their tapestry is still in the castle of Kilkenny. James, Duke of Ormonde, also incurred great expense, in the middle of the 17th century, in establishing both the linen and woollen manufacture. This latter branch was chiefly carried on at Carrick, where it gave employment for many years to the population of the surrounding district; its decline is attributed to the fraudulent practice of stretching the cloths to augment the measurement, until the Dublin merchants refused to buy them: the manufacture was principally carried on by large farmers and their families. In the hilly districts a constant manufacture of frieze and ratteen prevails: the yarn is spun by the women; both sexes are employed in carding the wool; and the farmers' sons, who are taught to weave, manufacture it into cloth. On the decline of the frieze trade, that of wool-combing succeeded; the combers converting their coarse offal wool into blanketing, which has gradually become a staple branch of trade. The LINEN trade was introduced towards the close of the 17th century, and prospered for fifty or sixty years; but within the last century it has so decayed as to leave few traces of its former prosperity, only the coarser cloths for domestic consumption being now made: many of the bleach-greens were converted into mills of various kinds, but there are three still tolerably well employed. In the hilly districts every farmer grows a little flax for his own use, and generally bleaches his own linen; he also often has a little hemp to make sacking. The number of Flour-mills is very great: there are twenty-two on the Nore between Durrow and Inistioge; on the King's river, from Callan to the Nore, ten; on the part of the Barrow within the county, three or four; and several on the streams which fall into the Suir and other great rivers. Rape-mills have been erected, but are not profitable; the exportation of the seed being found more advantageous than the manufacture of the oil. The principal part of the grain raised in the county is sent to Dublin in the shape of flour, malt, and meal, the preparation of which is a source of internal wealth: the wheat and barley find a ready sale among the millers, maltsters, and distillers, so that very little is brought to the market-house.

The rivers were formerly famous for their salmon, much of which was sent to Dublin, both fresh and preserved in ice; but the quantity has decreased during the last century, caused, as is supposed, by the increased number of mills. The salmon-trout is not uncommon in the rivers; its usual length is from eighteen to twenty inches. The shad comes up the Nore in April and returns in May; the sturgeon appears but rarely; porpoises sometimes follow the salmon beyond Waterford; the conger-eel is sometimes taken; lampreys are thrown away by the fishermen, not being even kept for bait. All the aquatic birds usually found along the course of large rivers are met with here: the common gull follows their course to a great distance, devouring many insects pernicious to the farmer, and returns to the sea at night; the peasantry call it the white crow. The king-fisher and water ousel are not uncommon.

The principal RIVERS are the Suir, the Barrow, and the Nore, all of which combine here in their progress to the sea, but have their source in other counties. The Suir, from Tipperary and Waterford, joins the boundary of Kilkenny at the parish of Tipperaghny, whence it forms the southern boundary of the county for about twenty miles until it falls into Waterford harbour; vessels of 100 tons' burthen navigate it to Carrick-on-Suir, and of a much larger burthen to Waterford. An act was lately obtained for removing the rocks and other obstacles in its bed, so as to enable vessels of greater size to proceed into the interior. The Barrow, anciently the Birga, connects itself with the county from the county of Carlow near Leighlin-Bridge, and runs along the eastern boundary for about 26 miles, separating Kilkenny from the counties of Carlow and Wexford until it joins the sea, under the name of the Ross river, at Waterford harbour; in its course after leaving Leighlin-Bridge, it passes by the towns of Goresbridge, Graig, and New Ross. Large sums of money have been expended in improving its navigation to Athy, in Kildare. The Nore or Newre, which more peculiarly belongs to the county, enters it from the Queen's county near Durrow, and flows through its central part in a winding course of not less than 46 miles, to its junction with the Barrow above New Ross; it passes near the village of Ballyragget, and through the city of Kilkenny. South of Kilkenny it receives the King's river from the west, whence in its course by Thomastown and Inistioge it presents a rich variety of picturesque scenery: after its junction with the Barrow, the united stream takes the name of the Ross river. Like all mountain rivers, it is subject to great floods, which are highest when the wind has blown for some time from the north-east, accompanied with rain: the clouds thus driven on the hills to the north of the county, and quickly succeeding each other, convert into torrents all the streams that feed the Nore. On such occasions the water has risen eighteen feet at Inistioge. It has long been an object of importance to establish a navigation from Kilkenny to the sea by means of this river; much money has been expended in the attempt, and many plans proposed, but none accomplished. The boats navigating it to Thomastown carry thirteen or fourteen tons down the river when it is full, and bring up ten tons, but only three or four when the water is low; they are drawn up by eight men, and require two more to work them. The roads in the county are numerous, and are generally well laid out and kept in good repair. Several new lines have been made: the principal are those from Kilkenny to Piltown, Carrick-on-Suir, Freshford, and Roscrea respectively, from Castlecomer to Ballynakill, from Callan to Johnstown, and from Inistioge to Waterford. The construction of these lines, particularly of those through the hilly districts, has afforded to the farmer increased facility for the carriage of lime, and the conveyance of agricultural produce to market.

The traces of ANTIQUITY are numerous. On the summit of Tory Hill, called in Irish Slieve-Grian, or "the Hill of the Sun," is a circular space covered with stones, on one of which, resting on several others, is an inscription which has given rise to much controversy. On the summit of the Hill of Cloghmanta, which signifies "the Stone of God," is another circular heap. Both these monuments are much decayed. The most remarkable cromlech is at Kilmogue, in the barony of Knocktopher; the upper stone is 45 feet in circumference, and is elevated six feet above the ground at its lower end, and 15 at its upper: the country people call the place Lachan Schal, or "the Great Altar." Numerous other cromlechs are dispersed through various parts of the county. In the vicinity of the spa of Ballyspellane is a large stone, formerly supported by several smaller; it is called Cloghbannagh, or "the Stone of Blessing," and not far from it is a conical stone, lying on its side. The remains of another heap, called Cloghan-carneen, may be seen at Ballynasleigh, near Durrow: many human bones have been found in the neighbourhood, and, among others, a skeleton inclosed between flags, with a horn near it. On the Hill of Garryduff, in Fiddown parish, is a place called Leibe-na-cuhn, or "the Dog's Grave," around which are the remains of ranges of stones. Several small urns containing ashes were found in front of a great stone in Kilbeacon parish, and in other places. Raths are very numerous in some districts, particularly in Galmoy and near the Nore; they are of various shapes, and are formed of one, two, or three inclosures. Chambers under ground, roofed with flags, are found not accompanied by raths. At Earlsrath is a very large fort inclosed by a fosse, in the area of which are the vestiges of buildings. Some large moats are observable in several parts: the largest are at Callan, Kilkenny, and Castlecomer; one of them, at Rathbeath, is pointed out as the place where Heremon built his palace and was buried. There are five round towers: one at St. Canice, a few feet from the southern side of the cathedral; another at Tullaherm; a third at Kilree; a fourth at Fertagh, or Fertagh-na-geiragh: of the fifth, at Aghaviller, only the lower part remains. In the parish of Macullee is a place called Reighlig-na-lughduigh, or "the Burying-place of the Black Lough," where are some upright stones, near which human bones and several bronze spear-heads have been found. There is a faint tradition that a great battle was fought here. Besides the ruined abbeys in the city of Kilkenny, there were two very celebrated monasteries of the Cistercian order, one at Jerpoint, the other at Graig. The Dominicans had abbeys at Rossbercon and Thomastown, and the Carmelites at Knocktopher. An old abbey is said to have stood at Barrowmount; another near Kellymount; and a second monastery, not noticed by writers on the monastic antiquities of Ireland, was situated at Thomastown.

The number of CASTLES, though much diminished by the ravages of time and internal commotions, is still very great; but most consist only of a single tower. Granny or Grandison Castle, in Iverk, is one of the most considerable; it was the residence of Margaret Fitzgerald, the great Countess of Ormonde, a lady of uncommon talents and qualifications, who is said also to have built the castles of Balleen and Coolkill, with several others of minor note. The Butlers owned the castles of Knocktopher, Gowran, Dunfert, Poolestown, Nehorn, Callan, Ballycallan, Damagh, Kilmanagh, and Urlingford. King John built a castle at Tybrackny, where also are the foundations of a Danish town and a tombstone with Danish sculptures. The castles of Drumroe, Barrowmount, and Low Grange, are said to have belonged to Lord Galmoy; those of Stroan, Kilfane, Clofouke, Conahy, Ballyfoyle, and Cloranke, to the family of the Purcells; that of Cowen to the Brennans; those of Castlemorres, Frenystown, and Foulksrath, to the families whose names they bear; and those of Bishops-court and Kilbline to the Currys. The Shortalls possessed the castles of Cloghmanta, Kilrush, Tubbrid, Killeshuran, and Balief; the two last, as well as that of Seskin near Durrow, are round. Gaulstown Castle belonged to a branch of the De Burgos; Grenan, said to have been built in the time of King John, to a family of the name of Den: the Walshes of the mountains held numerous castles; Courtstown, Ballylench, and some others, belonged to the Graces; Dunfert, corrupted into Danesfort, was erected by William, Earl Marshal. The modern mansions of the nobility and gentry are noticed in the account of the parishes in which they are respectively situated.

The farmhouses are generally built of stone, oftener cemented with clay than mortar; some of the better kind are slated, but thatch is most common; some may be comfortable, but few are neat or cleanly. The residences of rich farmers are usually inferior to their means; but the greatest defect is in the offices, which are sometimes covered with potato-stalks, forming a very bad thatch, and sometimes with heath, which is not much better. Ash-trees are often planted near the farmhouses, and, towards the border of Munster, cherry-trees. The offices generally form an irregular yard in the front of the house, wholly or at least partially occupied by the dunghill. The usual tenure for farms is for thirty-one years, or three lives: some land in the hilly districts is held at will, but tenures of this description are decreasing; the inhabitants of these districts, who for the most part live in scattered villages and hold in partnership, usually obtaining a joint lease for years. There is not much land in mortmain: the see of Ossory, or rather the Ecclesiastical Commission, possesses about 9300 acres, besides the manors of Durrow and Freshford. The condition of the labouring poor is wretched in the extreme: it is only by slow degrees that they can procure articles of clothing; turf is their general fuel, in consequence of the high price of coal; and potatoes, with milk when it can be procured, are almost their only food: sometimes, but not always, salt is added, and occasionally a herring. The clothing is frieze and flannel; the women wear stuff petticoats; straw hats manufactured at home, and estimated at from sixpence to a shilling, are commonly worn by both sexes. The English language is very generally spoken.

At Ballyspellane, in Galmoy barony, is a mineral spa, celebrated both for the medicinal properties imputed to it, and by the lines written on it by the witty and eccentric Dr. Sheridan, the friend of Swift; the water is best drunk on the spot, as the carbonic acid gas contained in it, and to which its effects are chiefly attributable, soon evaporates on exposure to the air. Chalybeate spas, but not of much strength, exist near St. John's bridge on the Nore, near the marble hill on the same river, and at Jerpoint Abbey. In the Castlecomer collieries are also some weak chalybeates, and others are to be found dispersed through the county. Springs of very pure transparent water are numerous; most of them are named after some saint, and have a patron annually held near them.

KILKENNY, a city, and, including Irishtown, a county of itself, the seat of the diocese of Ossory, and the head of a union, locally in the county of KILKENNY, of which it is the chief town, and in the province of LEINSTER, 24 miles (N. E. by N.) from Clonmel, and 57½ (S. W.) from Dublin; on the river Nore and the coach-road to Cork; containing within the parliamentary borough 23,625 inhabitants, of whom 19,071 are within the bounds of the county of the city. This place is supposed by some writers to have derived its name from Coil or Kyle Ken-Ni, "the wooded head, or hill, near the river;" and by others, with more probability, from the dedication of its church to St. Canice, or St. Kenny, on the removal of the ancient see of Ossory from Aghavoe to this place, about the year 1052. The see had been originally founded at Saiger, now Seir-Keran, about 402. Of the history of the town little is recorded previously to 1173, when Donald O'Brien, King of Thomond, assembled his forces to dispossess the English invaders under Strongbow, who had established themselves and erected a fortress here soon after their landing in Ireland. On this occasion Strongbow retreated to Waterford, and abandoned the castle to the enemy, by whom, together with the town, it was demolished, and the surrounding country laid waste. In 1192, the English appear to have settled themselves firmly at this place; and in 1195, William Le Mareschal, who had succeeded to Strongbow's possessions, rebuilt the castle on a larger scale, and restored the town, which became one of the principal residences of his successors, and the head of the palatinate of Kilkenny. About this time arose that portion of the present town which is strictly called Kilkenny, and which was more immediately connected with the castle, in contradistinction to the original town, called Irishtown, on the opposite bank of a small river flowing into the Nore. Each had its separate and independent municipal government, the former under the lords of the castle, and the latter under the bishops of Ossory, who ceded a portion of Irishtown to William Le Mareschal, by whom the burgesses of Kilkenny were incorporated and endowed with many privileges, among which was exemption from toll in all his territories of Leinster. Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Hereford, marrying a daughter of William Le Mareschal, obtained as her dower the county of Kilkenny, which subsequently passed by marriage to Hugh, grandfather of Thomas Le Spencer, from whom it was purchased by James Butler, third earl of Ormonde.

A great council of the barons of the English pale was held here in 1294. In 1309 a parliament assembled at this place, in which severe laws were enacted against such of the English settlers as should adopt the Irish customs; and anathemas against all who should infringe these laws, were denounced in the cathedral by the Archbishop of Cashel and other prelates who assisted on that occasion. In 1317, Lord Roger Mortimer, justiciary of Ireland, and the English nobles, held a council here to deliberate on the most effectual means of opposing the ravages of Edward Bruce; an army of 30,000 men was collected, and great numbers of families sought refuge in the town under the general alarm. Parliaments were held at Kilkenny in 1327 and 1330, when an army assembled here to drive Brien O'Brien from Urkuffs, near Cashel; in 1331 a parliament was adjourned to this place from Dublin; and in 1341 a grand meeting of the principal nobility took place, assisted by the chief officers of the king's cities, to petition for the better government of Ireland. Other parliaments were held in 1347, 1356, and 1367, at which last, presided over by Lionel, Duke of Clarence, the celebrated statute of Kilkenny was enacted; and also in 1370 and 1374, in which latter parliament Sir William de Windsor was sworn into the office of lord-lieutenant. Letters-patent were granted in 1375 to the burgesses, and renewed in 1384, authorising them to appropriate certain customs for building and repairing the walls; and in 1399, Richard II., in his progress through the south of Ireland, arrived from Waterford at this place, where he was entertained for fourteen days by the Earl of Ormonde. Robert Talbot, a kinsman of the earl's, in 1400, encompassed the greater portion of the town with walls; and in 1419 the townsmen received a grant of tolls for murage. During the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, Kilkenny was taken and plundered by the Earl of Desmond, who was an adherent of the latter; and in 1499 the burgesses, headed by their sovereign, marched out in aid of the Butlers against Tirlagh O'Brien, but were defeated. The last parliament held in the town was convened in 1536, and was adjourned to Cashel; but Kilkenny still continued to be the occasional residence of the lords-lieutenant, and the chief seat of their government, for which purpose Henry VIII. granted to the corporation the site and precincts of the Black friars' monastery, on condition of their furnishing certain accommodation free of expense to the chief governor of Ireland, when in Kilkenny; from which, however, they were subsequently released on payment of a fine of £70. Sir Peter Carew, in his progress to resist the aggressions of the Butlers and Desmonds, in 1568, took possession of the town, which was soon after invested by Fitz-Maurice, brother of Desmond; but the spirited conduct of the garrison compelled him to retire.

In the parliamentary war of 1641 this place was distinguished as the theatre of contention; it was seized by Lord Mountgarret, and in the following year a general synod of the Roman Catholic clergy was held here, and a meeting of deputies from the confederate Catholics from all parts of the kingdom took place in the house of Mr. R. Shee, in the present coal market. The lords, prelates, and commons all sat in the same chamber; while the clergy who were not qualified to sit as barons assembled in convocation in another house; and a press was erected in the city, at which were printed all the decrees of the synod. On the arrival of Rinuncini, the pope's nuncio, the city and suburbs were placed under an interdict, for accepting the peace which had been concluded at this meeting; and in 1648 a scheme was detected for betraying the city and the supreme council into the hands of the nuncio and the party of O'Nial. Cromwell, relying on the promises of an officer of the garrison, advanced before the city though unprepared to besiege it, in the hope of obtaining it by treachery; but the plot was discovered and the agent executed. Having, however, received large reinforcements under Ireton, he again appeared before it on the 23rd of March, 1650, and commenced a regular siege; the garrison, originally consisting of 200 horse and 1000 foot, but reduced by the plague to 300, made a resolute defence under Sir Walter Butler, who had been appointed governor by Lord Castlehaven, but was at length compelled to surrender upon honourable terms.

The CITY, which occupies an area of nearly a square mile, is intersected from north to south by the river Nore, dividing it into two very unequal portions. The larger, containing the castle, is on the western bank; and near the northern extremity, on the same side of the river, is that part of the city called Irishtown, containing the cathedral, and separated from the rest by the small river Breagh, which here falls into the Nore. The streets are very irregular; but the city has an air of venerable magnificence, from its castle, cathedral, and the numerous and imposing remains of its ancient religious edifices, and is seen to great advantage from the high eastern bank of the river, and from the rising ground on the road to Clonmel. The houses in the principal streets are generally built of stone, and many of them are spacious and handsome, especially in that part properly called Kilkenny, in which the chief modern improvements have taken place; the total number of houses, in 1841, was 3357, since which time the number has increased. There are two elegant stone bridges over the Nore, erected after designs by Mr. G. Smith, to replace two which had been destroyed in 1763 by a great flood; St. John's bridge consists of three arches, and Green's bridge connects Irishtown with the opposite bank. In 1845 an act was passed for the construction of a railway to Waterford, with a branch to Kells, the length of the main line to be 31 miles, and of the branch 6¼ miles, British; the capital is £250,000, with a power of borrowing £83,000. The environs are in many parts extremely pleasing, and there is a fine promenade called the Mall, extending nearly a mile along the bank of a canal commenced many years since, but never completed, and also along the banks of the Nore and the base of the castle; it is beautifully planted with ornamental trees of fine growth. At a short distance from the city are infantry barracks for 15 officers and 558 non-commissioned officers and privates, a neat range of buildings of modern erection; there is also a temporary barrack for one squadron of horse. The Library, established in 1811 by a proprietary, and supported by subscription, contains more than 4000 volumes, and has a news-room attached to it; it is open to strangers introduced by a subscriber. The Mechanics'-Friend Society, established in 1835, for diffusing information among the working classes, and supported by subscription, has a library of 700 volumes, and a room in which lectures on the arts and sciences are gratuitously delivered. The Horticultural Society holds two meetings in the year; and races are held in September on a course at a short distance from the town, and are generally well attended. The Kilkenny Hunt has been long established, and is considered as the most celebrated in Ireland. The savings' bank, established in 1816, under the patronage of the Earl of Ormonde, had, in 1835, deposits to the amount of £23,784, and 801 depositors: in 1842 the number of depositors was 1276.

In the 16th century, Piers, Earl of Ormonde, with a view to benefit the town by the introduction of MANUFACTURES, brought over several artificers from Flanders and the neighbouring provinces, whom he employed in working tapestry, diapers, and carpets; but the manufactnre did not extend beyond the supply of the castle, and was soon discontinued. The manufacture of coarse frieze was extensively carried on here in the reign of Charles II., but was withdrawn to Carrick-on-Suir, and succeeded by the wool-combing and the worsted trade, which, about the middle of the last century, were superseded by the manufacture of blankets, which became the principal trade both of the city and the county. In 1821, from 3000 to 4000 persons were employed in this manufacture; but on the expiration of the protecting duties, the trade became depressed, and at present not more than 600 persons are employed in it, and even these at reduced prices; the blankets made here, however, are still in great repute, and are purchased for the supply of the army. There is also a small manufacture of coarse woollen cloth. But the principal trade is in corn; and in the immediate neighbourhood are several very extensive flour-mills, three large distilleries, four breweries, two tanneries, some extensive yards for curing bacon, some salt-works, and several considerable starch-manufactories. Coarse linens are woven by the country people for domestic wear, and there is a large bleach-green. About half a mile from the city are quarries of the well-known Kilkenny marble, which has a black ground with white veins interspersed with shells and marine exuviæ, and is susceptible of a very high polish. It is mostly worked into mantel-pieces of great beauty, and is cut and polished in a mill moved by water power, erected on the bank of the river, about two miles from the town, in the parish of Blackrath; great quantities of the marble are exported. Limestone is also quarried in various parts of the neighbourhood of the city. In the excise arrangements, Kilkenny gives name to, and is the head of, a district comprising the city of Kilkenny, and the towns of Castlecomer and Callan, in the county of Kilkenny; Tullow, Carlow, and Leighlin-Bridge, in the county of Carlow; and Mountmellick, Ballinakill, &c., in the Queen's county. The amount of duties paid in the district for the year 1835, was £70,665. 16.; and for the year 1843, £24,819. Branches of the Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank, and the National Bank, have been opened. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, and are amply supplied with corn and provisions of every kind. Two great fairs are held on March 28th and Corpus-Christi day; they are great cattle and wool fairs, which regulate the prices of all the others, and are attended by graziers from all parts of Ireland: there are several other fairs, established by recent patents. An area in the lower part of the spacious old building called the Tholse, is appropriated as a market-house.

The charter granted to the burgesses by William Le Mareschal was confirmed, with all its privileges, by Edward III., in the 1st year of his reign; and in the 51st of the same reign, the sovereign, portreeve, and commonalty of Kilkenny were by a roll enjoined not to interfere with the freedom of the market of Irishtown; the inhabitants of which obtained from Edward IV. a confirmation of the grant of their market, and the privilege of choosing a portreeve annually, independently of Kilkenny. Edward VI. confirmed all the ancient privileges of the burgesses of Kilkenny, as enjoyed by them during the reign of Henry VIII., and granted them the dissolved priory of St. John, with all its possessions, at a fee-farm rent of £16. 6. 4. Elizabeth, in 1574, confirmed the several rights of both boroughs, but, to obviate the disputes that arose from there being two corporations in the same town, constituted them, in nearly every respect, one body corporate under the designation of "The Sovereign, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Kilkenny." James I., in 1608, made the towns of Kilkenny and Irishtown, with the parishes of St. Mary, St. John, St. Canice, and St. Patrick, a free borough, and in the following year granted additional privileges; erected the borough into a city, under the designation of the "Mayor and Citizens of the City of Kilkenny;" and constituted the city and its liberties a distinct county, to be called the "County of the City of Kilkenny." Charles I., in 1639, granted to the mayor and citizens the monasteries of the Black and Grey friars, with several rectories and other possessions; and James II. gave the citizens a new charter, which however never came into operation, the city being governed until 1840 by the charter of James I. Under this charter the CORPORATION consisted of a mayor, two sheriffs, 18 aldermen, 36 common-councilmen, and an indefinite number of freemen, assisted by a recorder, treasurer, two coroners, a town-clerk, four serjeants-at-mace, and other officers. The mayor, who was also custos rotulorum, escheator, clerk-of-the-market, and master of the assay, was chosen annually from the aldermen by the aldermen and councilmen, on the next Monday after the 24th of June, and had power to appoint a deputy, during illness or necessary absence, chosen from such of the aldermen as had served the office of mayor. The sheriffs were elected annually from the common-councilmen by the aldermen and councilmen, on the same day as the mayor. The aldermen were chosen for life from the common-councilmen by the mayor and aldermen; and the common-councilmen were chosen from the freemen by the aldermen and councilmen, who also appointed the recorder: the treasurer and town-clerk were appointed by the corporation. There was likewise a corporation of the staple. The freedom of the city was obtained by birth, marriage, servitude, and favour of the corporation. The burgesses of Irishtown still continued to elect their portreeve annually under the direction of the Bishop of Ossory; he was clerk-of-the-market, and presided in his court held weekly for the recovery of debts under 40s., but had no magisterial jurisdiction. At present the city forms one complete municipal borough, divided into two wards, and governed by a mayor, 6 aldermen, and 18 councillors, elected under the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108. A sheriff is appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant, and there are also a treasurer, town-clerk, clerk of the peace, and other officers. The total amount of grand jury presentments, in the year 1844, was £2451. 6. 4., of which £132. 10. 10. were for repairs of roads, bridges, &c.; £580. 10. for prison expenses, including salaries; £539. 9. 1. for the police establishment of the city; £504. 3. 6. for salaries of other officers; £215 for public charities; £202. 8. 5. in repayment of advances from government; and the remainder, £277. 4. 6., miscellaneous charges.

Each of the two old boroughs returned two members to the Irish parliament; Kilkenny for the first time in 1374, and Irishtown at a much earlier period: both continued to do so till the Union, when Irishtown was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded in compensation were paid to the Board of First Fruits, to be applied to the uses of that fund. Since that period the city has sent only one member to the Imperial parliament. The right of election, previously to the year 1832 in the freemen of the city and 40s. freeholders of the ancient county of the city, was, by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, vested in the resident freemen and £10 householders, and in £20 and £10 leaseholders for the respective terms of 14 and 20 years; the old 40s. freeholders retain the privilege only for life. The number of registered voters in 1841 was 580, of whom 46 were £20, one £10, and 55 40s., freeholders; 12 leaseholders; 345 householders; one rent-charger; and 120 freemen. No alteration has taken place in the boundary of the parliamentary borough, which is co-extensive with the ancient county of the city. The mayor, recorder, and all the aldermen who had served the office of mayor, were, under the old regime, justices of the peace, and under their charter held quarterly courts of session, with criminal jurisdiction within the county of the city; also a court of record, called the Tholsel, for the determination of actions to any amount exceeding £20, every Tuesday and Friday. Assizes for the county of the city, and for the county at large, are held here twice in the year; and quarter-sessions for the county of Kilkenny are held in rotation with other towns. The constabulary force stationed in the city comprises one head-constable, four constables, and 25 sub-constables; the expense of whose maintenance, in 1842, was £945. The court-house, called Grace's Old Castle, contains courts both for the city and for the county at large, and is a spacious and handsome modern building, occupying part of the site of the ancient castle of the family of Grace, of whom William Grace, or Le Gras, its first founder, was seneschal of Leinster and governor of Kilkenny. The city gaol is a badly constructed edifice, containing sixteen cells, not adapted to the classification of prisoners. The county gaol is a spacious modern building of stone, a little to the west of the city; it contains 48 cells, five day-rooms, six work-rooms, eight yards, an hospital, and a chapel, with a tread-mill.

Arms of the Bishopric.

The SEE of OSSORY, which, like that of Meath, takes its name from a district, was originally established at Saiger, now Seir-Kieran, in the territory of Ely O'Carrol, about the year 402, by St. Kieran, after his return from Rome, where he had remained 20 years in the study of the Christian faith, and had been consecrated a bishop. He was accompanied on his return by five other bishops, who founded sees in other parts of Ireland; and after presiding over this see for many years he is supposed to have died in Cornwall, as stated by the English martyrologists. Of his successors who were called Episcopi Saigerenses, but very imperfect accounts are preserved. Carthag, his disciple and immediate successor, died about the year 540, from which period till the removal of the see from Saiger to Aghavoe, about the year 1052, there appears to have been, with some few intervals, a regular succession of prelates. (The monastery of Aghavoe was founded by St. Canice; he was the first abbot, and died about the year 600.) After the removal of the see from Saiger, there is little mention of the bishops, in whose succession there is a chasm of 73 years till the time of Donald O'Fogarty, who was consecrated in 1152, and assisted at the synod of Kells held under Cardinal Paparo, as vicar-general and bishop of Ossory. Felix O'Dullany, who succeeded him in 1178, removed the see from Aghavoe to the city of Kilkenny, as a place of greater security, and laid the foundation of the cathedral church of St. Canice, which was continued at a great expense by Hugh Mapelton, and completed by Geoffrey St. Leger, about the year 1270. Bishop St. Leger gave to the vicars-choral his manse and lodgings, formerly the episcopal palace, previously to the erection of the palaces of Aghor and Dorogh; and William Fitz-John, who succeeded in 1302, appropriated the church of Claragh to the abbey of St. John the Evangelist, with a reservation of 20*s.* to the vicars-choral of St. Canice. Richard Ledred, who was consecrated in 1318, beautified the cathedral, and rebuilt and glazed all the windows, of which the great east window contained some exquisite specimens of scripture history in stained glass, for which Rinuncini, the pope's nuncio, in 1645, offered £700; the same prelate built the episcopal palace, near the cathedral. Bishop Hacket, who succeeded in 1460, built the arch of the tower of the cathedral, of hewn stone, and appropriated the parish church of Ballybur to the vicars-choral; Oliver Cantwell, who succeeded in 1488, repaired the episcopal palaces, rebuilt the bridge of Kilkenny (which had been destroyed by a flood), and gave the church of St. Mael to the vicars-choral of St. Canice. Milo Baron, who was consecrated in 1527, repaired the episcopal palace, and gave a silver staff to the cathedral; Nicholas Walsh, his successor, was the first who introduced types of the Irish character, in which he had prayer-books and a catechism printed. Jonas Wheeler, consecrated in 1613, recovered the lands of Tasscoffin, Grangecoolpobble, Freinston, and Sheskin Wood, which Bishop Thonory had alienated; and obtained a grant of the manor of Breghmoe, in King's county, which was confirmed to the see in 1619, by James I. Griffith Williams, who succeeded to the prelacy in 1641, laid out £1400 in repairing the cathedral, and £300 in beautifying the chancel; and gave to the see many of his lands in Caernarvonshire and other parts of Wales. Bishop Parry, in 1672, enriched the see by the recovery of alienated lands. Thomas Otway, who succeeded in 1679, founded the library of the cathedral in the churchyard, and assigned all his books for the use of the clergy of the diocese; he also embellished the cathedral, and gave to it a service of communion plate weighing 363 ounces. The see of Ossory continued to be a separate diocese till 1835, when, on the death of Dr. Elrington, Bishop of Ferns and Leighlin, both those dioceses were, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV., annexed to it, and the temporalities of Ossory became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The diocese, which is one of the sixteen that constitute the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, comprehends the ancient county of the city of Kilkenny, the whole of the barony of Ossory, in Queen's county, the parish of Seir-Kyran, in King's county, and the greater part of the county of Kilkenny. It extends 60 miles in length, and 18 in breadth, and comprises an estimated superficies of 346,000 acres, of which 60,000 are in Queen's county, 4100 in King's county, and 281,000 in the county and county of the city of Kilkenny. The lands belonging to the see of Ossory comprise 21,730 statute acres of profitable land; and the gross annual revenue, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, was returned at £3859. In 1844 the income received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was £3565. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacon, and the seven prebendaries of Blackrath, Aghoure, Mayne, Killamery, Tascoffin, Kilmanagh, and Cloneamery. The vicars-choral, three in number, are a corporate body, endowed with various lands and tithes in the city and county of Kilkenny; the former comprising nearly 269 acres, and, together with the tithes, producing before the passing of the Rent-charge act a rental of £200. 1. 10. The economy fund, prior to that act, amounted to £444. 1., arising from houses and premises in the city, and from tithes in the county. The consistorial court consists of a vicar-general, surrogate, three proctors, and two registrars, who are keepers of the records of the see, which are all modern documents, the earliest being wills dated 1634. The total number of parishes in the diocese of Ossory is 146, comprised in 62 benefices, of which 27 are unions of two or more parishes, and 35 single parishes; of these benefices 11 are in the gift of the Crown, 16 in lay and Corporation patronage, 5 in joint or alternate presentation, and the remainder in the patronage of the Bishop or incumbents. The total number of churches is 52, and there are six other places where divine service is performed; the number of glebe-houses is 36.

The CATHEDRAL church, dedicated to St. Canice, and situated on a gentle eminence at the western extremity of the city, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, in the early English style of architecture, with a low massy central tower supported on clustered columns of black marble, and lofty pointed arches, affording entrances from the nave into the choir and transepts. The exterior walls, with the exception only of the gables, are embattled, and at the west end the pinnacles form two small spires. The whole length of the building is 226 feet, and the breadth along the transepts 123 feet. The interior is lofty, and of chaste design; the nave is separated from the aisles by an elegant range of five clustered columns of black marble on each side, with lofty and gracefully moulded arches, and is lighted by a large west window of elegant design, and a range of five clerestory windows. The aisles are lighted by four windows on each side. The choir, of similar character to the nave, has a beautifully groined ceiling, embellished with delicate tracery and numerous modillions, and with a central group of cherubs, festoons, and foliage of exquisite richness. At the end of the south transept, on the eastern side, is the consistory court, built by Bishop Pococke, and to the north of it is the chapter-house. On the eastern side of the north transept is a door leading through a dark passage into the chapel of St. Mary, where the parochial vicar of St. Canice formerly officiated; and adjacent to it, on the same side, is the present parish church, containing the tomb of Bishop Gafney, who died in 1576. In various parts of the cathedral are ancient monuments, of which the most remarkable is that of Bishop David, near the consistorial court, now much defaced; eight of the bishops of Ossory, and several of the noble proprietors of the castle, are interred here; and in the transept is a stone seat, called the Chair of St. Kieran. Within a short distance from the south transept are the remains of an ancient round tower, 108 feet high, 47 feet in circumference at the base, and crowned with a low battlement. The cemetery is finely planted, and is approached from the town by a flight of marble steps. Near the east end of the cathedral is the Episcopal Palace, a commodious and handsome residence; and on the south-eastern side is the Deanery, a good building. At the north-western end of the churchyard is the Diocesan Library, founded in 1692 by Bishop Otway, who left £5 per annum to the librarian, and £5 for coal; it was enlarged in 1756, by Bishop Maurice, who increased the stipend of the librarian by an annuity of £20, and contributed largely to the collection, which now contains 3000 volumes.

In the Roman Catholic divisions, this diocese, as originally constituted, is a separate bishopric, being one of the three suffragan to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin: it comprises 32 parochial benefices or unions, containing 94 chapels served by 88 clergymen, of whom 32, including the bishop, are parish priests, and 56 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefices of the bishop are the unions of St. Mary and St. John, Kilkenny, in the former of which are the Roman Catholic cathedral and the bishop's residence. The diocese is divided into three districts, called the northern division, or Conference of Ballyragget; the middle division, or Conference of Kilkenny; and the southern division, or Conference of Ballyhale; where chapters of the clergy are held.

The ancient county of the city, or parliamentary borough, comprehends the parishes of St. Mary, St. Patrick, St. John, and St. Canice, and comprises 17,012 statute acres: the present county of the city, or municipal borough, is not nearly so extensive, consisting of only 921 acres. The parish of St. Mary is entirely within the city: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1819, granted a loan of £1200, is an elegant cruciform structure, with a tower and spire, situated in the High-street. The glebe-house, for which the same Board gave £400 and lent £350, is a good residence; and there is a small glebe near the church. The parish of St. Patrick is about one mile and a half in length, and nearly the same in breadth: the living is a rectory and vicarage, united to the rectory of Aghaboe and the rectory and vicarage of Urlingford, together constituting the corps of the deanery of Ossory, in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £375, and of the whole union £882. 3. 4. The parish of St. John comprises 5532 statute acres: fairs, for which patents were recently obtained, are held here on Feb. 15th, May 6th, Sept. 23rd, and Nov. 10th. The living is a vicarage, united by act of council, in the reign of Henry VIII., to the vicarage of Clara, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the corporation of Kilkenny. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £432. 1. 6., of which £279. 15. 4. are payable to the corporation, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the whole union, payable to the incumbent, is £219. 16. The church is part of the ancient monastery of St. John the Evangelist, restored agreeably to the character of the ancient building, which was of elegant design and elaborate execution; it contains the mutilated relics of sepulchral monuments to the Butler, Grace, and Purcel families. There is no glebe-house; the glebe is situated in the parish of Clara, and consists of 15 acres. The parish of St. Canice comprises 6915 statute acres: the living is a rectory and vicarage, united by act of council from time immemorial to the rectories and vicarages of Ballybur and St. Martin, together forming the union of St. Canice, belonging to the vicars-choral, who receive the tithe rent-charge of the two first, amounting to £347. 10.; that of St. Martin is payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish of St. Mary is the head of a union or district, comprising also a small portion of St. John's; the parish of St. Patrick is the head of a union, comprising also the parishes of Castleinch and Outrath, and part of St. Canice; the parish of St. John is the head of a union, comprising also Rathcoole, Kilderry, and Kilmadrum; and the parish of St. Canice is the head of a union, comprising also the parish of St. Maul, and part of Ballybur. There are four chapels in Kilkenny, one in each parish: that of St. Canice is a good modern edifice, in the later English style; the others are all plain buildings. Adjoining St. Mary's, which is the largest, are the residence of the bishop, and a Presentation convent, with a chapel attached to it: there are also a Capuchin friary, and a Dominican abbey, with chapels attached. A handsome Roman Catholic cathedral is in process of erection, built of the native black marble, which, when unpolished, has a beautiful light-grey colour.

The grammar-school, called the COLLEGE of Kilkenny, was originally founded by Piers Butler, Earl of Ormonde, and a new charter was granted to it by the Duke of Ormonde, in 1684; but it fell into disuse during the war of the Revolution, and James II. founded on its site a royal college, which continued only for a short time, when the original establishment was restored. The house, having gone to decay, was rebuilt in 1782, by parliamentary grants amounting to £5064, and is adapted to the accommodation of 80 boarders. Provision is made for the education of scholars on the foundation, to be afterwards admitted into Trinity College, Dublin; and the children of freemen are entitled to instruction at half the usual terms. The school was endowed by the Duke of Ormonde with a house for the master in John-street, having eight acres of land attached to it, and with £140 per annum charged on the Ormonde estate, for the maintenance of a master and ushers, and the repair of the house; the salary of the master of the diocesan school, which has been discontinued, is also paid to the master of this school, who is appointed by the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, and is to teach the classics, poetry, and oratory. The Bishop of Ossory, Leighlin, and Ferns, and the Provost of Trinity College, are visiters. Among many eminent men who have been educated in this establishment, were Stanihurst, the historian; Swift; Congreve; Farquhar; Harris, the continuator of Ware; Provost Baldwin; and Dr. Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne. At Birchfield, near the city, is a Roman Catholic seminary for the education of students intended for the priesthood. Bishop Pococke bequeathed the whole of his property to the Incorporated Society of Dublin for promoting English Protestant schools, for the foundation of a school for Roman Catholic children from 12 to 16 years of age, to be instructed in the principles of the Protestant religion, and bred to the linen-weaving trade, for which purpose he appropriated his manufacturing house at Lintown, which is amply endowed. There are, at present, about 24 boys in the school, and as many looms in the factory; and the curate of the parish, with a salary of £10, is catechist to the school, which now occupies the building of the old charter-school. A parochial school for the city at large is supported by a bequest of £100 per annum from the late Mr. Evans, an annual donation from the bishop and dean, and by subscription; there are also an infants' school, and others. The ladies of the Presentation convent gratuitously instruct more than 300 female children. The city likewise contains an orphan-house for girls, under the patronage of the ladies of the convent; for the establishment of which a large sum was given by Mr. Murphy, of this city.

Adjoining the library in St. Canice's churchyard is an almshouse for eight poor women, founded by Bishop Williams, who endowed it with lands at Fermoy, which were sold by his executors; the inmates now receive only small annuities from different estates of the Waring family. In the coal-market was an hospital, founded by Thomas, Earl of Ormonde, who died in 1614; he endowed it with the impropriate tithes of Drominberran and Bewley, to which were added those of Inch and Drumboth by the great Duke of Ormonde, who obtained from Charles II. a charter incorporating the master, brethren, and sisters. The house having gone to decay, a smaller one was built in High-street by the present family, consisting of two stories, with four rooms on each floor, inhabited by eight poor widows, who receive small payments; it is called the Ormonde poor-house. In Rose-Inn-street is an hospital founded in 1581, by Sir R. Shee, Knt., who endowed it with the tithes of Butler's-woods and Kilmocahill, in the counties of Kilkenny and Carlow, for the support of twelve poor men and women; but the tithes have long been detained in lay hands. General St. Ruth, also, bequeathed some property, vested in the French funds; but the inmates, who are now all females, receive only small gratuities, from the family of Shee, by whom they are nominated, and alms collected at the chapel of St. Mary. In a pleasant situation is a range of almshouses, called St. James' Asylum, founded and endowed, in 1803, by James Switzer, Esq., for twenty poor widows, twelve Protestant and eight Roman Catholic, each of whom, in addition to residence, receives £20 per annum; in the area in front of the building is a statue of the founder, who was a native of the city.

The widow of Edw. Cramer bequeathed £7. 10. per annum (turnpike debentures) for supplying the poor of St. Mary's parish with bread, to be distributed at the church by the curate, who also has the distribution of another bequest to the poor of that parish by Mr. Nicholai. Mr. Lewis Chapelier, of John-street, bequeathed, in trust, the interest of £500 to be given every second year, in a sum of £50 late currency, as a marriage portion to the daughter of a reputable tradesman, who should marry a tradesman of the town, both being Protestants. Sir William Fownes bequeathed the rents of two tenements in Patrick-street to charitable purposes; £8 are accordingly given yearly to the county infirmary, and the rest in charitable pensions. A large house and garden in Patrick-street were bequeathed by Gen. St. Ruth, in trust, to pay £12 per annum to the poor; and a bequest for the same purpose by Mr. John Cramer was made about the same time; but neither gift has been carried into effect. The late Rev. William Lanigan, P. P. of St. Patrick's, bequeathed £1600, three per cent. consols, for the support of six widows, who receive the dividends; a house was lately built for their reception. The Charitable Society, formed in 1740, affords relief to sick tradesmen or their widows; the Benevolent Society was established in 1785, for the relief of bedridden poor. A charitable loan fund was instituted by act of parliament in 1792, for lending small sums to tradesmen, free of interest; and the Ormonde fund, for the same purpose, was established by the Ormonde family in 1834. The County Infirmary was opened in 1767: it contains two male and two female wards, in each of which are 10 beds; external patients receive advice and medicine two days in every week; the average annual income is about £660, and the number of in-patients about 500, and of out-patients about 1059. The Fever Hospital was built at an expense of £1100, a loan from government, subsequently repaid by grand jury assessments. The Dispensary, founded in 1819, is supported by presentments and subscription, and a bequest of £100 per annum by the late Mr. Evans, which, in common with other charitable bequests by that gentleman, has been for some time suspended, from the non-payment of interest on certain debts chargeable on estates, for the sale of which proceedings have been for some years pending in the court of chancery. Patients unable to attend are visited at their own houses. The Union Workhouse, opened on the 21st April, 1842, contains accommodation for 1300 paupers; the union comprises an area of 275,825 statute acres, and its population amounts to about 114,735.

The CASTLE, originally built by Strongbow, and rebuilt by William Le Mareschal and others, occupies a commanding situation on an eminence overlooking the river Nore. It was formerly inclosed with a wall 40 feet high, and defended by bastions, curtains, and towers of great strength, with a keep on the summit; and contained in addition to accommodation for a large garrison, a splendid suite of apartments, the baronial residence of the earls of Ormonde. The edifice was for the greater part rebuilt by the second duke of Ormonde, but not completed, and occupies at present two sides of a quadrangle, containing three of the round towers of the ancient castle: several of the rooms are hung with tapestry from the manufacture introduced by the Ormonde family, and there is a fine collection of paintings, among which are numerous portraits of the time of Charles II. The castle is now being partly rebuilt on a splendid scale by the present marquess, after a design by Mr. Robertson, of Kilkenny, and when completed will occupy three sides of a quadrangle, preserving the ancient towers, with the character of which the additional buildings will carefully harmonise. It commands extensive and interesting views, and will be one of the most magnificent baronial residences in the country. The other principal seats in the immediate vicinity of the city are, Kilcreen, once the seat of Sir W. de Montmorency, Bart.; Castle Blunden (formerly Clonmoran), the residence of Sir J. Blunden, Bart.; Bonnetstown; Rose Hill; Orchardton, of the Dowager Countess of Carrick; and Danville.

The priory, or hospital, of St. John the Evangelist, founded by William Le Mareschal in 1220, notwithstanding its long alienation from ecclesiastical uses, was, in 1641, taken possession of by a fraternity of Jesuits, who commenced its restoration; a great part of it was afterwards demolished, and the east window of its church, enriched with delicate tracery, and part of the south side of the choir, formed a picturesque ruin till the year 1817, when it was restored, and became the parish church of St. John. The Annals of this house, called the Codex Kilkenniensis, were in high reputation, and formed part of the Chandos collection. The Dominican abbey, founded in Irishtown by William Le Mareschal the younger, in 1225, was dedicated to the Holy Trinity; and chapters of the order were held in it in 1281, 1302, 1306, and 1316: part of it was, subsequently to the Reformation, made a shire-house, and in 1640 the whole was repaired. The remains of the abbey church are extensive and interesting: it was cruciform, with a central tower, which is still in good preservation, crowned with a graduated battlement having angular turrets; the windows and arches are of elegant design, and the nave and south transept are beautiful specimens of rich detail in the decorated English style: part has been restored for a Roman Catholic chapel. Among the eminent persons interred in this church were the founder and his brother. The Franciscan abbey was founded previously to the year 1230, and a provincial chapter was held in it in 1267; it extended from the city walls to the river, and of its extensive remains, part has been converted into a brewery. The body of the church is nearly entire, though without a roof, and is now used as a tennis-court; at the west end are the relics of a lofty window of seven lights, and from the centre of the building rises a tower of light and elegant proportions, resting on finely groined arches, and apparently of the date of the 14th century. Within the precincts is a well of pure water, formerly held in great veneration, and still in high repute. John Clyn, an annalist of some celebrity, was a friar of this house. All these three houses after the Reformation were granted to the corporation. Part of a building in the coal-market, now divided into five or six tenements, is said to have been the chamber in which the parliaments held at Kilkenny assembled: it consisted of a hall, 49 feet long and 47 feet wide, under which was a dungeon, 20 feet square; the windows are arched, narrow, and lofty, and are defended with iron bars. Among the eminent natives of this city were several bishops of various sees, of whom William Daniel, D.D., a man of great learning, translated the Book of Common Prayer from the English, and the New Testament from the Greek, into the Irish language, and was made archbishop of Tuam in 1609. John Banim, author of the O'Hara Tales, was also a native of this place. Kilkenny gave the title of Earl to the family of Butler; the last earl died in 1846.

KILKENNY-WEST, a parish, in the union of Athlone, barony of Kilkenny-West, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 5½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Athlone, on the road from that place to Ballymahon; containing 3489 inhabitants. An abbey anciently existed here, one of the abbots of which, St. Scannail, died in 773: it was, with its possessions, granted in 1569 to Robert Dillon, in capite, at the annual rent of £22. 0. 10. A priory, or hospital, of Crouched friars was erected at the beginning of the 13th century, by Friar Thomas, grandson of Sir Thomas Dillon, and some of its ruins still exist. In 1335, the grand priory of Kilmainham had an exempt hospital here; and there was a holy well, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. At Bethlem, near Lough Ree, was formerly a nunnery, which was plundered and burnt in 1642, by some English soldiers, who were attacked the same night by the peasantry and 60 of them killed. Sir James Dillon encamped in the parish in that year, to blockade Athlone. The parish is bounded on the west for a considerable distance by Lough Ree, which contains several islets, the largest of them being Friars' Island. It comprises 10,048 statute acres, two-thirds arable and one-third pasture; there are about 640 acres of bog. Agriculture is improving, and here are good limestone-quarries. A considerable part is occupied by the fine demesne of Waterstown, which includes a beautiful lake and the ruins of an ancient castle: the other seats are Rossiana, East Hill, Annagh, Oatlands, Auburn, and Littleton. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Drogheda and R. Butler Bryan, Esq.; the tithe rent-charge is £207. 13. 8. The church has been rebuilt by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £481. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1813; the glebe comprises 15 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Noughoval, and has a spacious chapel. Here are the remains of an old castle, formerly belonging to Lord Dillon, and which was destroyed by Cromwell. The father of Oliver Goldsmith was appointed to this rectory in 1730, and resided at Lissoy, where the poet was first sent to school: his brother, to whom he dedicated the poem of The Traveller, was curate here, and his sister and brother-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Hodson, resided at Lissoy. Kilkenny-West gives the inferior title of Baron to the Earl of Roscommon.—See AUBURN.

KILKERIL, or KILKEEL, a parish, in the barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Kilkenny to Waterford; containing about 150 inhabitants, and 589 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Knocktopher: the tithe rent-charge is £19. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballyhale.

KILKERRANMORE, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, partly in the West division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, but chiefly in the barony of IBANE, and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Clonakilty, and on the road from Cork to Skibbereen; containing 2996 inhabitants. It comprises 6127 statute acres, about four-fifths of which are under tillage; the remainder is rough pasture, with a small quantity of bog. The land is generally fertile, having a substratum of clay-slate: inferior slate and good manganese are found here, and it is supposed that copper exists. There are several excellent farm-houses. The living is a vicarage in the diocese of Ross, united with that of Castleventry; the rectory is partly appropriate to the economy estate of the cathedral of Ross, and partly impropriate in Messrs. Foot and Roberts. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £439, of which £45. 19. 10. are payable to the economy estate, £196. 10. 1. to the impropriators, and an equal sum to the vicar; the entire tithes of the vicarial benefice amount to £294. The church, which is a large edifice with a square tower, was built in 1824, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house, but the vicar has six acres of glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Rosscarbery, partly in Kilmeen, and partly in Rathbarry. Some ruins of the old church exist, in a burial-ground.

KILKERRIN, a parish, in the barony of TYAQUIN, union of CASTLEREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Ballinamore, on the road from that place to Dunmore; containing 5466 inhabitants. The parish comprises 20,247 statute acres; it has some good limestone-quarries, and an abundance of bog. The seats are New Forest, Cappa, Fidane House, Fidane Lodge, and Wellfort. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, episcopally united from time immemorial to the vicarages of Boyannagh and Clonbern, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the vicarage is £243. 15., and of the whole union £502. 10. The church has been rebuilt at a cost of £605, of which £555 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1817, gave £400 and lent £370. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Clonbern, and containing three chapels, two at Kilkerrin and one at Clonbern. The parochial school is supported by a donation of £40 per annum from the rector, who has also given a house and two acres of land.

KILKEVAN, or LITTLE LIMERICK, a parish, partly in the barony of BALLAGHKEEN, but chiefly in that of GOREY, union of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Gorey, on the road from that place to Arklow; containing 2873 inhabitants. This parish comprises 9529 statute acres of fertile land, chiefly under tillage, and has no waste or bog: there are quarries of good building-stone on Tara Hill, the north side of which extends into Kilkevan. Ballynastragh, the seat of the ancient family of Esmonde, and now the property of Sir T. Esmonde, Bart., is a handsome modernised mansion, with a light Grecian portico; the grounds are tastefully laid out, and embellished with a sheet of water and rich woods. William Quinn, Esq., has also a finely wooded demesne here, on which he intends erecting a mansion. Fairs are held at Little Limerick on April 5th, Whit-Monday, Aug. 21st, and Nov. 12th. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Gorey and corps of the deanery of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge is £276. 18. 6., and there is a glebe of 24*a.* 1*r.* 15*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilkevan forms part of the district of Gorey, and has a chapel at Killanearin, near Little Limerick, with a residence for the priest: contiguous to the chapel is a neat building, consisting of a centre and two wings, and containing schoolrooms for both sexes, with apartments for the master and mistress. There are some remains of the castle of Little Limerick, which belonged to the Esmonde family; and of the old church.

KILKILLOGE, a village, in the parish of AHAMPLISH, union of SLIGO, barony of CARBURY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing 188 inhabitants.

KILKILVERY, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Headford to Tuam; containing, with part of the post-town of Headford, 1470 inhabitants. It comprises 2735½ statute acres. The seats are Ross Lodge and Lysdonagh. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, episcopally united to the rectories and vicarages of Killeny, Killursa, Kilcoona, Killower, Donaghpatrick, and Cargan or Carrigin, together forming the union of Headford, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £83. 3. 6., and of the whole union £820. 15. The church has been rebuilt by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at a cost of £983. The glebe-house is a neat residence, built in 1818, at a cost exceeding £2000, partly defrayed by a loan of £1500 and a gift of £100 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of the district of Headford, comprising also the parishes of Killeny and Killursa, and containing a chapel here and another in Killeny.—See HEADFORD.

KILKINNIKIN, a village, in the parish of KILNAMANAGH, union of BANTRY, barony of BEAR or BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 169 inhabitants.

KILKISHEN, a village, in the parish of CLONLEA, barony of TULLA, union of LIMERICK, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (N.) from Six-mile-bridge, on the road from that place to Tulla; containing 559 inhabitants. It consists of one street of 88 houses, and has a constabulary police station: fairs are held on March 19th, Aug. 31st, and Dec. 22nd. The church, the glebe-house, and the Roman Catholic chapel of the parish, are here. Adjoining the village is Kilkishen, the seat of the Studderts, in whose demesne are the remains of Kilkishen Castle, consisting of a lofty square tower of great strength: the demesne is one of the finest in the county; the land is of superior quality, with a vast quantity of wood and water, the latter now divided into several lakes, with plantations between.—See CLONLEA.

KILKNEEDAN.—See KILCREDANE.

KILKYRAN, a parish, in the barony of GOWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Kilkenny; containing 175 inhabitants. It comprises 1105⅝ statute acres; and is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Rathcoole, with which the tithe rent-charge is returned: the living is in the gift of the Dean and Chapter, to whom the rectory is appropriate. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilkyran is part of the district of Muckalee.

KILL, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. E.) from Dublin, on the road to Bray; containing 1912 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2702 statute acres; much of the land is in pasture, and the system of agriculture is improving. The mountain and sea views are very fine, and there are numerous seats, among which are Newtown Park House, Belville, Killiney Castle, Carriglea, Stoneville, Somerton, Newpark, and Kill Abbey. This last seat was the country residence of the deans, or, as some state, the priors, of Christ Church, Dublin; it is part of the estate of Kill of the Grange of Clonkeen, and has been held by lease for above 130 years by the Espinasse family. The parish is in the diocese of Dublin, and is a curacy, forming part of the union of Monkstown; the rectory is part of the corps of the deanery of Christ Church, and the tithe rent-charge is £128. 16. 6., of which two-thirds are payable to the dean and one-third to the curate, who also receives £31. 12. as the tithe of Kill of the Grange of Clonkeen. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kill forms part of the district of Kingstown and Cabinteely. There is a charity school near Cornel's Court; and C. Doyne, Esq., has erected and supports an infants' school near his seat. The village of Killiney is in this parish, and is delightfully situated. Near it, on the summit of one of the Killiney hills, is an obelisk, commanding extremely beautiful views; it was erected by John Malpas, Esq., in 1742, principally to employ the neighbouring poor in a season of distress. Not far from Kill Abbey are the ruins of the old church, in many places covered with ivy; in the cemetery are the remains of an ancient cross, and there are remains of another at the entrance of the road leading to the church. In the demesne of Carriglea is a rath.

KILL, a parish, in the union of NAAS, partly in the barony of SOUTH NAAS, but chiefly in that of SOUTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Naas, on the road from that place to Dublin; containing 1261 inhabitants, of whom 408 are in the village. A commandery for Knights Hospitallers was founded at Kilhill in the 13th century, by Maurice Fitzgerald, and chapters of the order were held here in 1326, 1332, 1333, and 1334; it existed till the Reformation, when it was granted to John Allen. The parish comprises 4850½ statute acres; the soil is of good quality, and principally under tillage. The village of Kill consists of 73 houses. Bishopscourt is the handsome residence of the Hon. F. Ponsonby, and here is also the seat of Mrs. Hendrick, in the demesne of which are the picturesque ruins of the old church at Kerdiffstown. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, episcopally united to the rectory of Lyons, and held with the impropriate parish of Whitechurch; the rectory is partly impropriate in the Earl of Mayo and partly appropriate to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £522. 10., of which £228. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £351. 7. 6. The church is a very neat structure, with a square tower and lofty spire, built in 1822 by aid of a loan of £2000 from the late Board of First Fruits, and recently repaired by a grant of £144 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; it has an organ, which was given by the Earl of Mayo. The glebe-house was built in 1829, at a cost exceeding £1100, by the then incumbent: the glebe here consists of eight acres, and there are also seven acres in Whitechurch. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the union or district of Newbridge, and partly the head of a union comprising the remainder of Kill and the entire parishes of Lyons, Bodenstown, and Furnace, and containing a chapel at Ardclough, in Lyons, and one at Kill, which is a remarkably neat building with a tower and spire, completed in 1826. In the village is a school under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity; the school-house, an ornamental building, is kept in repair by the Earl of Mayo. There are also national schools. Here is a large moat; and about a mile eastward is Heartwell, formerly a castellated mansion surrounded by a fosse. Numerous skeletons have been found in turning up the ground. Near Heartwell is a rivulet, on the bank of which are extensive depositions of calcareous tufa, which are hardened by exposure to the air, and, although very porous, are sometimes used in building. Extensive ramifications of stalactite are also found.

KILLACONNIGAN.—See KILLOGHCONNOGHAN.

KILLADERRY, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of LOWER PHILIPSTOWN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Dublin to Tullamore; containing, with the post-town of Philipstown, 2647 inhabitants. This parish comprises 5554½ statute acres; it is intersected by the Grand Canal, and contains a considerable quantity of bog. Killaderry is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, united to the rectory of Ballykeane, and in the patronage of the Gifford family, who are impropriators of the rectory of the parish; the tithe rent-charge is £135, of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriators, and one-third to the vicar. The church is a substantial brick edifice, built in 1835 by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £900. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Philipstown, comprising the parishes of Killaderry, Ballycommon, and Kilclonfert, and containing two chapels, one at Philipstown and the other at Kill. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At Philipstown is a school under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, by whom the school-house was erected, at an expense of £250, on ground given by the Countess Fitzwilliam; it is under the patronage of Lord Ponsonby. Some remains of an old castle yet exist.—See PHILIPSTOWN.

KILLADIERNAN.—See KILLODIERNAN.

KILLADOON, a parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of NORTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Celbridge, on the road from that place to Clane; containing 288 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the south and east by the river Liffey, and comprises 1765½ statute acres, including the mansion and park of Killadoon, the handsome seat of the Earl of Leitrim. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Kildrought; the tithe rent-charge is £75. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killadoon forms part of the district of Celbridge.

KILLADOON, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7½ miles (N. N. W.) from Boyle, and on Lough Arrow; containing 1612 inhabitants. The family of Mac Donogh, lords of Corran and Tirerril, founded a convent here, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, for nuns of the order of St. Dominick, in 1427; there are still some ruins, on the northern shore of Lough Arrow. The parish comprises 3879¾ statute acres, consisting principally of wet spongy land; there is a large quantity of bog, and limestone is quarried. Killadoon is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Kilmactraney; the rectory is impropriate in Colonel Perceval, and the tithe rent-charge is £29, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Geeragh, or Kilmactraney.

KILLADREENY, or KILLADREENAN, an ancient chapelry, forming part of the parish of NEWCASTLE, union of RATHDRUM, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (S. by E.) from Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford: the population is returned with the parish. It contains 547 statute acres, under an improving system of agriculture: the seats are Mount John and Killadreenan. The chapelry is in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, and is annexed to the rectory of Newcastle: the ruins of the ancient chapel stand in the centre of a burial-ground, which is inclosed and is still used as a place of interment for the Byrnes, Tooles, and other ancient Roman Catholic families. In the Roman Catholic divisions the chapelry forms part of the district of Kilquade.

KILLAG, a parish, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 11 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wexford; containing 356 inhabitants. This parish, which occupies a peninsular situation on the shores of the lough formed by the burrow of Ballyteigue, comprises 1953 statute acres, almost wholly under tillage; the system of agriculture is improving, and sea-weed collected in the lough is used for manure. The small island of Inch, situated in the lough, belongs to this parish. Here is Richfield, the seat of Sir F. H. Loftus, Bart., and one of the original English settlements: it was long the property of the Devereux family, and appears to have been a place of some strength; the moat still remains tolerably perfect, and in the vicinity was a town called by the settlers Villa Magor, now corrupted into Ballymagor, the name of the entire townland. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Mulrankin; the tithe rent-charge is £94. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killag is part of the district of Rathaegan. The ruins of the old church are yet to be seen, but there exist no vestiges of the ancient town.

KILLAGAN, a parish, partly in the barony of UPPER DUNLUCE, but chiefly in that of KILCONWAY, union of BALLYMONEY, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (S. E.) from Ballymoney, on the road to Belfast, and also on that from Ballymena to Ballycastle; containing 1404 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3838 statute acres, of which 1406 are in the barony of Upper Dunluce, and 2432 in that of Kilconway: it is in a good state of cultivation, considerable improvement having been made in the system of agriculture. A large expanse of water, called Mount-Hamilton Lough, is about to be drained, and the land brought into profitable cultivation. In the village of Clogh-Mills are some flax and corn mills, and the weaving of linen is carried on by many of the inhabitants of the parish in their own houses. Killagan is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Connor in the cathedral of St. Saviour; the tithe rent-charge is £86. 5. About 50 children are taught in a public school. On a gentle eminence, near the centre of the parish, are some remains of Mount Hamilton Castle, in front of which is the lake before mentioned. There is also a large circular earthwork, called Mount Hamilton Fort, in which Pictish coins, military weapons, arrow-heads of flint, and other relics of antiquity, have been discovered; and in a bog was found, in 1831, a firkin of butter in a fossilised state.

KILLAGH, KILLAUGH, or KILLEAGH, also called MOYMENE, a parish, in the union of OLDCASTLE, barony of DEMIFORE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (W.) from Oldcastle; containing 2231 inhabitants. It is situated on Lough Shillin, and comprises 8094¾ statute acres, chiefly land of light quality, and including about 160 acres of bog and 50 of plantations. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £152. 6. The church is a neat edifice, built by aid of a gift of £500 in 1800 from the late Board of First Fruits, which in 1814 gave £450, and lent £50, for the erection of the glebe-house; the glebe comprises 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Kilbride, and containing a chapel at Moat, in this parish, and one at Dalysbridge, in Kilbride.

KILLAGH, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of DELVIN, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2¾ miles (S.) from Castletown-Delvin, on the road from that place to Mullingar; containing 304 inhabitants. It comprises 2010½ statute acres, and is principally in tillage; there is plenty of limestone. Killagh is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Kilcumney; the tithe rent-charge is £30, and there is a glebe of 18 acres, valued at £20 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castletown-Delvin. Here are the ruins of a church.

KILLAGHIN, or KILLAHEN, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 5½ miles (N.) from Tralee, and on the road from Abbeydorney to Cashen-ferry; containing 1876 inhabitants. It comprises 4545 statute acres, of which about one-fourth consists of mountain and bog, and the remainder of arable land of variable quality. The principal residence is Fort William, belonging to the representatives of the late W. Collis, Esq. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilflyn or Ballinacourty; the tithe rent-charge is £94. 10., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killaghin forms part of the district of Abbeydorney. The ruins of the old church still remain; and about a mile to the west are those of Ballymaquin Castle.

KILLAGHTEE, a parish, in the barony of Bannagh, union and county of Donegal, and province of Ulster, 3 miles (E.) from Killybegs, and on the north-west coast; containing, with the village of Dunkanely, 5805 inhabitants. It comprises, with a detached portion, 13,368 statute acres, about half of which is mountain land: there is a great quantity of bog; also much coarse limestone and freestone, used for building. Within the parish is St. John's Point, on which is a lighthouse, in lat. 54° 33′ 15″ and lon. 8° 26′, with a bright fixed light, 104 feet above the level of the sea at high water, and visible fourteen nautical miles. Inver bay commences at this point, and extends eastward to Devrin Point, while westward is Mac Swine's bay: many of the inhabitants are employed in fishing, and on the 12th of Feb., 1814, twenty fishing-boats and forty-three men were lost in a squall. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £195. The church is a neat building, erected in 1827, at a cost of £1000, being a loan from the late Board of First Fruits. There is a neat glebe-house, with a glebe of 472 acres, which contains a strong sulphureous spa. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killybegs; a large chapel was lately built; and there is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists at Dunkanely. One of several public schools is aided by donations from Robertson's fund.—See Dunkanely.

KILLAGHTON, or Killalaghton, a parish, partly in the barony of Clonmacnoon, but chiefly in that of Kilconnell, union of Ballinasloe, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 5½ miles (S. W.) from Ballinasloe, near the road from that place to Loughrea; containing 2757 inhabitants. This parish comprises 11,779¼ statute acres, about one-third of which is arable. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Aughrim: the rectory is partly appropriate to the see and partly to the vicarage, and the tithe rent-charge is £138. 15., of which £26. 5. are now payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kilrickill, and has a chapel.

KILLAGHY, a parish, in the barony of Cranagh, union and county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 3 miles (S. W.) from Freshford; containing 353 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1584½ statute acres: it is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, entirely impropriate in J. Butler Stopford, Esq.; and the tithe rent-charge is £78. 15. An abbey is supposed to have been founded here in 548; and near the old church are some remains of the house or castle of Killaghy, belonging to a branch of the Grace family.

KILLAGHY, King's county.—See Killaughey.

KILLAHA, a parish, in the union of Killarney, barony of Magunihy, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Killarney, on the road from that place to Macroom; containing 2660 inhabitants. It comprises 35,260 statute acres, and is situated on the river Flesk; a wild glen here, called Glenflesk, is richly wooded, with large rocks projecting from its sides, and is much visited by lovers of romantic scenery. Filadowne, the most picturesque part of the glen, is said to have been the retreat of a celebrated outlaw named Owen, and a table rock which is situated midway on the declivity, and inaccessible without a ladder, is still called Labig Owen, or "Owen's Bed." The retired lake called Lough Guttane or Kittane, nearly six miles in circumference, lies in a hollow formed by the rocky and precipitous sides of the mountains of Mangerton and Crohane, between which also extends the rugged glen of Kippoch; the lake discharges its superfluous waters by a small river which runs into the Flesk, and affords great attraction to anglers by the excellence and abundance of its trout. Slate-quarries are worked at Filadowne and Annamore. There is a constabulary police station. The chief seats are Killaha, Brewsterfield, and Corriglass. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; the rectory is impropriate, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilgarvan: the tithe rent-charge is £165, of which £67. 10. are payable to the Earl of Donoughmore, £7. 10. to H. A. Herbert, Esq., and £90 to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killaha forms part of the union or district of Glenflesk, which also includes that part of Aghadoe eastward from Killarney, and has a chapel at Rusheen and another at Barraduff. Near the upper entrance to the glen, standing conspicuously on an eminence, are the ruins of Killaha Castle, formerly the residence of the O'Donoghues of the Glens; and at a short distance are the ivy-clad remains of the old church.

KILLAHINNY.—See Killeheny.

KILLAHURLER, or Kilmain, a parish, in the union of Rathdrum, barony of Arklow, county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, 4¼ miles (W.) from Arklow; containing 705 inhabitants. It comprises 3735¾ statute acres; and within its limits is the greater part of the district from which gold was obtained at the end of the last century, and which is described in the article on Arklow. The parish is a curacy, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Arklow; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery of Christ Church, Dublin, and the tithe rent-charge is £62. 6., of which £41. 10. 8. are payable to the dean, and £20. 15. 4. to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions also Killahurler forms part of the union or district of Arklow. Here is an old burial-ground.

KILLAHY, a parish, in the union of Waterford, barony of Knocktopher, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (S.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Waterford to Kilkenny; containing 792 inhabitants, and comprising 2803½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Kilbeacon, or Rosinan; the rectory is impropriate in the family of Fitzpatrick, and the tithe rent-charge is £128. 5., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Mullinavat.

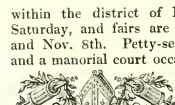
KILLAHY, near Freshford.—See Killaghy.

KILLALA, a sea-port, market, and post town, a parish, and the seat of a diocese, in the union of Ballina, barony of Tyrawley, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 22 miles (N.) from Castlebar, and 131½ (N. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Ballina to Ballycastle; containing 3253 inhabitants, of whom 1446 are in the town. During the disturbances of 1798, General Humbert, with two frigates of 44 and one of 38 guns, having on board 70 officers and 1030 men, sailed from Rochelle on the 4th of August, to make a descent on the county of Donegal; but being frustrated in that attempt by contrary winds, landed his forces in Kilcummin bay on the 22nd of the same month. The garrison, at that time consisting of only 50 men, fled, after a vain attempt to oppose the entrance of the French vanguard, and several of them were taken prisoners. The French forces were joined by many of the peasantry, and after they had taken Ballina greater numbers flocked to their standard, to receive the arms and uniforms which had been sent from France for their equipment.

The town is situated on the bay of the same name, and on the west bank of the river Moy; it contains 287 houses, of which those in the principal street are well built. The manufacture of coarse linen is carried on to a small extent, but the principal trade is the exportation of grain, of which the annual average from 1810 to 1820 was 5000 tons, chiefly oats and barley; the value of the imports, consisting of planks, iron, tar, slates, flax-seed, herrings, and sugar, was about £5000. The trade was on the increase from 1820 till 1825; but, from the improvements of the port of Ballina, what formerly came into this port for the supply of that town is conveyed thither direct by the river Moy; and from 1830 to 1835 the average exports from Killala did not exceed 3500 tons, nor the value of the imports £4000 per annum. A considerable fishery is carried on, in which more than 300 persons are occasionally engaged, and for which this is a very good station; large quantities of sea-manure, also, are landed: the pier is very old, but has been recently repaired. The entrance to the bay is between Kilcummin Head and Kennisharrock Point. On the western side of the bay, off the point of Ross, are the Carrigphadric rocks, between which and the main land is a shoal dry at low water; and on the eastern side, about two miles from Kennisharrock Point, is a creek called Pullogheeny, where small vessels load kelp and other commodities during the summer. The harbour affords good and safe anchorage for vessels drawing eight or nine feet of water, and vessels drawing 12 feet may get to the anchorage about high water. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town; and it is the head of a coast-guard district, comprising the stations of Dunkeehan, Port Terlin, Belderig, Ballycastle, Lacken, Kilcummin, and Ross. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Foxford. The market is on Saturday, and fairs are held on May 6th, Aug. 17th, and Nov. 8th. Petty-sessions are held every Friday, and a manorial court occasionally.



Arms of the late Bishopric.

The See of Killala appears to have been founded between the years 434 and 441, by St. Patrick; who, during that period, was propagating the faith of Christianity in the province of Connaught, and built a church at this place, called Kill-Aladh, over which he placed one of his disciples, St. Muredach, as bishop. Of Muredach's successors, who by early writers are called bishops of Tiramalgaid (from the surrounding territory, now the barony of Tyrawley), and also bishops of O-Fiacra-Mui (from a district of that name extending along the river Moy), very little is recorded till after the arrival of the English in Ireland; among the few names that occur within that period is that of Kellach, the son of Doghan, or, according to some writers, of Owen Beol, King of Connaught. At the instance of Donat O'Beoda, who was bishop in 1198, Pope Innocent III. confirmed all the ancient possessions of the see; and in 1255 a bishop of Killala, whose name is not given, accompanied the archbishop of Tuam into England, to petition the king for the redress of certain grievances to which the clergy were then exposed. Robert of Waterford, who succeeded in 1350, was fined 100 marks for neglecting to attend a parliament assembled at Castledermot, in 1377, to which he had been summoned. Owen O'Connor, Dean of Achonry, was advanced to the see by Queen Elizabeth in 1591, and was allowed to hold his deanery with the bishopric; his successor, Miler Magragh, was permitted to hold also the see of Achonry in commendam. Archibald Hamilton, who succeeded in 1623, obtained from James I. a commendatory grant of the see of Achonry; and his successor, Archibald Adair, was, in 1630, consecrated bishop of Killala and Achonry, which two sees appear from that time to have been united. Thomas Otway, who succeeded to the united sees in 1670, rebuilt the cathedral from the foundation. The sees continued to be held together till the death of the last bishop, Dr. James Verschoyle, in 1833, when, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV., they became annexed to the see of Tuam.

The diocese of Killala is one of the sixteen that constitute the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and comprehends part of the county of Sligo, and a very considerable portion of that of Mayo; it is 45 miles in length, and 21 in breadth, comprising an estimated superficies of 314,300 acres, of which 43,100 are in Sligo, and 271,200 in Mayo. The lands belonging to the see comprise 33,668½ statute acres, of which 10,176½ are profitable land; and the gross annual revenue, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £2600. 11.: this income, together with the revenue of the see of Achonry, since the death of the last bishop, is, by the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act, vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In 1844 the commissioners received £5641 as the revenue of Killala and Achonry. The chapter of Killala consists of a dean, precentor, archdeacon, and the five prebendaries of Killanly, Errew, Ardagh, Lackan, and Rosserkbeg: there are neither minor canons nor vicars-choral belonging to the cathedral, nor is there any economy fund. The number of parishes in the diocese is 27, comprised in 13 benefices, of which seven are unions of two or more parishes, and six single parishes; with the exception of the deanery, which is in the gift of the Crown, all are in the patronage of the Bishop. The number of churches is 13, and there are two other places where divine service is performed; the number of glebe-houses is 11. The cathedral, which is also the parish church, is an ancient structure with a spire; it was repaired in 1817, the late Board of First Fruits granting a loan of £1061. 10. 9.; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £600 for its further repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions this diocese is a separate bishopric, and one of the six suffragan to Tuam; it comprises 23 parochial benefices or unions, containing 30 chapels, which are served by 33 clergymen, 23 of whom are parish priests and 10 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of the bishop is Killala; the cathedral is at Ardnaree, near Ballina, and contiguous to it is the bishop's residence.

The PARISH includes the island of Bartra, or Bartrach, and is generally in a good state of cultivation; the soil is very fertile, and the lands are divided in nearly equal portions between pasture and tillage, except the waste land and a large tract of bog. The total area is 5634 statute acres. The surrounding country is rather bleak, especially towards the north, but the scenery is enlivened by several gentlemen's seats, the principal of which are the Castle, formerly the episcopal palace; the Lodge; Ross; Castlerea; Farm Hill; and Summer Hill. The living is a rectory and vicarage, constituting the corps of the deanery of Killala, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £116. The lands belonging to the deanery adjoin the town, and comprise 108 acres; and the dean, in right of his dignity, has the rectorial tithe of the parishes of Ballysakeery, Rafran, Dunfeeny, Kilbreedy, Lacken, Kilcummin, and Templemurry: the entire revenue of the deanery, including the lands, before the passing of the Rent-charge act was £772. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Templemurry; the chapel is a neat slated edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's fund, who allow the master £30 per annum, with a house and one acre of land rent-free. In the town is a dispensary for the poor of the neighbourhood.

On an eminence in Killala is an ancient round tower, about 83 feet high, the walls of which are of great strength and nearly perfect. About a mile to the south-east of the town, at the mouth of the river Moy, are the remains of a friary of Franciscans of the Strict Observance, founded in 1460 by Mac William Bourke, or, according to some writers, by Thomas Oge Bourke. Several provincial chapters of the order were held here, and the establishment continued to flourish till the Dissolution, after which it was granted to Edmund Barrett. The remains consist of the church, and some extensive portions of the conventual buildings: the church is a cruciform structure, 135 feet in length, and from the centre rises a lofty tower, supported on four noble arches leading from the nave into the choir and transepts. At Castlereagh, on the banks of the river Rathfran, about two miles from the sea, are the vestiges of a castle of great strength, which has been levelled with the ground: about a mile to the west is Carrickanass Castle, 35 feet square, and 45 feet high, built by the family of Bourke, and surrounded with a low strong bawn; and there are also several forts in the parish.

KILLALAGHTON.—See KILLAGHTON.

KILLALDRIFF, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Cahir, on the road from that place to Tipperary; containing, with the chapelry of Clonfinglass, 2182 inhabitants. It comprises 5624 statute acres, and there are 650 acres in Clonfinglass: about 1500 are mountain land, and a considerable quantity bog; the land is, however, generally good and well cultivated, and there is plenty of limestone and building-stone. The rivers Arra and Aherlow run through the parish; the latter joins the Suir at Ballydruid. Killaldriff is a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, forming the corps of the prebend of Killaldry, or Killaldriff, in the cathedral of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £202. 10., and there is a glebe of 20 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Galbally, and has a neat chapel. There are some remains of castles at Cappagh and Kilmoylermore; the ruin of a small church or chapel at Clonfinglass; and the remains of the old church of Killaldriff.

KILLALIATHAN, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, barony of GLENQUIN, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Newcastle, on the road from that place to Charleville; containing 1903 inhabitants. It comprises 4847 statute acres. The lower part of the parish is tolerably fertile; about 2000 acres are under tillage, about 800 in meadow and pasture, and the remainder is bog and mountain land. The mountains contain coal, which is worked at Banmore; and limestone, of which an excellent quarry is worked near Broadford: ironstone is also abundant. The principal seats are Banmore and Springfield Castle: this castle, with the surrounding manor, formerly belonged to the Fitzgeralds, lords of Glenlis, and, on its forfeiture in the Desmond rebellion, was, in 1591, granted to Sir W. Courtney. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of Lord Muskerry; the rectory is impropriate in the Sullivan family: the tithe rent-charge is £90, two-thirds of which are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar, whose income is increased by an augmentation from Primate Boulter's fund. The church, erected in 1812 by aid of a grant of £700 from the Board of First Fruits, was lately rebuilt by aid of a grant of £493. 16. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Dromcolloher, and has a chapel at Broadford. Near Banmore are the remains of an ancient church; and the ruins of Gurtnetubber Castle, which was strongly garrisoned for James II., and afterwards dismantled, are situated not very far from Springfield.

KILLALLON, a parish, in the union of OLDCASTLE, barony of DEMIFORE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Crossakeel, and on the road from Oldcastle to Athboy; containing 1853 inhabitants. It comprises 7614 statute acres, about two-thirds of which are in tillage; the land is light, but all of it can be cultivated. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united in 1782 to the vicarage of Killua, and in the patronage of the Bishop and the Marquess of Drogheda: the tithe rent-charge of Killallon is £242. 6., and of the whole benefice £275. 16. The church of the union is at Clonmellon, in Killua; it was built about 60 years since, Sir B. Chapman, Bart., contributing largely. The glebe-house is in this parish, and was built in 1812, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £750 from the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 36 acres, valued at £54 per annum, but subject to a rent of £11, payable to the Earl of Fingall. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clonmellon, and has a plain chapel.

KILLALOAN.—See KILLOLOAN, in the counties of WATERFORD and TIPPERARY.

KILLALOE, a post-town and parish, and the seat of a diocese, in the barony of TULLA LOWER, union of SCARIFF, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 20 miles (E. by S.) from Ennis, and 87 (S. W. by W.) from Dublin, on the road from Scariff to Nenagh; containing 4957 inhabitants, of whom 2009 are in the town. This place, anciently called Laonia, derived its present name, supposed to be a corruption of Kil-da-Lua, from the foundation of an abbey in the 6th century by St. Lua or Molua, grandson of Eocha Baildearg, King of Munster, which abbey became the head of a diocese. Turlogh O'Brien, in 1054, built a bridge across the Shannon at this place, which had grown into some importance, though little of its previous history is related; and, in 1061, Hugh O'Connor destroyed the castle that had been erected here, and burned the town, which was again reduced to ashes in 1080 and 1084, by the people of Connacne. In 1177, Raymond le Gros, after his triumphant entry into Limerick, came to this place, where he received the hostages of Roderic, King of Connaught, and O'Brien, Prince of Thomond, who took the oath of fealty to the King of England. On Richard de Clare's procuring a grant of certain lands in the county of Clare, this town, as containing the only ford over the Shannon, obtained for some time the appellation of Claresford. In 1367, after the recall to England of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, chief governor of Ireland, who had acquired considerable tracts of territory around the town, Murrogh-na-Ranagh, one of the O'Briens, made himself master of all the country beyond the Shannon, and destroyed this town and several others belonging to the English. General Sarsfield, in 1681, posted a strong party at this place, to defend the passage of the river; but the party having abandoned their post, the English advanced into the western provinces. In 1691 the same general, at the head of a select body of cavalry, passed the river, and destroyed a convoy of ammunition on its way to William III., then at Limerick.

The TOWN is pleasantly situated on a rising ground on the western bank of the Shannon, near the noted falls of Killaloe, and about a mile from Lough Derg; and is connected with the county of Tipperary by an ancient bridge of nineteen arches. It consists of one square, with a principal and several smaller streets, and contains about 300 houses. There is a small infantry barrack. A flourishing trade in stuffs, camlets, and serges was formerly carried on, and two well-supplied markets were held weekly; but both the manufacture and the markets have been discontinued. Above and below the bridge are numerous eel-weirs, which produce a strong current in the river; and there is also a salmon-fishery. In the vicinity are some very extensive slate-quarries, from which, on an average, about 8000 tons are annually raised for the supply of the surrounding country to a great distance. A mill, with machinery driven by water, has been erected at an expense of £6000, for cutting and polishing stone and marble, and working them into mantel-pieces, flags, slabs, and other articles, in which about 100 men are employed, for whose residence near the works there are some handsome slated cottages. A spirit of cheerful industry and of enterprise seems to promise much for the increasing prosperity of the town. Close to the mill is a yard for boat-building, belonging to the Shannon Steam-Navigation Company, whose head-quarters are at this place and who have established a regular communication by steam-packets, for goods and passengers, up the Shannon, through Lough Derg to Portumna, Athlone, and Banagher, and from Banagher by canal-boats to Dublin. The company afford employment to a great number of persons in the construction and repair of docks and warehouses. About a quarter of a mile from the village of O'Brien's-Bridge is the pier-head, where the steam-boats transfer their cargoes and passengers to a packet-boat, which is towed at a rapid rate to Limerick, between which place and Dublin boats ply daily; the trip to Portumna and Williamstown is beautifully picturesque. Below the bridge the navigation of the Shannon is interrupted by a ridge of rocks, over which the water rushes with great noise; and the appearance of the town at this place, with the waters of Lough Derg in the distance, and the venerable cathedral rising above the bridge and backed by a fine mountain range, is strikingly romantic. To remedy this obstruction of the navigation, the Board of Inland Navigation constructed a canal through the bishop's demesne, avoiding the rocks, and joining the river beyond the falls; it also erected an hotel, called the Ponsonby Arms, for the accommodation of families visiting Lough Derg and its neighbourhood. The lake is about thirty miles in length, and abounds with beautiful and interesting scenery, more especially in that part which is near the town; the shores are embellished with several handsome mansions, embosomed in luxuriant woods and plantations, and with several ancient and venerable castles. Pike, perch, trout, and various other fish are taken in abundance; among them is found the Gallaroo trout. Fairs are held on April 5th, May 24th, Sept. 3rd, and Oct. 20th; and petty-sessions once a fortnight. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town.

The SEE of KILLALOE was originally founded about 639, by Pope John IV., who consecrated St. Flannan, successor to St. Lua, first bishop: Theodorick, King of Munster and father of St. Flannan, endowed the see with many estates, and was interred in the abbey. Moriertach, King of Ireland, and Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, were also benefactors; and the former was interred here with great pomp in 1120. The church early became a favourite place of resort for pilgrims, and among numerous others was Connor Mac Dermod O'Brien, King of Thomond and Desmond, who died here on a pilgrimage in 1142. The cathedral was erected by Donald, King of Limerick, in 1160. About the close of the twelfth century the ancient bishopric of Roscrea was permanently united to this see, with a portion of that of Iniscathay: in 1752 the see of Kilfenora, which had been founded by St. Fachnan, was also united to it; and the dioceses have, since that period, been always held together.

Killaloe is one of the sixteen dioceses that constitute the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, and comprehends parts of the Queen's county, Limerick, Galway, and King's county, with a large portion of the county of Tipperary, and the greater part of Clare. It extends about 100 miles in length, varying from 9 to 32 in breadth; and comprises an estimated superficies of 628,500 acres, of which 3200 are in Queen's county, 5300 in Limerick, 8800 in Galway, 50,000 in King's county, 134,500 in Tipperary, and 426,700 in Clare. The lands belonging to the see comprise 7528 statute acres, of which 6795 are profitable land; and the gross revenue, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £4532. 9. Since that time the dioceses of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, having become vacant, have been, under the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd of William IV., united to the see of Killaloe, and their temporalities vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The chapter of Killaloe consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, and archdeacon; there are also seven prebendaries, who have no voice in the chapter, viz., those of Tomgranna, Lackeen, Clondegad, Dysert, Tulla, Inniscattery, and Rath. The consistorial court consists of a vicar-general, registrar, and proctor; the registrar is keeper of the records, the earliest of which are only of the date 1668, the old registry having been burnt during the parliamentary war. The total number of parishes in the diocese is 108, of which 89 are comprised in 41 unions, and 19 are single benefices; one benefice is in the patronage of the crown, 11 in lay patronage, and 38 in that of the bishop. The number of churches is 56, and there are five other places in which divine service is performed; the number of glebe-houses is 39. The cathedral, which also serves for the parish church, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a square central tower; it is about 200 feet in length, with a fine east window, and the west front has an imposing appearance; the prevailing character is the Norman style. Near the cathedral is a building called the Oratory of St. Molua, one of the most ancient ecclesiastical edifices in the country, being apparently of the 7th century; it was roofed with stone, but is now in ruins. The economy fund of the cathedral, in 1837, amounted to £602. 10. 5. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the diocese of Kilfenora is held with Kilmacduagh; the diocese of Killaloe is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is an independent bishopric. The number of benefices, or unions, in Killaloe, is 49, and of chapels 111, which are served by 123 clergymen, of whom 49 are parish priests, and 74 coadjutors or curates.

The PARISH comprises 10,707½ statute acres, and is generally under profitable cultivation; the surrounding scenery, as already observed, is beautifully diversified, and in many parts truly picturesque. Near the town, on the west bank of the Shannon, is Clarrisford House, the episcopal palace, finely situated in a highly improved demesne, near the only ford across the river into this county from that of Tipperary; the mansion is handsome and of modern appearance, and, though small, forms a pleasant residence. There are several other gentlemen's seats, most of which command views of the lake and the beautiful scenery along its shores: the principal are, Ballyvalley, from which is a fine view of the town and bridge, with the falls on the river; Tinerana; Ryhinch; Derry Castle; Castle Lough; Youghall; and Ogonilloe. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter; the rectory is appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral: the tithe rent-charge is £276. 18. 6., of which £221. 10. are payable to the economy fund, and the remainder to the bishop, as mensal tithes; the stipend of the curate is £60 per annum, paid out of the economy fund. The glebe-house was erected in 1824, by aid of £500 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 4 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are four chapels, also a place of worship for Presbyterians. Near the town is a rath, where was formerly the castle or palace of Brien Boroihme, monarch of all Ireland: this fort, called Ceanchora or Kinkora, was destroyed by Domohall Mac Adgail, Prince of Tyrconnell, during the absence of Murtogh, grandson of Brien; the site has been levelled and planted, and few vestiges of the original building can be traced.

KILLALOE, or GRANGOOLY, a parish, partly in the barony of CALLAN, partly in that of CRANAGH, but chiefly in the barony of SHILLELOGHER, union of CALLAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Callan, and on the road from Kilkenny to Ballingarry; containing 1424 inhabitants. This parish comprises 5434 statute acres, and contains the seat of Rossmore. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Callan: the tithe rent-charge is £280. 17. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballycallan. About 160 children are educated in a public school, to which the Countess of Desart and the Rev. Mr. Morris contribute £15 annually; there is also a Sunday school; and a fever hospital is supported by the earl, for the benefit of his tenants.

KILLALTON.—See TELTOWN.

KILLAMERY, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of KELLS, county of KILKENNY, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Callan, on the road from that place to Carrick-on-Suir; containing 1965 inhabitants. It comprises 6525 statute acres. At Garryricken, which is the property of the Marquess of Ormonde, are some very fine plantations. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, forming the corps of the prebend of Killamery, in the gift of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £210. The church is a plain structure, erected in 1815, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits, and recently repaired by a grant of £125 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £300, and a loan of £900, from the late Board, in 1818; the glebe comprises 3½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Tullohaught, and containing a chapel at Windgap. A parochial school is aided by the rector; and at Garryricken is a public school, the house for which was built by the late Marquess of Ormonde: in these schools are about 70 children, and about 100 children are taught in a private school. A monastery of 1000 monks is said to have anciently existed here. At Rossamery are the ruins of a small church.

KILLAN, or Killanne, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Bantry, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Enniscorthy, and on the high road from New Ross to Newtownbarry; containing 3193 inhabitants. This parish comprises 11,424 statute acres; the lands are principally under tillage, the soil is light, and the system of agriculture improving. There is no waste land, except on the higher part of the mountain of Blackstairs, which bounds the parish on the west, separating the counties of Wexford and Carlow, and is cultivated to a considerable height from its base. Some commons extending over the higher parts of Blackstairs and White Mountain, in this parish and that of Templeudigan, were for a series of years considered to belong to the tenantry of the adjoining lands; but about 1833, Mr. Kavanagh, of Borris, disputing their right, inclosed a great portion of the district, and built substantial houses in it: this led to a protracted lawsuit, which was finally terminated at the assizes of Wexford in July, 1844, by a verdict against Mr. Kavanagh, establishing the right of the tenantry to the commonage: the inclosures and buildings have since been thrown down. At Woodbrook is a slate-quarry, which has been worked occasionally for private purposes. Lime for manure is drawn from kilns at Gore's-bridge, in the county of Kilkenny, a distance of 13 Irish miles; also from kilns at Ballyane, near New Ross, distant nine miles. The principal seats are the Grange and Woodbrook. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £357. 18. The church, a handsome edifice in the early English style, with some later details, was erected in 1832, at an expense of £1270, towards which a loan of £1200 was granted by the late Board of First Fruits; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £116 for its repair. The late Board also gave £100 towards the erection of the glebe-house, an elegant modern villa, pleasantly situated in a plantation of beech and fir, and commanding a fine view of the White and Blackstairs mountains: the glebe comprises 37 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Templeudigan, or Killeguey; the chapel, at Grange, is a plain edifice. About 120 children are taught in the parochial schools, which are supported by subscription; the school-house and an acre of land were given by the late Mr. Blacker. Near the village of Killan is a holy well, dedicated to St. Anne, from whom the parish takes its name. There are several Danish raths.

KILLAN.—See Shercock.

KILLANCOOLY, a parish, in the union of Gorey, barony of Ballaghkeen, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 10½ miles (S. by E.) from Gorey, and on the old road through Oulart to Wexford; containing 1293 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the south-eastern coast, comprises about 4430 statute acres; by far the greater part is under tillage, and the remainder consists of fine grazing tracts. The soil is in general loamy; the system of agriculture is improved, and butter and cheese are made in large quantities. A herring-fishery is carried on at Tinabearny, where about seven boats and 50 men from this and the adjoining parish of Kilmuckridge are engaged. Wells House, the property of R. Doyne, Esq., was, for nearly three years after the disturbances of 1798, occupied as a barrack by the king's troops; it has just been rebuilt in the Elizabethan style by the proprietor, as a residence, and will in future be called Wells Abbey. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns: it is an impropriate curacy, partly forming a portion of the union of Donaghmore, and partly annexed to the living of Kilnemanagh, by the act of the 4th of George IV.; the rectory is impropriate in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. Killancooly is intersected by the parish of Kilmuckridge; the portion adjoining Kilnemanagh is annexed to that parish for the performance of the clerical duties, and the remainder to Donaghmore. The tithe rent-charge is £142. 10., payable to the impropriator. There are some remains of the church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Litter.

KILLANE, or Killiane, also called Killoebhain, a parish, in the union of Ballinasloe, partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in the barony of Kilconnell, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Ballinasloe, and on the road from Kilconnell to Ballymacward; containing 1318 inhabitants. It comprises 7866 statute acres, and contains Woodlawn, the seat of J. Trench, Esq., where a mausoleum was erected by the late F. Trench, Esq., for his 21 children, for each of whom there is a separate vault. Killane is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Kilconnell; the rectory is appropriate to the see, the sacristan of Clonfert, the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge is £112. 11., of which £51. 5. are payable to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killane is the head of a district, called New Inn, which includes this parish and Bullane; in each is a chapel. About 150 children are educated in a public school, to which Lord Ashtown contributes £26 per annum.

KILLANEAR, or Kilnanare, a parish, in the union of Killarney, barony of Magonihy, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Milltown; on the river Maine, and on the old post-road from Tralee to Killarney; containing 1745 inhabitants. It comprises 5138 statute acres: the land is in general good, and chiefly in tillage; limestone is used for manure, and the state of agriculture is improving: there are only a few patches of bog. At Clonmellane is a station of the constabulary police. The living, lately suppressed, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory forms part of the union and corps of the deanery. The tithe rent-charge is £138. 10., payable in equal portions to the dean and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Fieries. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground; some ruins of Clonmellane Castle stand near the river Maine.

KILLANEY, or Killeney, a parish, in the poor-law union of Lisburn, barony of Upper Castlereagh, county of Down, and province of Ulster, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Saintfield, on the road from that place to Ballinahinch; containing 1236 inhabitants. According to the Ordnance survey, it comprises 2859 statute acres, of which 68¼ are water; the land is good, and under an excellent system of cultivation, producing abundant crops, but not of wheat. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Downshire, in whom the rectory is impropriate: there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. The church was greatly injured in 1641, and is now in ruins, but divine service is regularly performed in the parochial schoolhouse: the late marquess, about four years since, offered £150 and a plot of ground towards building a new church. There is a Presbyterian meeting-house. The parochial school is supported by the vicar and other subscribers; the school-house was erected principally by the late marquess and the vicar. A Sunday school is also maintained in the parish.

KILLANEY, a parish, in the union of Dundalk, partly in the barony of Ardee, county of Louth, and province of Leinster, but chiefly in the barony of Farney, county of Monaghan, and province of Ulster, 1 mile (E. by S.) from Carrickmacross, on the road from Carrick to Dundalk; containing 4896 inhabitants, of whom 1384 are in Louth. The rivers Glyde and Ballymackney flow through this parish; and the Earl of Essex had an interview, in 1599, at Essexford, near one of those streams, with O'Nial, Earl of Tyrone. It comprises, according to the Ordnance survey (including 167¾ acres in the detached townland of Essexford, and 106¼ under water), 7127¼ statute acres, of which 1939¼ are in Louth, and 5188 in Monaghan; 5870 acres are applotted under the Tithe act, and chiefly in tillage, and 500 acres consist of bog. The principal seats are Moynalty and Ballymackney House. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £346. 3. The church is a small ancient structure. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 104 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the district of Carrickmacross, and partly the head of a district comprising also three or four townlands in the parish of Louth; it contains two chapels, one at Corcreagh, belonging to the Carrickmacross district, and the other in the village of Killaney. Here are the ruins of an ancient church, and of a fortification on a conical hill called Mount Killaney.

KILLANIN, a parish, in the barony of Moycullen, union and county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 11 miles (W.) from Galway; containing 11,278 inhabitants. This is a very extensive parish, but as it contains large tracts of bog and mountain, only 6841 statute acres are rated in the county books; the total area is 71,463 acres, including 4307 covered by water. It is situated at the entrance to the bay of Galway, extending to Lough Corrib, and comprehends the islands of Garomna and Littermore, and the bays of Casleh, Scalp, and Bunahown. Killanin is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Ballynakill; the rectory is impropriate in T. Martin, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge payable to him is £33. 15. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel; divine service is also performed in private houses at Rossmuck and Littermore. Here was formerly the castle of Bunown, a principal seat of the O'Flahertys.

KILLANULLY, or Killingley, a parish, in the union of Cork, partly in the barony of Kerrycurrihy, county of Cork, and partly in the ancient county of the city of Cork, and province of Munster, 5 miles (S.) from Cork, on the road from Carrigaline to Ballyhassig; containing 577 inhabitants. This parish, which is entirely surrounded by Carrigaline, comprises 2056 statute acres: the soil is good and chiefly under tillage, and the system of agriculture is improving; there is plenty of good limestone. Here are the Kilnahow flour-mills. The living is a rectory in the diocese of Cork, forming the corps of the prebend of Killanully in Cork cathedral, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £127. 10. The church is in ruins, but divine service is performed in a schoolroom licensed by the bishop. The glebe comprises 5 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballygarvan. There is a parochial school for boys and girls, built by Lord Mount-Sandford and W. H. W. Newenham, Esq., and entirely supported by the latter; about 50 children are educated in it, and there is also a Sunday school. In the cemetery of the church is the grave of Father Florence M'Carthy, who died about 1814; it is much visited by pilgrims: near the churchyard is a holy well.

KILLARAGHT, a parish, in the union of Boyle, barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo, and province of Connaught, 4 miles (S. W.) from Boyle, on the road from that place to Frenchpark; containing 2229 inhabitants. This place is said to derive its name from a nunnery founded here by St. Patrick for St. Athracta, sister of St. Coeman, who received the veil from him in 470. It is situated on the southern shore of Lough Gara, and consists chiefly of pasture land; the total area is 9332 statute acres. Killaraght is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, episcopally united to those of Kilfree and Kilshalvee; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton, and the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10., of which £42. 7. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. There is a glebe of 3½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Gurteen, and has a chapel at Cloonlagh. At Templeoran are the ruins of a church, with a burial-place attached.

KILLARARAN, or Kilronan, a parish, in the union of Ballinasloe, barony of Killian, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2¾ miles (N. E.) from Ballinamore, on the road from that place to Roscommon; containing 5162 inhabitants, and 12,595 statute acres. The river Shiven runs through part of this parish, which contains a large quantity of bog. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays at Ballygar. The principal seats are Ballinamore House, Ballinglass, Castle Kelly, and Riversdale. Killararan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Killian; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Kingsland, and the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £111, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Killian, and has a chapel at Ballygar.

KILLARD, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of IBRICKANE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (N. W.) from Kilrush, and on the road from Kilkee to Miltown-Malbay; containing 6941 inhabitants. This parish, which is on the western coast, and includes the cliff of Baltard, comprises 17,022 statute acres: there is a large quantity of reclaimable bog and rocky land; but the system of agriculture is improving. Slate and flag quarries exist here. Very fine salmon is caught in the Dunbeg river; and the banks of Baltard, about three leagues from the shore, afford turbot, cod, haddock, dorée, mackerel, whiting, and other fish, in great abundance and perfection. The coast being precipitous and the surf considerable, the fishermen use canoes of wicker-work covered with pitched canvas. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Castlecoote, and in R. Stackpoole, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £156. 15., of which £64. 5. 8. are payable to the representatives of Lord Castlecoote, £9. 18. 6. to Mr. Stackpoole, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, near Dunbeg, was erected in 1833, by aid of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kilkee, and has a chapel at Dunbeg. A parochial school has been established under the patronage of the incumbent and Mr. Straight, the latter of whom gave the school-house and a piece of ground rent-free; there is also a school partly supported by the parish priest. On the summit of Baltard cliff are the ruins of a signal tower; on the south-western side of Dunbeg bay are the ruins of Dunmore Castle; and there are some remains of the old parish church.—See DUNBEG.

KILLARE, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of RATHCONRATH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Mullingar to Athlone; containing, with part of the post-town of Ballymore, 3990 inhabitants. This place is supposed by Camden to have been the Laberus of Ptolemy; and is distinguished by a lofty and isolated hill, which bounds it on the north-west, called Knock-Usneach, and said to have been celebrated for the ancient provincial assemblies of the native Irish. A religious house was founded here at a very early period, and subsequently became the head of a small see, of which St. Aid is thought to have been bishop in 588; of this establishment, and also of a castle founded by the family of the Geoghegans, there are still some slight remains. The parish comprises 11,382 statute acres: the land is principally under tillage; the system of agriculture is improving, and there is a small portion of bog. The principal seat is Mosstown, a handsome residence. Fairs and petty-sessions are held at Ballymore. Killare is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Meath, annexed to the perpetual curacy of Ballymore, or St. Owen's of Loughseudy: the rectory is impropriate in Mrs. F. C. Reade; the tithe rent-charge is £195. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is also part of the union or district of Ballymore. In the village, which consists only of a few cabins, are the ruins of the old parish church, with a burial-ground; and opposite to it is a remarkably high mound, at the base of which is another ruin of very great antiquity, with a well dedicated to St. Bridget. In the centre of the parish is Clare Hill, on the summit of which are the remains of a castle and fortifications, said to have belonged to the family of De Lacy. Near Mosstown are the remains of the castle of Killenbrack; and within that demesne, on a small mound, is a burial-place of the Judge family, of King's county.

KILLARGY, a parish, in the union of MANOR-HAMILTON, barony of DROMAHAIR, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Manor-Hamilton, on the road to Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 4873 inhabitants, of whom about 110 are in the village. This parish, including a portion of Lough Clean, or Belhovel lake, comprises 14,893 statute acres, of which 10,912 are applotted under the Tithe act. The land is generally good, and chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture is improved; there is no waste land, except what affords either turbary or indifferent grazing, but there is a large portion of bog. Some quarries of limestone are worked, both for building and for agricultural uses. Fairs for live stock are held at Belhovel on Feb. 2nd, March 25th, Whit-Monday, Aug. 15th, Sept. 8th, and Dec. 26th. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £45, of which £30 are payable to the bishop and £15 to the vicar. The church, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1000, is a neat edifice, built in 1830. The glebe-house, towards which the same Board, in 1815, gave £100 and lent £600, is a good residence; and the glebe comprises 350 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district comprising also part of the parish of Clonlogher; the chapel is situated in the village. Several schools are supported in the parish.

KILLARNEY, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a poor-law union, in the barony of MAGONIHY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 16 miles (S. E.) from Tralee and 167 (S. W.) from Dublin; on the road from Tralee to Kenmare, and on the present mail-coach road to Cork; containing 10,476 inhabitants, of whom 5964 are in the town. This town, a portion of which, containing 1163 inhabitants, extends into the parish of Aghadoe, derived its origin from the iron smelting-works in the neighbourhood (for which its ample forests afforded abundant fuel), and from the copper-mines of Ross and Muckross; and is chiefly indebted for its present prosperity to its vicinity to the celebrated lakes to which it gives name. It consists principally of two streets, from which branch several smaller; the former have been well paved and flagged, at the expense of the Earl of Kenmare, proprietor of Killarney, whose seat and extensive demesne immediately adjoin the town. The total number of houses is 931, for the most part neatly built; the total population is 7127. At the south end of the town is Kenmare-place, a handsome range of dwellings: and in the principal street are two commodious and spacious inns, for the reception of the numerous visiters to the lakes, for whose accommodation also several lodging-houses have been erected. There are two subscription reading-rooms, to one of which is attached a billiard-room. Races, which had been formerly held here, were lately revived; a regatta on the lake has been established; and a stag-hunt occasionally takes place in the mountains of Glenà, which abound with the native red-deer. On the east bank of the Dinagh is the Mall, a favourite promenade of considerable extent: near it is a mineral spring, and at Tullig, two miles north-east of the town, is another. The approach to the town from the Kenmare road is through an avenue of stately lime-trees, forming a delightful promenade, from which branches off the road to Ross, commanding a magnificent view of mountain scenery. The projected railroad from Dublin to Valencia, if carried into effect, will pass to the north-east of the town.

Tanning, for which the oak woods in the immediate vicinity are favourable, is still carried on, but not to its former extent. Bandle linen, made in the neighbourhood, is brought into the market for sale; and on the river Flesk is a bleach-green with a fulling-mill. A variety of useful and ornamental articles are made from the arbutus-tree, and sold to strangers visiting the lakes; there are two breweries, two small snuff and tobacco manufactories, and some extensive flour-mills, of which those belonging to Messrs. Galway and Leahy are worked by the Dinagh, a stream that flows through the West demesne into the Lower Lake. The market, which is on Saturday, is supplied with an abundance of cheap and excellent provisions of every description; and fairs are held on July 4th, Aug. 8th, Oct. 7th, Nov. 11th and 28th, and Dec. 28th, on Fair Hill, at the eastern extremity of the town. A chief constabulary police force is stationed at Killarney; and there is also a station at Derricunnihy, near the Upper Lake, the barrack for which, recently erected, is a neat square building, with an octagonal turret at each of the two opposite angles, forming an ornamental feature among the beautiful scenery around it. The quarter-sessions of the peace for the county are held at Killarney, by adjournment from Tralee, four times in the year; petty-sessions are also held, every Tuesday; and a court is held monthly by the seneschal of the manor of Ross, at which small debts are recoverable. The present court-house is a handsome building of hewn stone; and connected with it is the bridewell, containing two day-rooms, two airing-yards, and six cells, with every requisite appendage. The old court-house has been converted into a theatre, which is occasionally opened by the Cork company. The market-house is an old building, the upper part occasionally used as a ball-room, and the lower part, formerly the meat-market, now chiefly appropriated to the sale of bandle linen. Shambles for butchers' meat and fish have been erected at the back of High-street.

The PARISH comprises 38,151 statute acres, a very considerable portion of which is in demesne and occupied by plantations. The soil is generally fertile, except in those parts which consist of rocky mountain, and even these are in many places embellished with trees of various kinds that have taken root in the fissures of the rock. There are some large tracts of bog, affording an abundant supply of fuel. Quarries of limestone and slate are worked to a considerable extent; the former for building and agricultural purposes, and the latter for roofing and for various other uses. The ancient iron-works have been long since discontinued, but some vestiges of their existence may still be traced, and the extent to which they were carried on is evident from the vast consumption of timber in the neighbourhood. Lead and copper ores have been obtained in abundance, and the mines appear to have been worked at a very early period. Some of the rude implements used in breaking the ore, and called by the country people "Danes' hammers," are still occasionally found; they consist of smooth oval stones much chipped at the edges, with grooves in the centre by which they were fastened to the handles. A very valuable copper-mine was for several years worked on Ross Island; and both copper and cobalt were formerly obtained at Muckross: the works on Ross Island have been discontinued, and the ground has been planted and highly embellished, under the directions of the Countess of Kenmare. The river Laune, the only outlet from the lakes, is susceptible of great improvement, and at a moderate expense might be rendered navigable from the Lower Lake to the harbour of Castlemaine.

Kenmare House, the residence of the Earl of Kenmare, is a spacious mansion, externally plain, but containing several noble apartments elegantly fitted up, with a ball-room of large dimensions, an excellent library, and a domestic chapel. The demesne, which is very extensive, has been greatly improved, and commands from the rear of the house a beautiful though distant view of the Lower Lake and the mountains on its shores. In the deer-park, to the north-east of the town, is a romantic glen, where the Dinagh takes its course and is crossed by a rustic foot-bridge. Muckross, or Muckruss, the seat of H. A. Herbert, Esq., is situated in a demesne of enchanting beauty. The old mansion has been taken down, and rebuilt in a style according more with the beauty of the grounds, and the numerous interesting objects in the immediate vicinity: the road, also, through the peninsula of Muckross and across Brickeen bridge to the island of that name, has been so improved as to form a delightful drive through the whole of this romantic demesne. Tore Cottage, the seat of Captain Sir Thomas Herbert, at the south-eastern extremity of the lake of that name, is a handsome building in the early English style, commanding, from its peculiar situation, some grand and majestic mountain scenery, the beauty of which is heightened by reflection from the smooth surface of the lake, of which it has an uninterrupted view; the pleasure-grounds are laid out with great taste, and kept in excellent order. The Park, the seat of D. Cronin, Esq., is also a handsome mansion, situated in an extensive and richly wooded demesne, and commanding a distant view of the Lower Lake. Flesk Castle, the seat of the family of Coltsman, a spacious modern castellated mansion, combining various styles, occupies the summit of Droumhumper Hill, an eminence rising gently from the river Flesk, which encircles its base, and richly clothed with plantations and shrubs; the whole presenting a remarkably picturesque object as seen from the Cork road. From the castle terraee is an extensive panoramic view of the Middle and Lower Lakes, with the surrounding scenery; and at a moderate elevation above the river is a beautiful round tower with projecting battlements, resembling an ancient water tower, which forms an interesting feature in the scenery of the demesne. Cahirnane, the seat of H. Herbert, Esq., is situated in a richly wooded demesne, much admired for its noble avenue of trees. Castle Lough, formerly a strong fortress in connexion with the abbey of Muckross, was besieged by the parliamentarian army under Ludlow, and finally demolished; it became the site of a residence of a younger branch of the family of Mac Carthy More, by patent of James II. in 1683, and is now an inconsiderable ruin in the demesne of the present proprietor, and nearly adjoining the present mansion. The buildings are situated on a rocky promontory in the bay of the same name in the Lower Lake, and the grounds command some of the finest scenery on its shores. Flesk Priory, the seat of the family of Coxon, is an elegant modern residence in the cottage style, in tastefully disposed grounds, and embracing some pleasing views. Danesfort, the seat of Captain Coulthurst, takes its name from an ancient fort near the house; it is situated on a gentle eminence, commanding some interesting views of the Middle and Lower Lakes. In the parish are also Woodlawn, Flesk Cottage, South Hill, Courtayne Castle, and Gheramine. Other seats in the vicinity are described in the parishes of Aghadoe and Knockane, in which they are situated.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, united from time immemorial to the vicarage of Kilcummin, and in the patronage of the Crown, owing to the legal incapacity of the Earl of Kenmare; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore. The tithe rent-charge is £356. 5., of which £176. 5. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; five townlands pay tithe, amounting to £48. 16., to the archdeacon of Aghadoe. The tithe of the whole vicarial union is £346. 3. The church, to the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits contributed a loan of £700, was built in 1812, and has been repaired by a grant of £282 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: it is a neat but irregular structure, with a tower surmounted by a slated spire, and contains several mural tablets, among which are two to the earls of Kenmare, whose family vault is beneath; the east window is embellished with a painting of Christ and the Two Disciples at Emmaus, in stained glass. Near the church is the glebe-house, a large and substantial building, on a small glebe; and there is a glebe of 42 acres in the parish of Kilcummin. Mr. Herbert, of Muckross, has had it in contemplation to build a church near Cloghereen, in this parish, and endow it with £100 per annum for the support of a curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Glenflesk, but chiefly forms the head of a district comprising also the greater portion of Aghadoe: the principal chapel, a spacious edifice of plain exterior but handsomely fitted up, is in the town, and the chapel belonging to a nunnery is open to the public on Sunday mornings; there is a chapel of ease at Fossa, in the parish of Aghadoe. A place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists has been erected in the town. About 50 children are taught in the parochial school, which was built and is supported by subscription; 400 boys in a school under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, for which a spacious building was erected at an expense of £400, by the late Dr. Sughrue, Roman Catholic bishop; and more than 300 girls in the school annexed to the nunnery. The two last are liberally aided by the Earl and Countess of Kenmare, by whom also the children are partially clothed and apprenticed. The college school, founded by Dr. Sughrue for the education of young men for the Roman Catholic priesthood, is now a private classical school; and the rent, £50 per annum, is appropriated to charitable purposes: there is another private school of about 50 children in the parish. A fever hospital and a dispensary are supported for the relief of the poor, the former adapted to the reception of 50 patients, and having a ward attached to it for surgical cases; an almshouse for aged women has been established, and is supported, by the Countess of Kenmare. The union workhouse, occupying a site of eight acres, was erected at a cost of £7825, and contains accommodation for 800 paupers.

At Lissavigeen, two miles and a half east of the town, is an ancient fort, or rath, called the Druids' Circle, consisting of a circular embankment 35 feet in diameter, within which is a circle of seven upright stones, four feet high; and at about the distance of 36 feet from the embankment are two upright stones of much larger dimensions seven feet apart. A very curious relic of antiquity, in form resembling a kettle-drum, was found some years since in a bog near Muckross; it is of bronze, about two feet in diameter, and on being struck emits a deep-toned, hollow sound, resembling that of the Indian gong; it is deposited in the library of Charlemont House, Dublin. A smaller one, which was found near it, was broken in attempting to raise it. The wild, romantic, and rocky mountain pass called the Gap of Dunloe, together with the castle of that name, is described in the article on Knockane; and the ruins of the cathedral, the ancient round tower, and the Bishop's chair, are noticed in the article on Aghadoe. Several of the O'Donoghues, Irish chieftains or princes, were interred in Muckross Abbey; the most powerful were the O'Donoghues of Ross, and the O'Donoghues of the Glens.

Of the numerous LAKES in the county of Kerry, the largest as well as the most interesting are those of KILLARNEY, situated about a mile and a half from the town, on the confines of a chain of lofty mountains, between which and the Atlantic are others of still greater magnitude and elevation; among the latter is the majestic Curran Tual, rising to the height of 3404 feet above the level of the sea, and forming the principal of the range called Mac Gillycuddy's Reeks, and the most elevated point in Ireland. The Lakes of Killarney may be regarded as an immense reservoir for the waters of the surrounding country, descending from the mountain lakes by tributary rivers; and their surplus waters are conveyed through the harbour of Castlemaine into the Atlantic by the river Laune, which is the only outlet. They consist of the Lower, Middle, and Upper Lakes: the two former, which are nearly on the same level, are bounded on one side only by mountains, and on the other are open to a richly cultivated country, whose surface is diversified with hills; the latter is surrounded by mountains on every side, and has a higher elevation than the others.

The Lower Lake is about six miles in length and three miles in breadth. It is bounded on the west by the mountain of Glenà, rising abruptly from the water at that part called Glenà bay; and farther to the north by the Tomies mountain, which is of more gradual elevation, and has at its base a considerable tract of fertile and richly cultivated land, sloping to the margin of the lake. Of the numerous islands in this lake, the largest is that called Ross Island, containing about 80 plantation acres, and which, being separated from the main land only by an artificial channel crossed by a bridge, forms a peninsula projecting considerably into the lake. Here are the picturesque ruins of Ross Castle, founded by the O'Donoghues; it was defended by Lord Muskerry against the parliamentarians in 1652, and surrendered to Ludlow. This fortress gives the inferior titles of Viscount and Baron of Castlerosse to the Earl of Kenmare. The shores of Ross are deeply indented, and the rocks along its borders worn into every variety of fanciful forms; it is ornamented with thriving plantations, and the arbutus and other evergreens here flourish in the richest luxuriance. Near the castle is a small pier, this being the general point of embarkation for visiters to the lakes. At a short distance from the pier, the sound of a bugle is returned, successively from the castle, the ruined church of Aghadoe, and Mangerton; and afterwards innumerable reverberations are heard, becoming gradually fainter till they are lost in the distance. To the north is O'Donoghue's Prison, a rock rising about thirty feet above the surface of the lake; from the fissures of which on the summit grow the arbutus, ash, and holly, in the greatest luxuriance; and which, according to tradition, was used by a chieftain of that name, of prodigious strength, as a place of confinement. To the north of it are Heron and Lamb Islands; and to the west, Brown and Rabbit Islands, the last remarkable for its quarries of limestone, which is burnt for manure. Westward of Ross Island is that of Innisfallen, the most beautiful and interesting of all in the Lower Lake: it is extremely fertile, and richly clothed with wood to the water's edge; among various trees of stately growth is a holly, the stem of which is fourteen feet in girth. Its name, originally Inuis-Nessan, from the father of the founder of its venerable abbey, was subsequently changed to Innisfallen, as more descriptive of its natural beauty: it forms the subject of Moore's melody commencing—"Sweet Innisfallen, fare thee well!" The abbey was founded by St. Finian Lobhar, or the Leper, at the close of the 6th century; and by some of the brethren were compiled the celebrated "Annals of Innisfallen," an ancient manuscript, containing a general history of the world from the creation to the year 430 of the Christian era, but thenceforward confined to the history of Ireland. The ruins are inconsiderable and of rude character. On a projecting cliff near the abbey is an ancient oratory, with a richly embellished Norman doorway; it was till lately used as a place of refreshment, but a banqueting-house has been erected for the use of visiters in another part of the island.

Between the mountains of Glenà and Tomies, on the western shore of the Lower Lake, is O'Sullivan's Cascade, consisting of three falls in a descent of about 70 feet, the noise of which is heard at a great distance: beneath a projecting rock overhanging the lowest fall is a grotto; and beneath the base of the mount, and where the torrent enters the lake, is a small bay, in which a quay of rude workmanship has been constructed. At this place is the greatest and most uninterrupted expanse of the lake, the navigation of which, from the extreme precariousness of the weather, is frequently attended with inconvenience from want of immediate shelter. The Bay of Glenà presents a combination of sublime and beautiful scenery. Glenà mountain, which forms its boundary, though bare on the summit, is towards the base clothed with a rich unbroken series of woods, sloping down to the water's edge; in this bay, also, a remarkably fine echo is produced by a bugle. On a gently swelling lawn, near the shore, is the elegant cottage ornée of Lady Kenmare, at a short distance from which a banqueting-house, for the accommodation of visiters, has been erected by Lord Kenmare, From a small mount furnished with rustic seats is obtained a fine view of the bay, the southern shore of Ross, and the island of Innisfallen. The northern shore of the peninsula of Muckross is bold and rocky, and fretted by the action of the waves into a variety of caves and fantastic forms: between this and the southern shore of Ross, the lake is studded with numerous islands, to the east of which it expands into Castle-Lough Bay.

The Middle, or Torc, Lake, so called from the mountain which bounds it on the south, is separated from the Lower Lake by the islands of Dinis and Brickeen, and the peninsula of Muckross, the two latter connected by an antique bridge of one pointed arch, built by the late Colonel Herbert; and is generally entered on the Glenà side of Dinis Island, through a passage of great natural beauty, both banks of the inlet being clothed with luxuriant groves to the margin of the water. The island of Dinis is richly wooded, and contains a cottage for the refreshment of visiters, looking towards Torc Cottage, the elegant residence of Sir Thomas Herbert, and the mountain of Mangerton; the banqueting-room commands a fine view of the lake from one extremity to the other. This lake is about two English miles in length, and about one in breadth. On the north side are "Devil's Island" and "Boy;" the former a rock of considerable elevation, with some shrubs on its summit, appears to have been thrown off from the main land by some convulsion of nature. The peninsula of Muckross, which forms the northern boundary of the lake, is occupied by the demesne of H. A. Herbert, Esq., and has here but little elevation above the water; it is thickly covered with wood, and forms a striking contrast with the southern shore, the lofty and magnificent features of which are deeply reflected from the surface of the lake, which is not, like that of the Lower Lake, interrupted by islands. On the south side, Torc Mountain, the precipitous front of which is wooded to a considerable height, rises in majestic grandeur, its apparent elevation being undiminished by that of Mangerton, which recedes from the view; and a picturesque cascade, chiefly supplied from a lake near the summit of Mangerton, called the "Devil's Punch-Bowl," has a strikingly beautiful effect. The latter lake, which is remarkable for its great depth, the coldness of its water, and a peculiarly tremulous echo produced from its shores, is situated at an elevation of nearly 1700 feet above the level of the sea, Mangerton itself rising to the height of 2754. The mountain is barren, and of great extent; but from its summit, which is easily ascended, is obtained a magnificent and extensive prospect, embracing the whole of the lakes and the surrounding mountains. On its eastern side is Glaun-na-coppul, the "Glen of the Horse," inclosed on every side by rugged and precipitous rocks.

The picturesque and interesting ruins of Muckross Abbey are situated on a gentle acclivity at the eastern extremity of the peninsula. This abbey, formerly called Irrelagh, was founded by Donald, son of Thady M'Carthy, in 1440, and has since continued to be the favourite place of sepulture of that family; it was rebuilt in 1626, but was soon afterwards suffered to fall into decay: the edifice consisted of a nave, choir, transept, and cloisters, which last are still nearly entire. The entrance is through a pointed doorway, the arch of which is deeply moulded; and a narrow pointed archway leads into the choir, in which are the tombs of the M'Carthy Mores and the O'Donoghues of the Glens: there is also a large mural monument to the wife of Christopher Gallwey, Esq., beautifully executed in Italian marble.

The UPPER LAKE is about three miles to the east of Torc, or the Middle, Lake, with which it communicates by a circuitous channel of difficult navigation; the current is in many parts very rapid, and the passage against the stream laborious and difficult. Not far from the old weir-bridge is an eddy, called O'Sullivan's Punchbowl, where the visiters are obliged to disembark, while the boat is drawn through one of the arches of the bridge. Pursuing the winding course of the stream, various interesting objects successively present themselves: among these are several islands and rocks, of which latter, one, from its resemblance to a ship, is called "The Man-of-War;" on its summit is a very large yew-tree, whose stem and branches are supposed to aid the similitude. The Eagles' Nest is a lofty rock of pyramidal form, rising abruptly from the river, which makes a sudden sweep round its base, and from which it has a very picturesque appearance, though in a distant view it is lost in the superior height of the adjacent mountains; the base is covered with wood, and the face of the rock to its summit is interspersed with shrubs. The nest of the eagle is distinguished by a black mark near the vertex, and that bird is frequently seen soaring at a considerable elevation above the river. From a hillock, on the opposite side of the stream, usually called the "Station for Audience," an echo is produced by a single bugle equal in effect to a full band of instruments; the discharge of a cannon produces a crash as if the rocks were rent asunder, and the succeeding echoes resemble the reverberations of thunder. In the passage to the Upper Lake many superb mountain views and much sublime scenery are exhibited: the view is bounded on the north-west by Glenà and the Long Range mountains; on the south-east, by Cromiglaun, and the base of Torc. The entrance is contracted into a very narrow passage, usually called Coleman's Leap, from a tradition that a person of that name leaped across the chasm.

This Upper Lake is about two miles and a half in length, and, from its numerous indentations, of very irregular breadth; it is thickly studded with islands, and from its being almost entirely surrounded by mountains, the scenery differs greatly from that of the two other lakes. To the south, the Cromiglaun mountain rises from its very margin; and immediately behind is the Esknamucky, from which a considerable stream, falling into the lake, forms a picturesque cascade. West of Cromiglaun is Derrycunnihy, from which, also, falls the beautiful cascade of that name; and in a small glen, between it and the lake, is the pretty cottage of the late Rev. Mr. Hyde, occupying a highly romantic and secluded situation, and commanding a view of Derrycunnihy cascade, and its rocky and richly wooded glen. To the west of Derrycunnihy, and separated by the river Kavoge, is Derrydimnagh mountain, covered on one of its sides by a dense wood; and in the distance, towards the south-west, are seen the Coombui mountains, and those of Barnasna more to the west, and to the north-west Bawn and Mac Gillycuddy's Reeks. The nearest of the last to the lake is Gheramine, at the base of which is the entrance to the sequestered valley of Cameduff, watered by a river navigable to the late Lord Brandon's boat-house, whence a pathway leads to Gheramine Cottage, embosomed in woods. On an eminence in the grounds is a tower, 40 feet high, erected by his lordship in imitation of the ancient round towers of Ireland, and from whose summit, ascended by a ladder in the interior, an extensive view is commanded of the valley and lakes of Cameduff, the mountains that inclose them, the islands of the Upper Lake, and Torc mountain in the distance. To the north of the lake is the Purple Mountain, so called from the colour of the strata of shivered slate on its surface; and to the north-east is the "Long Range," backed by the mountains of Glenà and Tomies. The most prominent of the islands in this lake is Rossburkie, or Oak Island, rising from a rocky bass and crowned with wood; from its shores is a splendid view of the mountains, finely grouped. The others are, Eagles' Island, Ronayne's Island, M'Carthy's Duck, and Arbutus Islands, the channels between which open to new and varied scenery, combining panoramic views of rocks, woods, and mountains, with picturesque cascades, and forming an assemblage of the sublimest and most romantic features of nature. The northern shore of the lake commands prospects of equal magnificence. The rocks and islands of the Upper Lake, the resort of numerous birds of prey, are of a dark-green colour, harmonising finely with the sombre sublimity of the surrounding mountains, which tower in wild and varied magnificence; while those of the two lower lakes are chiefly of limestone, washed by the waves into a variety of fantastic forms.

The Upper and Middle Lakes, previously visited almost exclusively by aquatic parties, have been thrown into a perfectly new and highly interesting point of view by the construction of the road to Kenmare, which passes between Torc mountain and the southern shore of the Middle Lake, and, continuing its course to the south-west, commands some fine reaches of the river, from the old weir-bridge to Coleman's Leap, and winds round the eastern and southern shores of the Upper Lake.

About five miles from Killarney the road is conducted through a tunnel, called "The Heading," 45 feet in length, cut through the solid rock. From this point the Upper Lake is seen in beautiful perspective, with its widest expanse of water, its wood-crowned islands and picturesque bays, in some parts fringed with foliage of every shade, and in others marked with features of sublime and rugged grandeur, till it is lost in the distance between the majestic mountains that form its remoter boundaries. On the approach from Kenmare the lakes, with their winding river, appear in a great vista between mountains wild and rocky towards their summit, but clothed at their base with luxuriant foliage to the water's edge. Here the Upper Lake displays its chief beauties, presenting at a single glance one of the grandest combinations of the sublime and beautiful in the works of nature. About halfway between Killarney and Kenmare the road descends towards the former between the base of the mountains and the southern shore of the lake, through the thick woods with which the mountains are clothed; the arbutus and the "London pride" flourish here in the greatest luxuriance. In its progress towards Killarney, the road affords some fine views of the Middle Lake and the interesting scenery in the neighbourhood of Muckross. Of the three lakes, the scenery of the Lower is considered the most beautiful, that of Torc the most picturesque, and that of the Upper Lake the most sublime; taken altogether they are perhaps unrivalled by any of equal extent in Europe.

KILLARNEY, a parish, in the barony of GOWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Gowran; containing 75 inhabitants, and 155 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, entirely appropriate to the economy estate of the cathedral of St. Canice, Kilkenny; the tithe rent-charge is £16. 1. 9. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Thomastown, and contains a chapel. Here are the ruins of a castle said to have been formerly occupied by the Grace family.

KILLASCOBE, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of TYAQUIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (W.) from Castle-Blakeney, on the road to Galway; containing 2446 inhabitants. It comprises a considerable quantity of bog, and about 500 acres of waste land; the total area is 8208 statute acres. Killascobe is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Annaghdown; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the tithe rent-charge is £236. 5., of which two-thirds are payable to the vicars-choral and one-third to the vicar, who has a glebe of four acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Aghiart, or Mount Bellew, and has a chapel at Skianagh and Minla. At Garbally is a chalybeate well; and within the limits of the parish are the ruins of Cloonkurrin and Garbally Castles, which were partially destroyed by Cromwell. A portion of land on Mr. French's estate sank about two years since, and the cavity still remains filled with water; it is 100 feet deep.

KILLASHEE, KILDARE.—See KILLISHY.

KILLASHEE, a parish, in the union, and partly in the barony, of LONGFORD, but chiefly in the barony of MOYDOW, county of LONGFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Lanesborough, and on the road from Longford to Roscommon; containing, with the parish of Clonodonnell, 4491 inhabitants, of whom 359 are in the village. It comprises 4615 statute acres of profitable land, besides about 9605 of bog and waste land; the total area is 14,427 statute acres, including 207 under water. Agriculture is in a backward state; there is an abundance of limestone, which is used for manure and for building. The village comprises 61 houses; it is a constabulary police station, and has petty-sessions on alternate Mondays, and fairs on the second Monday in March, May 26th, Sept. 29th, and the first Wednesday in December. The Shannon and the Royal Canal pass in the vicinity. Killashee is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, united by act of council in 1781 to the rectory and vicarage of Clonodonnell, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly appropriate to the bishopric and partly to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £137. 11., of which £26. 3. 5. are payable to the bishop, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £149. 15. 7. The church has been rebuilt, partly by a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house has two glebes, comprising 167 acres, besides a glebe of 19 acres in Clonodonnell. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a union or district corresponding with that of the Established Church, and having a chapel at Killashee and one at Clondra. There is also a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The parochial school is on Erasmus Smith's foundation, the trustees of which contributed to the expense of building the school-house; about 100 children are educated. Lady Hutchinson bequeathed £5 annually for the repair of Sir James Hutchinson's tomb, the surplus of which is distributed among the poor. Here are a subterraneous stream, and a large cave; and at Ballynakill are the ruins of a church, with a burying-ground attached.

KILLASNET, a parish, in the poor-law union of MANOR-HAMILTON, half-barony of ROSCLOGHER, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Enniskillen to Sligo; containing, with part of the post-town of Manor-Hamilton, 6286 inhabitants. It comprises 26,918 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of bog: copper, iron, and coal are supposed to exist in Benbulben mountain; and French chalk, gypsum, limestone, and coloured clays are found here. Fairs are held at Lurganboy on May 15th, and on the 21st of every other month. The principal seats are Screeny, Rockwood, and Glenade. The parish is in the diocese of Kilmore: the rectory is appropriate to the see; the vicarage forms part of the union of Manor-Hamilton; and there is a perpetual curacy, called Glencar, or Glenlough, which was formed in 1810, by separating 28 townlands from Killasnet, and is in the patronage of the Vicar, who pays part of the curate's stipend. The tithe rent-charge is £153. 15., two-thirds payable to the bishop, and one-third to the vicar. The church, which is at Glencar, is a neat plain building. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel at Mullys, built in 1834, at an expense of £250; and another at Glencar. Of five schools, four are supported by John Wynne, Esq., of Hazlewood, and the vicar. There are some remains of the old parish church; also several chalybeate springs in the mountains; and near Glencar is a cascade, 200 feet high, near which are some fine views.

KILLASOLAN.—See CASTLE-BLAKENEY.

KILLASPICBROWN, or KILLASPECKBRONE, a parish, in the Upper half-barony of CARBERY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (W.) from Sligo, and on the bay of Sligo, containing, with Coney and Oyster Islands, 2265 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5624 statute acres; the land is principally in tillage, and there is some limestone, but no bog. It comprehends the glen of Knocknarea, which is about a mile in length and beautifully planted, with several cascades in the centre, and stupendous rocks on each side; at the western extremity is a fine view of the Ballysadere channel. At Cullinamore are some good beds of oysters. Killaspicbrown is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of St. John's, Sligo: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 16. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish also forms part of the union or district of St. John's, Sligo, and has a good slated chapel at the base of Knocknarea Hill. At Primrose Grange is a school for boarding, instructing, clothing, and apprenticing 110 boys, endowed by the late Edward Nicholson, Esq., of Sligo, with £130 per annum, and 20 acres of mountain land. Here are the ruins of an ancient church, said to have been founded by a bishop named Brone or Brown, from whom the parish derives its name; but they are now nearly buried by the drifting sands, which have also covered about 400 acres of good land. There are numerous raths, especially near Rathcarrick.

KILLASPIGMULLANE, or KILMULLANE, but generally known as BALLYVINNY, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Rathcormac, and on the road from Cork to Dublin; containing 569 inhabitants. It comprises 1852 statute acres; there is no waste land, and the soil, though shallow, is fertile. The parish is a prebend in St. Finbarr's cathedral, Cork, united from time immemorial to the rectories of Kilquane, Cannaway, Templeusque, and Ballydelohar, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of Killaspigmullane is £276. 18. 6., and of the whole union £920. 16. The church was lately built, at a cost of £700. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Watergrass Hill.

KILLASPUGLENANE, a parish, in the barony of CORCOMROE, union of ENNISTYMON, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 2¾ miles (N. W.) from Ennistymon, and on the western coast; containing 1824 inhabitants. It comprises 3548 statute acres, consisting chiefly of coarse mountain pasture. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, forming part of the union of Kilmanaheen; the rectory forms part of the corps of the archdeaconry of Kilfenora, and the tithe rent-charge is £78. 15., of which £56. 5. are payable to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the vicar: there is a glebe of two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Liscanor, and has a plain chapel at Cahirgal. Some remains of the church still exist.

KILLASSER, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of GALLEN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (E. N. E.) from Foxford; on the river Moy and the road to Swinford; containing 6962 inhabitants. This parish was the scene of a sanguinary battle between the native septs of the Jordans and the Rowans, at a spot since called Lugnafulla, or "the valley of blood." It comprises 19,677 statute acres, of which about 6000 are arable, and the remainder principally bog and mountain: the land is of indifferent quality, and in many places covered with rocks of great size; some of the eastern portion is more productive, but agriculture is in a very backward state; there is a large tract of irreclaimable bog. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Templemore; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of the late Roger Palmer, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £384, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killasser forms a separate benefice; there are two chapels, situated respectively at Calla and Boullabee, both well built, and roofed with slate. Several Danish forts are to be seen in the western portion of the parish; at Calla is a small lake, in which is an island presenting appearances of fortifications and said to have been inhabitated by the sept of the Rowans; at Erbull are the ruins of an old castle; and there are ancient burial-places at Killasser, Blackpatch, and Calla.

KILLATHY, or KILLATTY, a parish, in the barony and union of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Fermoy, on the road from that place to Mallow, and on the river Blackwater; containing 1547 inhabitants. It comprises 3217 statute acres; the land to the north of the Blackwater is of good quality and chiefly in tillage, but that to the south consists chiefly of mountain pasture. Limestone is found on the northern, and brownstone on the southern, side of the river; and on the latter side are also indications of iron, which is supposed to have been formerly worked. The residence of Gurteen is situated on the south bank of the Blackwater, the scenery of which is here extremely interesting. Killathy is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, forming part of the union of Ballyhooly and corps of the prebend of Aghultie in the cathedral of Cloyne; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the tithe rent-charge is £225, which is equally divided between the vicars-choral and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Castletown-Roche. There are several ancient raths, or forts.

KILLAUGH.—See KILLAGH, county of MEATH.

KILLAUGHEY, or KILLAGHY, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of BALLYBOY, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2¾ miles (E.) from Ballyboy, and on the road from Tullamore to Roscrea; containing 4421 inhabitants. It comprises 18,132 statute acres, including nearly 1000 acres of bog and waste: of the cultivated land, about one-third is arable and two-thirds pasture. Here are two large flour-mills; and limestone is procured, chiefly for burning. The principal seats are, Annaghmore, Pallis Park, and Mount Pleasant; the two latter are beautifully situated on the banks of Lake Pallis. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, united from time immemorial to the vicarages of Ballyboy, Rahan, Lynally, Eglish, and Drumcullen, forming the union of Fircal, in the patronage of Sir C. Coote, Bart.: the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £139. 17., of which £90 are payable to the impropriator and the remainder to the vicar; the gross value of the benefice, tithes and glebe inclusive, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £2182. 9. 7. per annum. The church was built in 1817, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe-house, and the glebe of Killaughey comprises 659*a.* 3*r.* 36*p.*, valued at £637. 12. per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Frankford, and has a chapel at Mount Bolus.

KILLAVALLY, a village, in the parish of NEWTOWN, poor-law union of MULLINGAR, barony of MOYCASHEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER; containing 121 inhabitants.—See KILLEVALLY.

KILLAVENOGH, or CLONMORE, a parish, in the union of ROSCREA, barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Templemore, on the road from that place to Rathdowney; containing 3557 inhabitants. It comprises 8160 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of bog; and contains the residence of Dromard. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, forming part of the union of Templemore: the tithe rent-charge is £277. 18. 6., and there is a glebe of 36 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Templemore, and contains a chapel.

KILLAVONEY.—See KILROAN.

KILLAWILLIN, a village, in the parish of MONANIMY, poor-law union of MALLOW, barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 394 inhabitants.

KILLEA, a parish, in the union of LONDONDERRY, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Londonderry, on the road from that place to Lifford, and on the railway to Enniskillen; containing 959 inhabitants. According to the Orduance survey, it comprises 1869 statute acres, of which 1792 are applotted under the Tithe act; 80 acres are bog. Carrigans is a constabulary police station, and has a post under Londonderry. Dunmore House is the seat of R. M'Clintock, Esq. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £127. 10. The church is a small plain building, erected in 1765 by subscription and parochial assessment, and for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £273. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 26 acres; it was built in 1818, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £350 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Lagan.

KILLEA, a parish, in the union of THURLES, barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. W. by N.) from Templemore, on the road to Dunkerrin; containing 1526 inhabitants. This parish comprises 4773 statute acres, and is principally in pasture; it contains limestone and granite. Here is a constabulary police station. Killea is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, forming part of the union of Templemore: the tithe rent-charge is £166. 3., and the glebe comprises 8½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Templemore, and has a chapel at Killea. About 110 children are educated in a school under the National Board, and a second school has been opened by the incumbent with the aid of the Church Education Society. Here are some remains of the church, to which a burial-ground is attached.

KILLEA, a parish, in the barony of GAULTIER, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the sea-port and post-town of Dunmore, 2068 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3953 statute acres, and near its southern extremity is the fishing-village of Portala. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, episcopally united, in 1815, to that of Rathmoylan, and in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is impropriate in J. Kearney, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £202. 10., of which £110. 15. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the vicar is £163. 5. 6. The church was built in 1817, by aid of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. The glebe of the union comprises 6*a.* 27*p.*, and consists of a small plot in each parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killea is part of the district of Passage, and contains a chapel.—See DUNMORE.

KILLEAD, or KILLAGH, a parish, in the barony of LOWER MASSEREENE, union and county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4½ miles (S.) from Antrim, on the road to Lurgan; containing 6725 inhabitants. This extensive parish is for a distance of eight miles bounded on the west by Lough Neagh, and is divided into the districts of Upper and Lower Kilmakevit, and Upper and Lower Killelough; it comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 42,836½ statute acres, including 789¼ in the Grange of Carmavy, and 19,794½ in Lough Neagh. The land is mostly in a high state of cultivation, and there is neither bog nor waste; the whole surface is drained, fenced, and managed on the Scottish system: the principal crop is wheat, for which the soil is peculiarly adapted, and which was cultivated here with great success when scarcely known in any other part of the country. The farmhouses are large and well-built; they have excellent farmyards and homesteads attached to them, and, with the comfortable cottages of the peasantry, and the numerous orchards, gardens, plantations, and hedgerows, give to this district a rich and cheerful appearance. The principal gentlemen's seats are, Langford Lodge, the handsome mansion of Sir Hercules Pakenham; Glendarragh; Benneagh; Glenoak; and Tully House. The weaving of linen is carried on to some extent in various parts of the parish.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Earl of Massareene; the rectory is impropriate in J. Whitla, Esq., and nine others. The rectorial tithe rent-charge is £623. 9., and the vicarial £525. The church is a plain structure, nearly in the centre of the parish, erected about a century ago. The glebe-house is an elegant residence, erected in 1817 by the incumbent, at an expense of £1500, of which £100 were a gift and £1000 a loan from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises about ten acres. At Gortree, formerly a separate parish, but since the Reformation included in this parish, of which it is the principal burial-place, a very handsome church was erected in 1831, under the auspices of Sir H. Pakenham, aided by a loan of £900 from the Board of First Fruits: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £315 for its repair. At the entrance to the churchyard is a triumphal arch, erected in 1832, at the expense of the parishioners, in honour of Captain Armstrong, to whose memory it bears a long inscription. The church is endowed with £100 per annum by Sir H. Pakenham, the patron, who has built a residence for the chaplain; and serves as a chapel of ease to the parochial church. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Glenavy; the chapel, a small neat building, was erected in 1824. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly: to one of them, situated at Tully, is attached a very extensive burial-ground, in which is a costly monument, in the Grecian style, to the memory of S. Cunningham, Esq., of the island of St. Vincent's, a native of this parish. Of the numerous public schools, one at Ballyhill was built in 1809, by Mr. Johnson, by whom it is partly supported; one in the churchyard, built in 1802, is supported by the vicar; and one built by Sir H. Pakenham is supported by him and his lady, at whose expense, also, many of the children of both sexes are entirely clothed. Lady Massareene bequeathed £100, and Mr. Cunningham £200, to purchase land and divide the rents among the poor; a small farm in Ballygenniff was accordingly purchased, and is let for £16 per annum. There are numerous mounds and forts, some defended by a single and others by a double fosse; two of them have arched excavations. There are also several ruins of churches, and many relics of antiquity have been discovered in the neighbourhood. Clotworthy, Earl of Massareene, was interred in the parish church.

KILLEAGH, a post-town and parish, in the union of Midleton, barony of Imokilly, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 7 miles (W.) from Youghal, and 114 (S. W. by S.) from Dublin, on the road from Cork to Youghal; containing 2815 inhabitants, of whom 789 are in the town. A nunnery is said to have been founded in the 7th century, by St. Abban, near the spot now occupied by the parish church. The town consists of one regular street, comprising 125 houses, and is neatly built; it is a constabulary police station, and has a sub-post office to Cork, Youghal, and Castlemartyr. Fairs are held on Jan. 18th, June 13th, Aug. 11th, and Nov. 12th; a great quantity of live stock is sold. A court is held for the manor of Inchiquin, the jurisdiction of which extends over the parishes of Killeagh, Ardagh, Dangandonovan, and Clonpriest. The water of the small river Dissour, which passes by the town, is in high repute for its bleaching properties; and near a bridge that crosses the stream is a boulting-mill.

The parish comprises 5854 statute acres, of which a small quantity is bog, about 400 acres woodland, and the remainder arable or pasture land of good quality and well cultivated. Sea-sand and sea-weed are used as manure, and there is abundance of limestone, brownstone, and inferior slate. The principal seat is Ahadoe House, the residence of Sir Arthur de Capell Brooke, Bart., not more remarkable for its natural beauties than for its having remained in the same family more than 600 years, while nearly all the other estates in the south of Ireland have been confiscated. It was granted in 1172 to Philip de Capell, lineal ancestor of the present baronet, and is called by the peasantry "the Maiden Estate," to distinguish it from the numerous forfeited properties in its vicinity. From its elevated situation, the house commands views of the distant ocean; while the deep wood of Glenbower, one of the few remnants of the ancient forests, lies stretched below. This romantic glen, which is thought to be equal in beauty to the celebrated Wicklow Dargle, commences above the town of Killeagh, and winds upwards for some miles till it is lost in the mountains. Its precipitous sides are richly wooded; and the Dissour, which runs through it and forms a lovely lake, in winter dashes with the fury of a mountain torrent, fully justifying the name of Glaunbour, or "the Deafening Valley." The present house is about to be replaced by a castellated mansion, for which a site has been selected with great taste; and a fine new road, nearly a mile in length, through Glenbower, has been opened by the present baronet. This road, which passes over a deep ravine by means of a neat iron bridge, commands some delightful views, among which are the magnificent prospects from the Warren Hill, the Bathing-house Glen, the Foxes' Rock, and the Upper Cascade. In the grounds is a nux vesicaria, or bladder-nut tree; also an ancient sycamore of very large size. Drumdiah House, the seat of Roger Green Davis, Esq., consists of a centre and two wings, ornamented with Doric columns, and with a portico at the eastern end. This handsome mansion, which was completed in 1833, is near the summit of an eminence, from which a splendid prospect is obtained of the country extending to Youghal, with its fine bay, and of Capell Island. Here is also Mount Uniacke, the seat of Norman Uniacke, Esq., an ancient family mansion, situated among mountains which have been brought into cultivation; it is surrounded by a grove of trees, and commands extensive views of the sea and the vale of Imokilly.

The living is a rectory entire, within the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £730. 18. The church is a plain building with a square tower, at the extremity of the town; for the erection of which, a loan of £375 was granted by the Board of First Fruits in 1811. There is a spacious glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board, in 1809, gave £100 and lent £1000; the remainder of the cost of £1940 being supplied by the rector: the glebe comprises 16 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Dangandonovan and Ardagh, and part of Clonpriest; and containing two chapels, one at Killeagh, and the other at Inch, in Ardagh. There are two public schools, in which about 80 children are taught, and for one of which Sir A. de Capell Brooke erected a handsome school-house; also a Sunday school, and a dispensary. A castle, said to have been built by the Carews, formerly existed here, and was charged, in 1364, with an annuity to William Skiddy, mayor of Cork. Within the parish is a rock of red-clay formation, rising like a pyramid, and nearly covered with moss and plants; and some extraordinary caverns were explored in 1826 by Sir A. de Capell Brooke.

KILLEAGH, county of Meath.—See Killagh.

KILLEANY, county of Clare.—See Kilheny.

KILLEANY, or Killaney, a village, in the parish of Arranmore, barony of Arran, union and county of Galway, and province of Connaught, on the north-east side of the island of Arranmore; containing 604 inhabitants. It is a coast-guard station in the Galway district, and also a station for pilots. The inhabitants are generally fishermen, and have 39 hookers for fishing and carrying kelp to Galway: there is a small pier at the upper end of the bay.—See ARRAN ISLANDS.

KILLEANY, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY. —See KILLENY.

KILLEANY, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of STRADBALLY, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Stradbally, on the road from that place to Portarlington; containing 154 inhabitants, and comprising 946 statute acres. Petty-sessions for the district are held here irregularly. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £37. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Stradbally.

KILLEARY, a parish, in the union of ARDEE, barony of LOWER SLANE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Nobber, and on the road from Navan to Ardee; containing 2552 inhabitants. It comprises 6206 statute acres; and includes Parsonstown, the property of the Brinkley family. The living is partly a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Syddan; the rectory is in the patronage of the Crown and the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge amounts to £242. 4. 2., of which £159. 2. 8. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar, who has a glebe of 3*a*. 2*r*. 16*p*. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Lobinstown, comprising also the parishes of Syddan, Innismoth, and Mitchellstown, and containing chapels at Lobinstown and Heronstown.

KILLEBAN, or KILLABIN, a parish, partly in the barony of BALLYADAMS, but chiefly in that of SLIEUMARGUE, union of ATHY, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Athy, on the road from that place to Castlecomer; containing 12,939 inhabitants. It includes the villages of Arles, Ballylinan, and Ballickmoyler, which are separately described; and comprises 25,995 statute acres, generally fertile, and chiefly in pasture, with some bog and mountain. Limestone, flagstone, and sandstone are quarried, and at Newtown are extensive collieries: there are also collieries at the Rushes, Moudebeg, Towlerton, Cogeo, Hunt's Park, and other places. At Clonbrook is a large grist-mill. Fairs are held at Mayo on June 29th and Oct. 18th; also fairs at Ballickmoyler and Ballylinan. A manorial court is held at Newtown, once in two months; and petty-sessions at Ballickmoyler every Wednesday, and at Ballylinan on alternate Thursdays. There are police stations at Ballickmoyler, Ballylinan, Newtown, and Maidenhead; and dispensaries at Ballickmoyler and Newtown. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the gift of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £969. 4. 8. Here are two churches, one at Castletown and the other at Mayo, for the erection of which latter the Board of First Fruits, in 1813, gave £800; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £108 for the repairs of that at Castletown, and £172 for that at Mayo. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the districts of Killeban, Doonane, and Ballyadams; there are chapels at Ballylinan, Arles, Killeen, Mayo, and Doonane. The district of Killeban comprises a great part of the parishes of Killeban, Shrnel, and Grange; a new chapel was lately opened at Killeen, for which A. F. St. George, Esq., gave an acre of ground. About 400 children are educated in public schools, to which the rector subscribes; there are also six Sunday schools. St. Abban, in 650, founded a monastery here, in which he is said to have been interred; some remains exist of its church, and within the parish are also remains of the monastery of Clona, and of Kilgory and Ballylinan churches.

KILLEDAN, or KILLEDIN, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of GALLEN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Swinford, on the road from that place to Ballagh; containing 6410 inhabitants. Some of the land is very good and well cultivated, but there are large tracts of bog; the total area is 14,515 statute acres. A market on Thursday has been established at the village of Cultymough, or Newtown-Brown. The principal seats are Ballinamore, Killedan, Anna Hill, and Oxford. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Straid, or Templemore; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of R. Palmer, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £308. 13. 6., which is equally divided between the impropriators and the vicar. The church is a neat building, erected at Ballinamore by the Ormsby family, in 1780. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel. Here was a friary of conventual Franciscans.

KILLEDMUND, a village, in the parish of KILTENNEL, barony of IBRONE EAST, union of ENNISCORTHY, county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Bagnalstown to Enniscorthy; containing 154 inhabitants. This place being situated at the western foot of Mount Leinster, includes within its scenery the Blackstairs mountains and Scullogh Gap: during the disturbances of 1798 it was burnt by the insurgents. It contains the parish church and school; and has fairs on March 12th and July 15th.

KILLEEDY, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, barony of GLENQUIN, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Newcastle, on the road from that place to Newmarket; containing 6341 inhabitants. The castle of Glenqnin here, which gives name to the barony, was built by an Irish chieftain of the O'Hallinans, in 1462, but was soon afterwards seized by the O'Briens, who retained possession for some years, when it was seized by the O'Hanlons, who in their turn were expelled by the Geraldines, by whom it was forfeited in the Desmond rebellion; it was ultimately dismantled by Captain Raleigh. This castle was granted to Sir W. Courtney in 1591, together with the castle of Killeedy, which had been erected by the Knights Templars and had afterwards belonged to the earls of Desmond. At Strand, near Glenquin, the Knights Templars erected Temple-Stran, in 1291; and the castle of Cleanlis, or Castle English, a strong fortress, the owner of which enjoyed peculiar privileges, was also in this parish. It comprises 25,456 statute acres, of which 9059 are applotted under the Tithe act, and the remainder is mountain and bog: the mountains contain coal, ironstone, and limestone. At Hernsbrook is a very neat residence. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, forming the corps of the prebend of Killeedy in the cathedral of Limerick, and is in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £361. 19. The church and glebe-house were destroyed by the Rock-ites in 1822, and have not been rebuilt: the glebe comprises 27 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killeeny is the head of a district, called Ashford, comprising also a small part of Monegay; the chapel is a large plain building, at Ashford.

KILLEEK, or KILLAUGH, a parish, in the union of BALROTHERY, barony of NETHERCROSS, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (W.) from Swords, and on the road from Dublin to the Naul; containing 185 inhabitants, and 807 statute acres. It is a curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Swords. The rectory is appropriate to the economy estate of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin; the tithe rent-charge is £126. 2. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Finglas and St. Margaret's. Near New Place are the extensive ruins of a magnificent mansion; and there are some remains of the church.

KILLEELY.—See KILLILY and KILLELY.

KILLEEN, or NEW ARRAN, a village, in the parish of DROMACOO, barony of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (N. E.) from Kinvarra, on the road from that place to Galway; containing, in 1831, 360, and in 1836, 600 inhabitants. It is on the bay of Galway, and has a pier.

KILLEEN, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of SKREEN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2¼ miles (N. by W.) from Dunshaughlin, and on the road from Dublin to Athboy; containing 580 inhabitants. An abbey is said to have been founded here in the 16th century, by St. Endeus; and also a nunnery, of which his sister St. Fanchea was abbess. The barony came into the family of Plunkett by the marriage of Sir Christopher Plunkett, in 1403, with the only daughter and heiress of Sir Lucas Cusac; and Lucas, the tenth lord, was created Earl of Fingall by James I., in 1628. The parish comprises 3346½ statute acres: about one-third is under tillage, and the remainder meadow and pasture of excellent quality; the system of agriculture is greatly improved, and there is neither waste land nor bog. Here are several quarries of black limestone. Killeen Castle, the seat of the Earl of Fingall, was originally a stately structure, erected by Hugh de Lacy, in 1180, and has been enlarged and improved after a design by Johnston, in which the style of its ancient architecture has been retained with fine effect; the demesne comprises more than 840 statute acres, and is tastefully laid out and embellished. The parish is in the diocese of Meath: the rectory is impropriate in P. P. Metge, of Athlumney, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Taragh; the tithe rent-charge is £153, two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar. The church, near the castle, is a very interesting structure, erected by Sir Christopher Plunkett, who died in 1445; the east window is of lofty dimensions, and of very elegant design. Among the ancient monuments are those of the founder and his wife; of Robert Cusac, who died in 1620; and of John Quartermas (who roofed the church) and his wife, dated 1507. The church formerly contained a chantry and a guild of the Blessed Virgin. The glebe comprises 57 acres of good land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Dunsany, or Kilmessan.

KILLEEN, a parish, in the union of DURROW, barony of UPPER OSSORY, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Durrow, on the road from that place to Kilkenny; containing about 632 inhabitants. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Aughamacart, with which parish the tithes are returned: the rectory is impropriate in the family of Fitzpatrick. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Durrow. Here are the ruins of Ballykaly Castle.

KILLEENADEEMA, or KILNADEEMA, a parish, in the union and barony of LOUGHREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Loughrea; containing 3754 inhabitants. This parish comprises a considerable portion of the Derrybrian mountains, and contains 24,504 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, with the greater portion of the rectory united, together forming part of the union of Loughrea; the remainder of the rectory is appropriate to the deanery of Clonfert: the tithe rent-charge is £115. 8., of which £9. 14. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Kilteskill, and containing chapels at Kildeema, Derrybrian, and Ayle.

KILLEENASLEENA, a parish, in the barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 220 inhabitants, and comprising 730 statute acres. It is wholly impropriate, and a stipend is paid to a neighbouring clergyman for the performance of the occasional duties. The tithe rent-charge is £26. 5.

KILLEENAVARRA.—See KILLUNAVARRA.

KILLEENEY, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of KILTARTAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Gort, near the road from that place to Kinvarra; containing 1165 inhabitants, and 6117 statute acres. The land is very coarse and rocky, and the only seat is Normangrove. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Kilcolgan; the rectory is appropriate to the see, the deanery, and the vicarage of Ardrahan. The tithe rent-charge is £73. 10. 4., of which £15. 15. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £5. 10. 3. to the dean, £31. 10. to the incumbent of Ardrahan, and the remainder to the vicar. There are some remains of the church, with a small burial-ground attached. About a mile from Kinvarra is a hole in the rock, called the Pigeon Hole, which leads to a natural cavern, three or four hundred feet in extent. In the parish are also the remains of the castle of Cahir Irlane, said to have belonged to the Killikellys.

KILLEENOUGH.—See KILLENORTY.

KILLEEVAN, a parish, in the union of CLONES, barony of DARTRY, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, on the river Fin, and on the road from Clones to Dublin; containing, with the post-town of Newbliss, 8417 inhabitants, of whom about 87 are in the village. This parish comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 11,571¾ statute acres, of which 11,314¾ are in Dartry (including a detached portion of 127½ acres, and 55¾ under water) and 257 in the barony of Monaghan: of the whole, 9329 are applotted under the Tithe act. The land is principally under tillage, the soil fertile, and the system of agriculture improved: there are several detached portions of bog. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £389. 4. 6. The church is a neat plain structure, built in 1794, and enlarged in 1812 by a gift of £100 and a loan of £300 from the late Board of First Fruits: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £142 for repairs. The glebe-house was erected in 1812, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the late Board; the glebe comprises 64 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a union, comprising also the parish of Aughabog, and containing two chapels; the chapel of this parish, on the townland of Killafuddy, is a neat edifice, erected in 1817.—See Newbliss.

KILLEGLAND, or Killeylan, also called Kilmeglan, a parish, in the union of Dunshaughlin, barony of Ratoath, county of Meath, and province of Leinster; containing 411 inhabitants, who are nearly all in the post-town of Ashbourne. The parish consists of 716 statute acres; and is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Ratoath: the tithe rent-charge is £40. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions also it is part of the union or district of Ratoath, and has a chapel at Ashbourne.

KILLEGNEY, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Bantry, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (S. W.) from Enniscorthy; on the river Boro, and near the high road to New Ross; containing 1763 inhabitants. It comprises 6686 statute acres, chiefly under tillage; the soil is mostly light and poor, but the system of agriculture is greatly improved, and drill husbandry is in general use. Castle Boro, the spacious modern mansion of Lord Carew, is built on the site of an ancient castle belonging to that family, of whom the present lord was created a peer of Ireland in 1834, and of the United Kingdom in 1838. The house is beautifully situated on the bank of the picturesque river Boro, which, after winding through the richly wooded demesne, discharges itself into the Slaney about two miles below Enniscorthy; and the grounds, which are tastefully disposed, comprehend some beautiful scenery, in which the spire of the church, rising above the neighbouring groves, forms a pleasing feature. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, episcopally united, in 1798, to the impropriate curacy of Chapple, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £228. 9. 3. The church, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £900, in 1827, is a neat edifice, and an elegant spire was added to it some years ago at the expense of the present Lord Carew; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £106 for its repair. The glebe-house is a neat residence, in Chapple parish, erected in 1831, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £200 from the late Board; the glebe comprises 16 acres, subject to a rent of £13. 16. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Templeudigan; the chapel is at Poolpeasty. The Rev. James Gordon, author of an Abridgment of Irish History, the History of the Rebellion in 1798, and various other works, was for many years rector.

KILLEHENY, or Killahinny, a parish, in the union of Listowel, barony of Iraghticonnor, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 11 miles (S. W. by W.) from Tarbert, and on the south-eastern shore of the estuary of the Shannon; containing 3050 inhabitants. It comprises 4654 statute acres, about one-third of which is arable land of good quality; the remainder is coarse mountain pasture, with a great quantity of bog. Agriculture is improving; sea-weed and sea-sand are used as manures, and limestone is abundant. Fine salmon and trout are taken in the river Cashen. There is a telegraph on Knockanore mountain. Spraymount is the residence of Captain W. Raymond, and the other seats are those of Captain Hewson, and C. Julian, Esq.: in the grounds of the latter, some skeletons in stone graves were discovered in 1829. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, forming part of the union of Aghavallin; the rectory is impropriate in A. Stoughton, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £93. 9., two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Lisseltin, and has a chapel at Ballybunnian. Here are the celebrated caverns of Ballybunnian, which are described under the head of that place.

KILLEIGH, a village and chapelry, and formerly a post-town, in that part of the parish of Geashill which is in the barony of Geashill, union of Tullamore, King's county, and province of Leinster, 9¾ miles (N. W.) from Portarlington, and on the road from Dublin to Birr; containing 262 inhabitants. An abbey was founded here in the 6th century, which existed till the Dissolution, and in 1578 was granted, with its possessions, to Gerald, Earl of Kildare. A nunnery was founded by the Warren family in the 12th century, for nuns of the order of St. Augustine; and a monastery for Grey friars was established here in the reign of Edward I., which was granted to John Allee, at the Reformation. The village contains 52 houses and a brewery and malting-house, and is a constabulary police station: fairs are held on July 1st and Oct. 17th. Killeigh is a chapelry in the diocese of Kildare, annexed to the benefice of Geashill, and has a large ancient chapel, partly rebuilt in 1830, at a cost of £600, raised by parochial assessment. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is in the district of Ballycane, or Geashill, and has a spacious chapel. Some remains exist of one of the religious houses, close to which is the entrance to a cave; and there are also some remains of a rath that formerly surrounded the village.—See Geashill.

KILLEIGHY.—See Ballykeane.

KILLEILAGH, a parish, in the barony of Corcomroe, union of Limerick, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 6¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ennistymon, and on the road from Ballyvaughan to Ballyaline; containing 3904 inhabitants. This parish comprises 12,357 statute acres, a large part of which consists of mountain pasture and bog: slate of inferior quality is found at Donagore. Ballyaline bay is well situated for fishing, and has a coast-guard station, included in the Miltown-Malbay district; there is a constabulary police station at Knockfin. Off the coast is Innishere, one of the Arran Isles, between which and the main land is the South sound, or entrance to Galway bay. The principal seats are, Doolen; Arranview, commanding, as its name implies, a fine view of the Arran Isles and the coast of Galway; and Ballyaline; besides which there are several other respectable residences. Killeilagh is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, forming part of the union of Kilmanaheen; the rectory is united to those of Kilmoon and Carrune.

The tithe rent-charge is £166. 3., two-thirds payable to the rector, and one-third to the vicar. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Arranview, or Tuoclea, and has a chapel at Knockfin. At Glassie, and Donagore, are the ruins of the castles respectively so called, the latter being a circular tower on a square base; and at Ballynalacken, on a rocky eminence near the sea, stands the castle of that name, which has been repaired by J. O'Brien, Esq., its proprietor. Boetius Clancy, a celebrated chieftain, formerly resided at St. Catherine's, and a mound of earth is still shewn as the spot where his castle once stood.

KILLEINY, or KILLINEY, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 12½ miles (W. by S.) from Tralee; containing 3481 inhabitants, of whom 197 are in the village. It includes the low sandy peninsula of Magharee, which separates the bay of Tralee from that of Brandon; and off the northern extremity of the peninsula are the small isles called the Magharees, or "Seven Hogs," which abound with limestone, and where kelp is still made, but not to its former extent. To the west of Castle-Gregory is a small lake, which might be easily drained; and an embankment or pier would be of great benefit. The parish comprises 14,956 statute acres, including a considerable tract of mountain and bog: the arable land, which is generally manured with sea-weed, is extremely fertile, and particularly noted for producing wheat of a superior quality. Stone for building abounds, and limestone is found near the glebe. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £324. 14. The church is a small plain structure, for the building of which the Board of First Fruits gave £800, in 1812, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £159 for its repair. There is no glebe-house: the glebe is merged in the bishop's farm of Killeiny, but the tenant pays £16 per annum to the rector. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Castle-Gregory, which comprises the parishes of Killeiny, North Cloghane, Stradbally, and Ballyduff, and has chapels at Castle Gregory and North Cloghane. The ruins of the old church adjoin the present edifice; and at Killeton are vestiges of an ancient burial-ground.—See CASTLE-GREGORY.

KILLELAGH, or KILLELA, a parish, in the union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Maghera; containing 3258 inhabitants. This parish comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 10,270 statute acres, of which more than half is good mountain pasture and the remainder under tillage: the substratum is basalt, and the soil generally thin and cold, but the lands have been lately improved by a judicious use of lime; there is a sufficient tract of turbary for fuel, but no waste land. On the eastern boundary is Carntogher mountain, rising 1521 feet above the level of the sea. In the mountain district the inhabitants are principally native Irish, and in the plains, of Scottish extraction. Five townlands are in the manor of Maghera, and belong to the see of Derry; three, in the manor of Kilrea, belong to the Mercers' Company; and four, in the manor of Bellaghy, to the Vintners' Company, of London. The parish was formerly united to Maghera, but in 1794 was separated from it, and now forms a distinct benefice. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £148. 8. 4. The church is a small plain edifice without tower or spire, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £500 in 1808, and in 1810 £100 were given towards the erection of the glebe-house; the glebe comprises 27·2 acres, constituting part of the townland of Gortinure, and of which 12·0 acres are under cultivation. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Maghera; the chapel is a spacious and handsome building with a tower, lately erected. In the townland of Tirnony is a cromlech, and near it are the ruins of a very ancient church, which was destroyed in the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone, and subsequently rebuilt.

KILLELAN, a parish, in the union of BALTINGLASS, barony of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N.) from Castledermot, and on the confines of the county of Wicklow and Dublin; containing 1764 inhabitants. It comprises 7378¾ statute acres: the greater portion of the land is good, and the system of agriculture improved; a considerable tract of bog has been brought into cultivation by R. Archbold, Esq.; and there is little waste or unprofitable land. The surface is varied, and the scenery in some parts picturesque. Davidstown, in the parish, is a handsome mansion, situated in an extensive and finely planted demesne, above which rises Hughstown hill. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, consisting of the seven denominations of Bolton, Simonstown, Newtown, Commonstown, Collin, Colerake, and Hughstown, and formerly constituting part of the union of Timolin, from which it has been separated and formed into a distinct benefice, in the patronage of Sir R. Steele, Bart., in whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge is £247. 10., two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar: there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castledermot. There are some slight remains of the old church, and also of an hospital formerly belonging to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, consisting of a square tower.

KILLELONEHAN, a parish, partly in the barony of COSHMA, but chiefly in that of PUBBLEBRIEN, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, on the road from Limerick to Croom; containing, with part of the town of Patrick's-Well, 982 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2069 statute acres; the land is in general of good quality, resting on a substratum of limestone, and the system of agriculture is much improved. The surrounding scenery is enlivened by several good houses and well-planted demesnes: the principal are Fort Etna and Attyflin. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, and forms part of the corps of the prebend of St. Munchin in the cathedral of Limerick: the tithe rent-charge is £93. 9. 3. The church was destroyed in the war of 1641, and is now in ruins; the members of the Establishment attend that of Kilpeacon. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 5½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Loughmore. Here are some remains of a castle built by Dermot O'Hurley, in the 15th century.

KILLELY, Killeely, or Killegally, a parish, in the poor-law union of Limerick, partly in the barony of Pubblebrien, county of Limerick, partly within the north liberties of the city of Limerick, but chiefly in the barony of Lower Bunratty, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 3 miles (N. W.) from Limerick; on the mail-road to Ennis, and on the river Shannon; containing 5065 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Meelick, comprises 6607 statute acres; almost equally divided between tillage and pasture. It extends nearly to the old Thomond-bridge, at Limerick; and includes the extensive distillery of Messrs. Brown, Stein, and Co. Limestone abounds and is used for manure, and there is some bog near the Shannon. There are stations of the constabulary police at Cratloe, Meelick, and Thomond-gate. Cratloe Woods, a highly improved and beautiful seat, is the residence of Augustus Stafford O'Brien, Esq.; the demesne and wood are chiefly in this parish, but extend into the adjoining parish of Kilfentinan. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent charge is £210. 16. 6. The church, a small plain structure, picturesquely situated at Meelick, was built in 1735, by Mr. Burton, ancestor of the Marquess of Conyngham, and subsequently made parochial; it has undergone a thorough repair, a grant of £220 having been made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for that purpose. The communion-plate was presented by the Conyngham family. The glebe-house, built in 1779 by the then incumbent, an excellent mansion commanding a beautiful view of the Shannon, stands on a glebe of 12 acres; it has been much improved by the present rector, who has made new approaches to it. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly in the district of Meelick, and partly in that of Thomond-gate, or St. Lelia. Of five schools, one, at Cratloe, is supported by Mr. O'Brien; and about one mile south-east from Cratloe Cross is the Cratloe and Meelick public dispensary.

KILLELY, Killeely, or Killila, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Ballaghkeen, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Oulart, and on the coast-road from Wexford to Dublin; containing 770 inhabitants. It comprises $1810\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, and contains two quarries of good building-stone of a slaty kind; also limestone-gravel and marl. A fair is held at Croshue on January 1st, and fairs at Blackwater on March 25th, Corpus-Christi, 10th August, and 11th November. Castle Talbot, the seat of the ancient family of Talbot, is now occupied by a tenant of William Talbot, Esq. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and is an impropriate curacy, forming part of the union of Castle-Ellis; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth: the tithe rent-charge is £63. 18. 6., of which £34. 3. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the perpetual curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killely forms part of the liberty of Blackwater, which includes this parish and Ballyvalloo, and has a chapel there. Some remains exist of the church, and of a Danish rath.—See the article upon Blackwater.

KILLEMLAGH, or Killemilagh, a parish, in the union of Cahirciveen, barony of Iveragh, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 8 miles (S. W.) from Cahirciveen; containing 2728 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 11,857 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of mountain and bog, is situated on the western coast, and on the south-eastern side of the harbour of Valentia. Its southern extremity forms Bolus Head, which is on the north-west side of the entrance to the bay of Ballinaskelligs. Puffin Island, so called from its being much frequented by puffins, and which also abounds with rabbits, is steep and craggy, with a remarkable gap in its highest part: the Skellig Islands also lie off this parish, and are separately described. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in fishing, and in the collection of sea-weed for manure. At Portmagee is a coast guard station, in the district of Valencia, and petty-sessions are held there once in three weeks. The principal seats are Belville, Waterview, Kilkevaragh, and Ahadda. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, forming part of the corps of the treasurership of Ardfert: the tithe rent-charge is £76. 3., and there is a glebe at Kerl. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Prior, and has a chapel at Portmagee and Kerl. The ruins of the church, which was dedicated to St. Finian, are at the bottom of the bay of Ballinaskelligs, which is so much exposed to a heavy sea that the only landing-place is in a small creek to the north. Here are some chalybeate springs.

KILLENAGH, a parish, in the union of Gorey, barony of Ballaghkeen, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Gorey; containing 736 inhabitants. This parish is on the eastern coast, and comprises $3232\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, which are almost exclusively under tillage. It is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Ardamine: the rectory is impropriate in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., who receives the whole of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £108. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of River-chapel or Ballygarret. A dispensary was established in 1829.

KILLENAULE, a small market and post town, and a parish, in the union of Cashel, barony of Slievardagh, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Fethard, and 84 (S. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Cashel to Callan; containing 3755 inhabitants, of whom 1786 are in the town. The parish comprises 7711 statute acres, and furnishes limestone, flagstone, potters'-clay, iron-ore, and slate fit for making pencils: its large collieries are described in the article on the county, which see. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town, where there is a weekly market; and fairs are held on the first Thursday (O. S.) in May and October, Jan. 1st, March 25th, June 24th, and Aug. 14th. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, united to the rectories and vicarages of Cooleagh, Magowry, Drangan, Isertkeran, and Barrettsgrange, and the rectory of St. Johnstown, forming the union of Killenaule, in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is appropriate to the chancellorship of the cathedral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £225, two-thirds payable to the chancellor, and one-third to the vicar; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £711. 15. The church is a small building, erected by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at an expense of £689. The glebe-house, in Cooleagh parish, was built in 1773, by the then incumbent, at a cost of £500; the five glebes in the union consist of 44 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, and has a chapel. Here are the remains of Gralla and Graystone Castles.

KILLENCARE, or KILLENKERE, a parish, in the union of BAILIEBOROUGH, partly in the barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, but chiefly in that of CASTLERAGHAN, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Bailieborough, on the road to Virginia; containing 8126 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Killinskere, comprises 15,962¼ statute acres; 131¼ are water, and there is some bog. The lands are principally arable, and in a tolerable state of cultivation, producing abundant crops. Slate is found here, but of very inferior quality, and the quarries formerly worked have in consequence been discontinued: an ore supposed to be zinc has been discovered on the townland of Durryham, but it has not been yet worked. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Richard, Earl of Westmeath: the vicarial tithe rentcharge is £360. The church, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted £900 as a gift, and £1200 as a loan, in 1817, is a very neat structure. The same Board, in 1816, gave £325 and lent £1050 towards the erection of the glebe-house, which is a handsome residence; the glebe comprises 331 acres of profitable land, with about 47 acres of bog. The perpetual cure of Mullough, or Mullagh, forms part of this parish, and the incumbent is allowed £55 per annum by the vicar; part, also, of Killencare has lately been added to the district of Billeses, to the incumbent of which curacy the vicar pays £45 per annum: the patronage of the former is in the vicar of Killencare, who is, with the vicars of Lavay and Lurgan, likewise patron of Billeses. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel here is a plain building, and there is also one at Clanaphillip. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians, in connexion with the General Assembly. Of two schools, one is supported by Lord Farnham. Here are numerous mineral springs, some of which are used medicinally.

KILLENELLICK.—See GALBALLY, in the county of LIMERICK.

KILLENEMOR, a parish, in the union and barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Mitchelstown; containing 211 inhabitants. This small parish consists of only one townland, comprising 414 statute acres, and for all civil purposes has merged into the parish of Glanworth. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and forms the corps of the prebend of Killenemor in the cathedral of Cloyne, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rentcharge is £30, and forms part of the economy fund of the cathedral. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Glenworth.

KILLENNY.—See KILLEANY.

KILLENORTY, or KILLENOUGHT, a parish, partly in the barony of COSHMA, but chiefly in the barony of PUBBLEBRIEN, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Patrick's-Well, and on the road from Croom to Limerick; containing 420 inhabitants. The parish comprises 858 statute acres; the soil is generally good, and is based on limestone. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, forming part of the bishop's mensal. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is part of the district of Loughmore.

KILLENTIERNA, a parish, in the union of KILLARNEY, partly in the barony of MAGONIHY, but chiefly in the barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Castleisland, on the road to Killarney; containing 3106 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Brown Flesk, comprises 10,231 statute acres. The soil is light and gravelly; limestone, which abounds, is used for manure, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving: there are several patches of bog. Dicksgrove, the finely wooded demesne of the Meredith family, is in this parish. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, united to that of Dysert, together constituting the union of Killentierna, in the patronage of the Proprietors of the Seigniory of Castleisland: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £212. 10. 6., and of the whole union £342. 15.; there is a glebe of 35 acres, subject to a rent of £50 late currency. The church is a small plain building with a square tower, erected in 1814, by a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits. An excellent glebe-house was built by the incumbent in 1840. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Currens, or Killentierna: the chapel is near the latter village. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILLENUMERY, a parish, in the union of MANOR-HAMILTON, barony of DROMAHAIRE, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Dromahaire, on the road from that place to Sligo; containing 4605 inhabitants. It comprises 14,086½ statute acres, principally under tillage, with a considerable quantity of mountain land and bog. Coal and iron ore exist here, but have not been worked, and limestone is plentiful; crystal-spar, or Irish diamond, is found at Cashel. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, episcopally united to the vicarage of Killery, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in R. Baker, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £165, of which £52. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross value of the vicarial union, including tithe and glebe, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £578. 9. 2. The church is a neat building, erected in 1822 by aid of a loan of £1000 from the late Board of First Fruits; there is a chapel of ease at Killery. The same Board, in 1812, gave £350 and lent £450 for the erection of the glebe-house: the glebe comprises 521 acres, a part of which is mountain land and bog. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Killery, and has a chapel at Ballinagar. The abbey of Creevlea, described in the article on Dromohaire, is in this parish.

KILLENVOY, a parish, in the barony of ATHLONE, union and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CON-

NAUGHT, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Athlone, on the road from that place to Roscommon; containing 2388 inhabitants. It comprises 6554½ statute acres, and contains a small quantity of bog; there is an abundance of excellent limestone. The principal seats are Scregg, Kellybrook, Churchboro, Bondville, and Mount-Plunket, the last a handsome building situated on Lough Ree. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, episcopally united to the vicarages of Kilmean, Portcrin, Ivernoon or St. John's, and Raharrow, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Incorporated Society. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £97. 10., which is equally divided between the impropriators and the vicar; and the tithe rent-charge of the whole vicarial benefice is £170. 7. The church, a neat edifice, was built by aid of a loan of £1500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1822; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £133 for its repair. The glebe-house was built in 1825, by a gift and loan, each of £400, from the Board: the glebe consists of 28*a.* 3*r.* 9*p.*, paying 18*s.* 4*d.* per acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of St. John's, and contains a chapel at Culleen. About 100 children are educated in a school under the Church Education Society, and 100 more in two other schools. Numerous skeletons have been dug up.

KILLENY, or KILLEANY, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S.) from Headford, on the road to Lough Corrib; containing 1772 inhabitants. It comprises 5711½ statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Headford: the tithe rent-charge is £111. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions the pârish is part of the district of Headford; the chapel is a small thatched edifice.

KILLERERAN, a parish, in the union of TUAM, partly in the baronies of BALLYMOE, and DUNMORE and TYAQUIN, but chiefly in that of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the post-town of Dangan, 4782 inhabitants. It comprises 14,535 statute acres, and includes about 800 acres of waste and a tract of bog, both reclaimable. The principal seats are Brook Lodge, Hillsbrook, and Castle Moyle. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, united by act of council, in 1792, to the rectory and vicarage of Knockmoy, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £256. 2. 6., and of the whole union £421. 2. 6. The church is a plain neat structure, erected in 1823, by aid of a gift of £500 and a loan of £500 from the late Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1800, at a cost exceeding £700, chiefly paid by the then incumbent; the glebe consists of 40 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel. There are two schools; one in connexion with the National Board, and the other with the Church Education Society. The ruins of the castle of Barna and several raths are here.

KILLERICK, or KILLERRIG, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (E. by N.) from Carlow, and on the river Slaney; containing, with part of the suburbs of the post-town of Tallow, 860 inhabitants. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded here in the reign of King John, by Gilbert de Bocard, which, at the suppression of that order, was granted to the Knights Hospitallers, and, at the general dissolution, to Sir Gerard Aylmer. In 1331, the Irish burnt the church, with the priest and eighty persons who had assembled in it; the Pope ordered the Archbishop of Dublin to excommunicate all the persons engaged in the perpetration of this atrocious act, and to lay their lands under an interdict. The parish comprises 5318¾ statute acres, which, with the exception of about 100 acres, are good arable and pasture land: the principal seats are Duckett's Grove and Russell's-town Park. It is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Leighlin, forming part of the union of Urglin: the rectory is impropriate in Messrs. Humphreys and Bunbury, who receive the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £270, out of which £15. 15. are paid to the curate. At Friarstown are the ruins of a castle and of a religious establishment.

KILLERMOGH, or KILDERMOY, a parish, in the union of ABBEYLEIX, barony of CLARMALLAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 1¾ mile (N. by W.) from Durrow, on the road from that place to Roscrea; containing 1114 inhabitants. It comprises 2765 statute acres, of which about 250 are waste and bog; the remainder is arable and pasture land. Limestone is obtained for building and burning. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the family of Fitzpatrick: the tithe rent-charge is £105. 16. The church, a neat building, but not in good repair, was erected in 1809, by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, which also contributed, in 1829, to the building of the glebe-house: the glebe comprises 306*a.* 2*r.* 23*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Aghavoe. St. Columb is said to have founded an abbey here in 558.

KILLERORAN.—See KILLARARAN.

KILLERSHERDINY, or KILDRUMSHERDAN, a parish, in the union of COOTEHILL, barony of TULLAGHGARVEY, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Cootehill, on the road to Cavan; containing 10,208 inhabitants. It is also called Kilsherdany, and comprises 16,618½ statute acres, of which about 4860 are arable, 8940 are meadow and pasture, 320 woodland, 107½ water, and the remainder bog; the system of agriculture is improved. There are quarries of common whinstone, which is raised for building, and for repairing the roads: a lead-mine was formerly worked by the Irish Mining Company, but, being found unprofitable, has been discontinued. A remnant of the linen manufacture is still carried on in the parish, and there are several corn-mills. Charters are extant for four annual fairs, but one only is held, in the village of Tullyvin, on the 4th of May, for cattle: in that village is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Cootehill and Stradone. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Richard, Earl of Westmeath: the tithe rent-charge is £360, of which £172. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church was built in 1795, by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits; it has been in a dilapidated state for some years, and has been condemned. The glebe-house was built in 1816, by a gift from the same Board of £100, and a loan of £1125; the glebe comprises 285 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel was built in 1825, at an expense of £700. Nearly 500 children are taught in four public schools: the parochial schools are supported by the vicar; and one at Tullyvin is endowed with £50 per annum late currency, and a house for the master. There are several forts in the parish, supposed by some to be Danish, but by others to have been raised by the native Irish as a defence against those invaders; and on the several hills on which they are situated, ancient coins have been found. In the demesne of Tullyvin is a vault, in which are 23 coffins, containing the remains of deceased members of the families of Moore and Boyle; on the townland of Curravilla is a chalybeate spring, now in disuse.

KILLERY, a parish, in the barony of TIRAGHRILL, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. W.) from Dromahaire, on the road from that place to Collooney, and on Lough Gill; containing 3298 inhabitants. It comprises 9094½ statute acres; the land is of good quality, principally under tillage, and there is some bog and excellent limestone. Fairs are held at Ballintogher on Jan. 22nd, June 8th, July 28th, Oct. 17th, and Dec. 8th; and a manorial court is held there occasionally. Oldcastle, the seat of the Neynoe family, was erected on the site of the old castle of Kingsfort; near it is a strong chalybeate spa. Killery is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, united to that of Killenumery; the rectory is impropriate in M. Baker, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £72. 14., one-third payable to the impropriator, and two-thirds to the vicar. The church is a plain building, erected in 1715. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killenumery, and has a chapel at Ballintobber. There are some remains of the old church of Killery, with a large burial-ground; and of an ancient castle at Drumcondra.

KILLESANDRA, a market and post town, and a parish, in the barony of TULLOGHONOHO, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 9 miles (W.) from Cavan, and 64 (N. W.) from Dublin, on the road to Ballinamore; containing, with the district parish of Arvagh, 12,552 inhabitants, of whom 1085 are in the town. This town, which is situated near the river Croghan and contains 207 houses, is neatly built, and has a cheerful and thriving appearance. The linen manufacture, which is carried on extensively in the neighbourhood, has contributed greatly to its prosperity; and, upon an average, coarse linens are sold in its market to the amount of £1500 weekly. The market is on Wednesday, and is abundantly supplied with provisions; fairs are held on Jan. 28th, March 28th, May 9th, June 22nd, July 15th, the second Wednesday in August (O. S.), Sept. 28th, and Nov. 8th. The market-house is a very neat and well-arranged building. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town; a manorial court is held occasionally, and petty-sessions every alternate Thursday. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Drogheda.

The parish comprises 22,241 statute acres; 500 are woodland, and 1212 water, of which latter 74 are in Lough Oughtee. The surface is boldly undulating, and, in the southern part, rises into mountainous elevations, above which Bruce Hill is pre-eminent; not far from the town is the steep mountain of Corhill. The lands are chiefly under tillage, and the soil is tolerably fertile, but the system of agriculture is very indifferent; there is a large extent of bog. Freestone is quarried for building; and in several parts are indications of coal, but no attempt has been yet made to work it. The river Croghan, in the lower part of the parish, winds through a delightful tract of country into the magnificent lakes of Killesandra. Adjoining the town is Castle-Hamilton, a spacious mansion surrounded by an extensive and highly embellished demesne. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £495. The parochial church, a very ancient structure, in a state of dilapidation, has been rebuilt at a cost of £1853, of which £1568 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission. The glebe-house has a glebe of 537 acres attached to it, but situated in another part of the parish. There is a chapel of ease at Derrylane, built in 1833, by aid of a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, and £100 from Lord Farnham. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with the ancient parish of Killesandra: there are two chapels, situated in the town and at Corronee; also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists in the town. Mrs. Jackson bequeathed £10 per annum to be divided by the rector among ten poor housekeepers. There are numerous raths in the parish. Dr. Hales, author of a work on chronology, and other scientific works, was rector of this parish.

KILLESHER, a parish, in the union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of GLENAWLEY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER; containing 5225 inhabitants. According to the Ordnance survey it comprises, with certain islands in Lower Lough M'Nean, 24,936¼ statute acres, of which 24½ are in Lough Erne and small loughs, and 642½ are in Lower Lough M'Nean: there is a considerable quantity of bog and mountain land. Fairs are held at Whitehill on May 13th, July 13th, Sept. 11th, and Nov. 11th. Florence Court, the beautiful mansion of the Earl of Enniskillen, stands in a large and finely planted demesne: near it is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Enniskillen. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £150. The church is a tolerably large building, repaired in 1819, by aid of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. There is no glebe-house: the glebe comprises 1300 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel at Whitehill, and one at the Crossroads: there are also two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. About 460 children are educated in six schools, of which three are supported by the Earl of Enniskillen, who also aids a fourth; and there are two Sunday schools. Here are some mineral springs and remarkable caves; also the ruins of the old church.

KILLESHILL, or KILLESHAL, a parish, in the union and barony of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S. W.) from Dungannon, on the road from that place to Ballygawley; containing 4985 inhabitants. This parish was formed by order of council in 1732, by separating 27 townlands from the parish of Carrenteel, and Archbishop Robinson endowed the living with the townland of Glencal for a glebe, which was eventually exchanged for the present glebe adjoining the church. The parish comprises 9839½ statute acres. About half the land is arable, one-fourth pasture, and the remainder bog and waste; limestone is abundant, and is burnt for manure. The soil is cold and thin, but is well cultivated: the inhabitants combine weaving with their agricultural pursuits. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the gift of the Lord Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £325. The church is a small neat edifice, built in 1768 by aid of a gift of £481 from the late Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was erected in 1806, at an expense exceeding £1700, by the then incumbent: the glebe comprises 514*a.* 3*r.* 26*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Donaghmore; it has no chapel, but an altar in the open air. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The parochial school is on Erasmus Smith's foundation, and is aided by the rector; the late Rev. D. Kelly contributed £50 towards the erection of the school-house: there are other public schools, two of which are aided by a donation of £7 per annum from Colonel Sir W. Verner, and two by £8 per annum from J. Gough, Esq.

KILLESHIN, a parish, in the union of Carlow, barony of Slieumargue, Queen's county, and province of Leinster; containing, with a part of the suburbs of Carlow, called Graigue, 5278 inhabitants. It comprises 10,905¼ statute acres, and, with the exception of about 40 acres of woodland and 200 of bog, consists of arable and pasture land: the agriculture is good; and the mountains, which rise 1000 feet above the river Barrow, are cultivated to their summits. Sandstone and limestone are found here, and extensive collieries are worked: there were formerly smelting-furnaces, which were discontinued for want of fuel. The chief seats are Springhill, Ardcleagh, Barno, Everton, and Old Derig. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin; the rectory is in the patronage of the Crown, and the vicarage in that of the Bishop, but they are held by one incumbent: the net income amounts to £332. The church has been rebuilt, and is a very handsome edifice in the early English style; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners gave £800 towards defraying the expense, and private subscriptions were added to a large amount: it has a neat organ, and an excellent choir. From the churchyard, which has been tastefully laid out, and planted with flowers, shrubs, and forest-trees, is a fine prospect of Carlow and its environs; and the view from the old church is also beautiful. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Slatey, and has chapels at Graigue and Killeshin, the latter of which stands on an artificial mound and has octagon towers at the corners. Here is a very strong chalybeate spring, which was formerly in high repute. The ruins of the old parish church have an ornamented entrance, encircled with an illegible inscription in Irish characters; and near it is the site of an ancient round tower; also the remarkable "Cut of Killeshin," which is a pass on the road from Carlow to the collieries, carried through a lofty hill for more than half a mile, and from 10 to 40 feet deep and 21 wide. Within the parish are some ruins which seem to be the foundations of the public buildings of an ancient town. At Old Derig was the residence of Dr. James Doyle, Roman Catholic bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, whose letters signed J. K. L. were written there.—See Graigue.

KILLESK, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Ballaghkeen, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 2 miles (S.) from Oulart, on the road from that place to Wexford; containing 1266 inhabitants. This parish comprises 4037½ statute acres, and contains abundance of limestone-gravel and marl; the system of agriculture is improving. It is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Castle-Ellis; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge is £123. 1. 8., of which £65. 17. 8. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killesk forms part of the liberties of Oulart and Castlebridge. Elks' horns of very large dimensions have been found.

KILLESK, a parish, in the barony of Shelburne, union of New Ross, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 7 miles (S. E.) from New Ross; containing 1067 inhabitants, and 2820 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and patronage of Lord Templemore, granted in 1702, in augmentation of the impropriate curacies of Dunbrody, St. James, and Rathroe: the tithe rent-charge is £234. 5. 6., and there is a glebe of about two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Suttons. Here are some remains of a castle said to have been built by Hervey de Montemarisco.

KILLESKEY, or Killiskey, a parish, in the union of Rathdrum, barony of Newcastle, county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, 1 mile (N. W. by W.) from Ashford; on the river Vartrey, and the coach-road from Dublin to Wexford; containing 2211 inhabitants, of whom 157 are in the village. This parish, which in its civil relations is also a constablewick, comprises 9231¼ statute acres. A large portion of the land in the occupation of resident proprietors is in the highest state of cultivation, and the system of agriculture is generally improved; there is neither bog nor waste land, except some tracts of mountain, which may be easily reclaimed. The surrounding country is remarkable for the boldness and impressive magnificence of its features; and within the limits of the parish are several gentlemen's seats. Glenmore, the splendid residence of the Synge family, is a handsome and spacious castellated mansion, with embattled parapets, above which rises a lofty round tower, flanking the principal façade, in the centre of which is a square gateway tower forming the chief entrance; it was erected by the late F. Synge, Esq., and occupies an eminence sloping gently towards the sea, near the opening of the Devil's Glen, and surrounded by a richly planted demesne, commanding a fine view of St. George's Channel, and the castle, town, and lighthouses of Wicklow, with the intervening country thickly studded with gentlemen's seats; and in the foreground, the church rising in the midst of flourishing plantations. Ballycurry, a highly cultivated demesne, extends along one side of the Devil's Glen, opposite to the demesne of Glenmore. Inchinappa, a modernised house, is decorated with a portico of the Tuscan order, and is pleasingly situated in grounds tastefully laid out. Dunran commands a view of the sea and of the picturesque glen of that name. The other residences are, Kiltimon, finely situated on an eminence commanding a good sea view, including the lighthouses and Head of Wicklow; Ballyhenry House, a handsome building, from which is an interesting prospect over the Devil's Glen and Ballycurry demesne; Killoughter, a pleasing villa finely situated; and Broomfield, commanding a view of the town and Head of Wicklow, and the demesne of Rosanna.

The parish is in the diocese of Dublin. The rectory forms part of the union and corps of the prebend of Wicklow in the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin; and there is also a chapelry, in the patronage of the Prebendary, who receives the entire tithe rent-charge, amounting to £283. 15., and pays the curate's stipend. The church, a remarkably neat structure in the later English style, was erected (at Nun's Cross) in 1818, by the late F. Synge, Esq., assisted by a gift of £800 and a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, and by subscriptions of the resident gentry; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £456 for its enlargement. All the sittings, with the exception of eight pews for the principal families, are free; a monument to the memory of the founder has been placed in the chancel. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Wicklow; the chapel is a neat building, at Ballinahinch. The late C. Tottenham, Esq., bequeathed for the use of the poor, £10 per annum charged on his estate of Ballycurry. On the lands of Dunran are the ruins of an ancient castle, formerly belonging to the O'Byrnes; and during the disturbances of 1798, the insurgents, after their defeat at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, took refuge here, but were soon after driven out with great loss.

The neighbourhood is chiefly celebrated for the variety and beauty of its SCENERY; it lies on the east side of that vast extent of mountain which forms the centre of the county of Wicklow, and is interspersed with numerous deep glens and mountain hollows, which, accordingly as they have been improved by art, or left in a state of nature, either excite emotions of pleasure and surprise, or of awe and apprehension. Of these, Dunran is particularly celebrated as combining both characters, in an eminent degree: it is a very deep glen, from one side of which, barren and rugged rocks project in every variety of fantastic form, while vast heaps of massive fragments are spread beneath. Among these rocks is one of immense bulk, which appears to threaten all below it, and which, from its striking resemblance in form to a mitre, is called the Bishop's Rock. The opposite side of the glen is richly clothed with wood, having been planted in almost every part of it by the late Lord Rossmore with forest-trees of every kind. Farther along the base of the mountain, the glen expands to the left; and to the right is another glen, similarly dividing the mountain, and having in its recesses a beautiful winding lake. Near the entrance of the latter is a pathway leading by a gradual ascent to an elevated lawn, on which is a cottage for the refreshment of visiters, beyond which the path is continued to the View, or Spy Rock, commanding a fine view over a foreground of vast extent and diversified beauty, terminated in the distance by the sea, and the mountains of North Wales, which may be distinctly seen in clear weather. The view from the summit of Dunran is still more splendid, comprehending, in addition to the former, the picturesque mountains on the northern coast, with those of Dublin, Bray Head, and the long wild range of mountains to the west. The Devil's Glen, a deep rocky chasm inclosed on both sides by lofty and precipitous cliffs, among which, wherever they could take root, have been planted firs of all kinds, beech, oak, sycamore, and other forest-trees, presents an assemblage of features highly picturesque. The various hues of the foliage contrast powerfully with intervening masses of bare rock; and the river Vartrey, a mountain torrent, on its entering the glen, descends from a height of nearly 100 feet, forming several beautiful falls before it reaches its narrow rocky bed. Through the upper vista above these falls are seen the distant mountains; and from a walk which has been formed by the proprietor of Glenmore at a considerable height above the bed of the river, a comprehensive view of the whole glen is obtained, and some of the finest sweeps are seen to great advantage. Another walk was made by the same gentleman, in 1835, leading to many parts of the glen, and commanding some of its most interesting features. Near the village of Ashford, about a mile from the glen, is a small but comfortable hotel and posting-house. There are several other glens in this very wild and romantic part of the county, all strongly marked with features of interest and beauty. Of these, Ballyrolan has been but recently planted: there are two singular caverns in this glen, called the "Robbers' Caves;" and on a farm at its southern extremity are some small remains of Ballyvolan Fort, said to have been the asylum of James II. on his flight from the battle of the Boyne, previously to his reaching Shelton Abbey. Coins, swords, spurs, arrow-heads, stone balls covered with lead, and various other relics have been found near this spot; and in a contiguous field are the ruins of the ancient chapel of Kilmartin. In this field were found, in 1835, several skeletons, and portions of burnt wood; and in a marl-pit, on the same townland, a horn of very large size was found about twenty-seven years since, filled with silver coins of the reign of Elizabeth. There are remains of old churches at Killeskey, Kilfea, Killoughter, and Trinity, near which last is a holy well.

KILLESTER, a parish, in the union of NORTH DUBLIN, barony of COOLOCK, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. E.) from Dublin; containing 456 inhabitants, and comprising 279¼ statute acres. This parish commands fine views of the Dublin and Wicklow mountains, and the bay of Dublin; and contains several seats. The principal are, Killester House, in which are incorporated the remains of an old abbey, and in the demesne of which is a fine grove of lime-trees; Maryville; Woodville; Hollybrook House; Hollybrook Park; Killester Lodge; Clontarf Strand; and Oatley. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, appropriate to the economy estate of Christ Church cathedral, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £15. 15. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Clontarf. There are some remains of the church, which, from its circular arches, appears to be very ancient.

KILLEVALLY, a village, in the parish of NEWTOWN, union of MULLINGAR, barony of MOYCASHEL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, ½ a mile (W.) from Tyrrel's-Pass, and on the road from Dublin to Athlone; containing 23 houses, and 121 inhabitants. It has a small linen manufacture; and fairs are held on June 12th and Oct. 23rd.

KILLEVEY, or KILSLEVE, a parish, in the union of NEWRY, partly in the barony of LOWER ORIOR, but chiefly in that of UPPER ORIOR, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Newry; containing 17,789 inhabitants. It comprises 28,174 statute acres, of which about 21,440 are arable and pasture, 190 water, and 6300 mountain and bog: the mountain of Slieve Gullion separates this parish from Forkhill, and rises to the height of 1893 feet above the level of the sea. The system of agriculture has been much improved recently. Whinstone and grey granite are extensively worked for building, and porphyry is also found. There is a communication with Lough Neagh by the Newry canal and the river Bann. The principal seats are, Drumbanagher Castle, a handsome residence erected in the Italian style, from a design by W. H. Playfair, Esq., of Scotch freestone, and situated in an extensive and richly planted demesne; and Killevey Castle, built in the Gothic style. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, constituting the corps of the precentorship of Armagh cathedral, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate; the tithe rent-charge, including that of the perpetual curacies of Camlough and Meigh, is £1063. 4. 8. The parish includes the districts of Camlough and Meigh, and has four churches, situated at Cloughinny, Camlough, Meigh, and Drumbanagher. The church at Drumbanagher was used as the parochial church till 1832, when one was built at Cloughinny, by a loan of £2000 from the Board of First Fruits; the latter is a spacious cruciform structure, in the later English style. The glebe comprises 1050 statute acres, mostly unimprovable mountain land. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Forkhill, but chiefly in that of Camlough, and has a chapel at Lissummon.

Not far from Drumbanagher Castle are the remains of a very extensive camp, which was the principal rendezvous of the Earl of Tyrone's army in the reign of Elizabeth; and near it is Tuscan's Pass, a most important station in early times, connecting the country of the O'Hanlons with that of the Maginnises. On the summit of Slieve Gullion is a large cairn, which on recent examination was found to be one of the sepulchral monuments of the ancient Irish, and is supposed to have contained the remains of Cualgne, son of Breogan, a Milesian chieftain, who fell in battle on the plain beneath, and from whom the mountain and the surrounding district most probably derived their name. Near the cairn, and also on the summit of Slieve Gullion, is a pool called the Loch, about 60 yards in diameter, which, together with the cairn, forms the subject of a poem ascribed to Ossian, in which "Fionn-Mac-Cumhall," or Fingal, and his heroes, make a conspicuous figure; the poem is called Laoi-na-Sealga, or "the Chace," and is among the translations of Irish poems by Miss Brooke.

KILLEVOLANE.—See KILVOLANE.

KILLEYMUR, or KILLIMER, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Kilrush, and on the river Shannon; containing 3241 inhabitants. It comprises 6303 statute acres, principally under tillage: the land is generally good, and there is a small quantity of bog; sea-weed is used as manure. At Money-Point is a quarry which produces 16 000 yards of flagging annually, valued at £2250; the material is a fine hard, close-grained, gritty substance, varying from 1½ to 4 inches in thickness, and of from 10 to 20 superficial feet. The principal seats are, Burrane House, Donogrogue Castle, Caradole, and Besborough. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilmurry-Clonderlaw; the rectory is partly impropriate in the representatives of Lord Castlecoote, and partly forms a portion of the rectorial union of Kilrush. The tithe rent-carge is £152. 6., of which £41. 10. 9. are payable to the rector of Kilrush, £48. 9. 3. to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar: there is a glebe of one acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killeymur forms part of the district of Kilrush, and contains a chapel. The ruins of the parish church, and of another small church or chapel, still exist.

KILLIAN, or KILLYAN, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of KILLIAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (N. E.) from Caltra, and on the road from Roscommon to Mount-Bellew; containing 5671 inhabitants. It comprises 13,565 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of bog, which, when reclaimed, forms moderately good land. The principal seats are Killyan, Kentstown, Riversdale, Ballybane, and St. Brendan's, which takes its name from a well dedicated to that saint. The village of Ballinamore, on the river Shiven, in this parish, has a daily post to Ahascragh, and a fair on the 21st of August. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, episcopally united, in 1811, to the vicarage of Killararan, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Kingsland. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £129, which is equally divided between the impropriators and the vicar; and the entire rent-charge of the vicarial benefice is £120. There is no church; divine service is performed once on Sundays in the police barrack of Ballinamore. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also part of Kilronan, and containing a chapel in each: there is a small Carmelite friary at Togherger.

KILLIANE, county of GALWAY.—See KILLANE.

KILLIANE, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Wexford, on the road from that place to Rosslare; containing 280 inhabitants. It comprises 1074 statute acres, which are partly under tillage, but chiefly in pasture: the soil is good, and well cultivated, and there is abundance of limestone and marl. Killiane Castle is on the shore of Wexford haven, of which it commands a pleasing view. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns, and is an impropriate curacy, forming part of the union of Killinick; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth, and the tithe rent-charge is £51. 8. 6., of which £13. 2. 9. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Piercestown. The church is in ruins; and there are also the remains of a chapel, with a small burial-ground attached, near Killiane Castle, supposed to have been the cemetery of the ancient proprietors.

KILLILAGH.—See KILLELAGH.

KILLILANE, or ST. HELEN'S, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 10 miles (S. E.) from Wexford, and near the southern extremity of the bay of Rosslare; containing 222 inhabitants. This parish, which for civil purposes forms part of Kilrane, comprises 670¾ statute acres, and is chiefly in tillage; sea-weed is used as manure. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Tacumshane and the corps of the chancellorship: the tithe rent-charge is £36. 18. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Tagat, or Kilrane.

KILLILEAGH.—See KILLYLEAGH, ARMAGH.

KILLILOGUE, commonly called KERLOGUE, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (S.) from Wexford, on the road from that place to Killinick; containing 116 inhabitants. It comprises 269 statute acres, principally under tillage; and is watered by a small stream that falls into Wexford harbour, near which a thin vein of copper-ore was found about 30 years since. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, united by act of council, in 1722, to St. Patrick's, Wexford: the tithe rent-charge is £9. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Wexford.

KILLILY, or KILLEELY, a parish, in the barony of DUNKELLIN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S.) from Oranmore, on the road from that place to Ardrahan; containing 1740 inhabitants, and 6232½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Kilcolgan; the rectory is appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the archdeaconry of Kilmacduagh, the prebend of Kinvarra in the cathedral of that see, and the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £94. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Kinvarra, and contains a chapel.

KILLIMER.—See KILLEYMER.

KILLIMORE-BOLLOGE, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Eyrecourt, on the road from that place to Loughrea; containing 4140 inhabitants. The parish comprises 9220 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of bog. There is a constabulary police station; also a receiving-house for letters, in connexion with Eyrecourt; and fairs are held on Jan. 1st, March 17th, June 29th, Sept. 29th, and Nov. 22nd. The principal seats are Heathlawn, Hearnesbrooke, and Rathmore. The parish is a vicarage in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Dononaughta; the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £145. 10., of which £62. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is the head of a district, comprising also Tyrenascragh, and containing a chapel in each parish.

KILLIMORE-DALY, a parish, in the union of LOUGHREA, partly in the barony of ATHENRY, partly in that of TYAQUIN, but chiefly in that of KILCONNELL, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4½ miles (E.) from Athenry, on the road from that place to Kilconnell; containing 2029 inhabitants, and 10,212½ statute acres. The principal seats are, Killimor Castle, the seat of the Daly family, now vested in the Rev. N. Devereux, grandson of the late Hyacinth Daly, Esq.; Cloncah; and Anne Ville. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Aughrim; the rectory is appropriate to the see and deanery of Clonfert, and to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge is £81. 13. 10., of which £15. 4. 8. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £11. 1. 6. to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kiltullagh, and has a chapel.

KILLINAGH, a parish, in the union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of TULLAGHAGH, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 7½ miles (E. by S.) from Manor-Hamilton, and on Lough Macnean; containing 6512 inhabitants. It comprises 24,783⅔ statute acres, including 982⅔ under water, of which 42¾ are in Lower and 806½ in Upper Lough Macnean. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Major Saunders, and the tithe rent-charge is £197, of which £97 are payable to the vicar. The church was erected in 1786, by aid of a gift of £390 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £163 for its repair. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel at Killinagh, and one at Doobally. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. A number of schools are under either the National Board or the Church Education Society; and there are two Sunday schools.

KILLINANE, a parish, partly in the barony of IDRONE EAST, but chiefly in that of IDRONE WEST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (S. W.) from Bagnalstown, and on the road from Gowran to Carlow; containing 818 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2264¼ statute acres. Malcolmville, a seat here, is situated on rising ground above the Barrow, and commands extensive views. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Leighlin, forming the corps of the chancellorship, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £202. 10. This parish is annexed, under the provisions of the act of the 4th of George IV., c. 86, to the parish of Wells, and the inhabitants enjoy all the rights of its church, as if they were parishioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killinane forms part of the district of Old Leighlin.

KILLINANE, a parish, in the union of GORT, partly in the barony of LOUGHREA, but chiefly in that of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5½ miles (S. W.) from Loughrea, on the road from that place to Gort; containing 1033 inhabitants. It comprises 5760½ statute acres, including about 200 acres of bog. Here are the seats of Roxboro' and Castleboy, near each of which are the ruins of an old castle. Killinane is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, consolidated by act of council, in 1726, with the vicarages of Kilthomas, Kilchrist, Iserkelly, Killogilleen, and Killora, and in the alternate patronage of the Marquess of Clanricarde and the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the see. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £84. 7. 6., of which £18. 7. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. The church of the union, situated in the demesne of Castleboy, and erected by subscription and assessment in 1797, is a small building, for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £285. The glebe-house, in Kilchrist, was erected by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500, in 1816, from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises about 19 acres.

KILLINANE, a parish, in the union of CAHIRCIVEEN, barony of IVERAGH, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Cahirciveen, on the road to Milltown; containing 3569 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the southern shore of Dingle bay, and at the inner extremity of the harbour of Valencia: it comprises 26,868 statute acres, of which 5030 consist of arable land, 7580 of mountain pasture, and the remainder (with the exception of about 40 acres of woodland) of rocky mountain, waste, and bog. Towards the sea are mountains of great elevation, affording pasture during the summer months; the intervening valleys are coarse and rocky, with only a small proportion of tillage. On one of the mountains is a remarkable prominence called "The Hag's Tooth," on the north side of which are some small romantic lakes. The sea on the north-east forms several creeks; that of Kells affords shelter to small vessels, and near it is a coast-guard station, being one of the four included in the district of Valencia. The river Fahrta, which rises near the south-east end of the parish, is navigable for boats a considerable way up from the harbour of Valencia, affording great facility for the conveyance of sea-weed and sand; the latter, which is brought from Begnis Island, is of superior quality, and constitutes a valuable manure. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of Cahir: the tithe rent-charge is £120. 12s., and there is a glebe of 61½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killinane is part of the district of Cahirciveen: there is a chapel at Tielmore. At Dcelis is a school-house with apartments for the master, built in 1833, at the expense of Mrs. Raymond, for the education of the male children of her tenantry, and endowed by her with £20 per annum. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground at Seugrany.

KILLINARDRISH, a hamlet, in the parish of CANNAWAY, union of MACROOM, barony of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E.) from Macroom; containing about 65 inhabitants. This village is beautifully situated on the south bank of the river Lee, and is connected with Carrigadrohid by an ancient bridge. It consists of a few neat cottages with gardens, and was formed by R. B. Crooke, Esq. It is a constabulary police station, and near it is a sub-post office to Cork and Macroom: fairs have been long established.

KILLINCARRIG, a village, in the parish of DELGANY, union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, ½ a mile (E. N. E.) from Delgany, and on the road from Bray to Wicklow; containing 31 houses, and 179 inhabitants. Killincarrick House is situated in grounds tastefully laid out and commanding very fine mountain and sea views: in the demesne are the ivy-clad remains of an ancient castle, in which several silver coins of William III. were discovered in 1833. Here is an extensive flour-mill.

KILLINCHY, a post-town and parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, partly in the barony of DUFFERIN, but chiefly in the baronies of UPPER and LOWER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 9 miles (N.) from Downpatrick, and 92 (N. N. E.) from Dublin, on the road from Downpatrick to Belfast; containing 7470 inhabitants. It comprises 13,686 statute acres, of which 6437¼ (including the islands of Duncey and Island More in Strangford Lough, and 75¾ acres in that lough) are in the barony of Dufferin; of the remainder 3281 are in Lower Castlereagh, and 4147¾ (including 50½ of water) in Upper Castlereagh. The land is chiefly in tillage, and in a high state of cultivation; there is no waste land, and but little bog: clay-slate abounds, and a thin seam of coal is visible at the lough. There are several corn-mills; and fairs are held in the town on Jan. 5th, April 6th, July 6th, and Oct. 5th; it is a constabulary police station, and has a sub-post office to Comber and Killyleagh. Petty-sessions are held in the court-house on alternate Saturdays. At the White Rocks is a small but excellent harbour, with a small pier, at which vessels of 80 tons can load, and from which a considerable quantity of agricultural produce is exported.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the alternate patronage of Viscount Bangor and the Earl of Carrick: the tithe rent-charge is £600. The church, a large and handsome edifice with a square embattled tower, situated on an eminence, was built in 1830, at an expense of £900, whereof one-half was raised by subscription, and the remainder by parochial assessment. The glebe-house was built in 1789, by the then incumbent, and there is a glebe of 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Saintfield and Killinchy, and has a chapel at Carrickmannon. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The parochial schools are principally supported by the rector; the school-house, built in 1825, is a good plain edifice, containing separate schoolrooms for boys and girls, and residences for the master and mistress. There are ten other public schools, six of which are connected with the National Board; the remaining four are aided by annual donations from Lord Dufferin, D. Gordon, Esq., and the rector. The Earl of Limerick, about 1730, gave part of the townland of Killinchy, which now produces £300 per annum, to the Incorporated School Society; and in 1810, Major Potter bequeathed £100 to the poor members of the Presbyterian meeting house, among whom the interest is divided every Christmas. Here are the remains of Balloo fort, near which many silver coins of the reigns of John and other monarchs were found in 1829: the ancient castle of the family of White stood on the site of Killinchy fort, and in 1802 many silver and copper coins were found in its vicinity. In the churchyard is the tomb of the family of Bruce.

KILLINCOOLE, a parish, in the union of DUNDALK, barony and county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Lurgan-Green, and on the road from Ardee to Dundalk; containing 697 inhabitants. It comprises 1397¼ statute acres, without any waste land or bog; it is mostly under tillage, and the soil is good and well cultivated. Here are a flax and an oatmeal mill. Stone is quarried for building, and repairing the roads. The principal seats are Fane Valley and Killincoole Castle. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £181. 8. 8. The church is a neat plain building, erected in 1799, by aid of a gift of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits, and has been repaired by a grant of £126 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: the glebe-house is a handsome residence built in 1790, on a glebe of 15¼ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Darver and Dromiskin. The ancient castle of Killincoole is a square building with circular towers at the angles, and has a cave under its eastern side, which is supposed to lead to a well.

KILLINEEN, or KILLINAN, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (W.) from Craughwell, on the road to Oranmore; containing 1531 inhabitants. It comprises 4966¾ statute acres; and is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Kilcolgan: the rectory is partly appropriate to the archdeaconry. The tithe rent-charge is £100. 10., of which £19. 10. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £47. 5. to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the vicar.

KILLINEY, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Kingstown, and on the road from Dublin to Bray; containing 986 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1334½ statute acres. The hills of Killiney command magnificent views of Howth, Kingstown, and Dublin bay; the groves of Merrion and Mount Anville, with part of Dublin, the Phœnix Park, and the river Liffey; Killiney bay, Bray Head, and the two Sugar-Loaf mountains. They are visited by many parties of pleasure in summer, at which season Killiney and its vicinity are favourite places of residence, and several pretty villas and rustic cottages have been erected for such as may take up their abode here. There are three hills, called "the Three Sisters," in one of which was procured the stone for constructing Kingstown harbour; the second is of considerable elevation; the village of Killiney, which is in the parish of Kill, occupies the south side of the third hill. The principal seats are, Loftus Hill, beautifully situated to the north of the Killiney hills; Laughlinstown House; Ballinclea; Killiney Park; Saintbury; Kilmarnock; Ballybrack Grove; Killincy House; Marino; Martello Farm; and Druid Cottage.

The parish is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Monkstown; the rectory forms part of the corps of the deanery of Christ Church, Dublin, and the tithe rent-charge is £87. 15. 9., of which £58. 10. 6. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the incumbent of Monkstown. By a public act passed in the 9th of George IV. it was enacted that a church, or chapel of ease to Monkstown, should be erected at Killiney, and endowed with houses and land in the village of Dalkey, which were taken from the deanery. For some years divine service was performed by the Rev. Charles Sleater, the first chaplain (who was appointed by the incumbent of Monkstown), in a private house; but in 1834 a chapel of ease was erected on a site given by Sir Compton Domville, Bart., who also gave a portion of glebe. It cost £1500, a gift from the Board of First Fruits, and is in the later English style, built of the white granite that is found in great abundance on the spot; at the west end is an embattled tower with pinnacles. There is no glebe-house; the glebe consists of nearly two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kingstown. A dispensary in the village is maintained in the customary manner. Near Killiney bay are two martello towers and two batteries: the picturesque ruins of the old church, covered with ivy, are also on the shore. In Killiney Park and the grounds of Druid Cottage are some interesting Druidical remains: stone coffins, and urns of baked clay, were found in the grounds of Killiney House, about the year 1784; and ancient coins, ornaments, and military weapons have been frequently found here. Near Dorset Lodge is a pyramidical monument of granite, erected to mark the spot where the fourth duke of Dorset lost his life accidentally, while hunting, in 1815.

KILLINEY, county KERRY.—See KILLEINY.

KILLINGLEY.—See KILLANULLY.

KILLINICK, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4¼ miles (S.) from Wexford, on the road to Rosslare; containing 611 inhabitants. It comprises 1283¾ statute acres, chiefly under tillage, and in a good state of cultivation: there is a quarry of shingle, which is used for repairing the roads. Coal and other commodities are brought up in cots from Wexford harbour, by an inlet navigable at spring tides: some of the inhabitants on the banks of this inlet are engaged in fishing. Fairs are held in the village on Easter-Monday, Whit-Tuesday, April 8th, May 27th, Sept. 21st, and Nov. 30th: petty-sessions are held every fortnight or month, on Tuesdays; and here is a constabulary police station. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, united to the rectory and vicarage of Maglass, and to the impropriate curacies of Killiane, Kilmocree, and St. Michael's; the tithe rent-charge is £77. 4., of which £2. 15. 10. are payable to the impropriator, £63. 17. to the rector, and the remainder to the rector of Ballybrennan. The church, a modern structure with a handsome square tower finished by spiral minarets, was built in 1828, by a loan of £1100 from the Board of First Fruits; it has been lately much improved by a thorough repair. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 7¾ statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Maglass, and has a neat chapel at Ballymore. Ballyran Castle, situated about a quarter of a mile south of the church, is the property of the Lett family.

KILLINOR, KILNENER, or KILNINOR, a parish, in the union and barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Arklow, on the old road from that place to Gorey; containing 1407 inhabitants. It comprises 6435¾ statute acres, and is chiefly in tillage. It is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, united by episcopal authority to Kilpipe; the rectory is impropriate in Sir Richard Steele, Bart.: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £93. 9. 3., of which £51. 18. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the curate. Here is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 17*a.* 3*r.* 20*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Gorey, and has a chapel at Ballyfad.

KILLISHAL, Tyrone.—See Killeshill.

KILLISHANE.—See Kilshinane.

KILLISHY, or Killashee, a parish, partly in the barony of North Naas, but chiefly in that of South Naas, union of Naas, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 1½ mile (S.) from Naas, on the road from that place to Kilcullen; containing 835 inhabitants. It comprises 4145 statute acres, of which 399$8\frac{1}{2}$ are in South Naas. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £161. 1. 4. The church is an ancient building, connected with which is a still more ancient tower, circular, on a square base. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newbridge, and has a neat chapel at Two-mile-town. A religious house was founded here by St. Patrick, for his nephew, St. Auxil, who died in 454; and close to the churchyard are the remains of an old castle, near which is a cavern with several ramifications.

KILLODIERNAN, a parish, in the union of Nenagh, barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 5 miles (N.) from Nenagh, and on the river Shannon; containing 1238 inhabitants. It comprises 4563 statute acres, generally light land and in tillage. There is a constabulary police station at Puckane. The principal seats are, Rockvalley; Blackfort; the Lodge; a fishing lodge beautifully situated on the banks of the Shannon; and Johnstown Park, a large and finely situated residence in a well-planted demesne of about 200 acres, commanding fine views of the Shannon. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £173. 16. 6. The church is a neat edifice, built in 1811 by aid of a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits, and has been repaired by a grant of £100 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1825, at a cost of £950, partly a gift and partly a loan from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of $35\frac{1}{2}$ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Monsea, and has a chapel at Puckane. On the townland of Urragh are the remains of a castle; and in the demesne of Johnstown Park are the ruins of an ancient chapel, with a burial-ground attached, which is still used.

KILLOE, or KILLOW (LOWER and UPPER), a parish, partly in the barony and union of Granard, but chiefly in those of Longford, county of Longford, province of Leinster, 4 miles (N. E.) from Longford, on the road from that place to Granard; containing 19,477 inhabitants. An abbey was founded at Cloono, which is supposed to have been in this parish, in 668. In 1798, the French army under General Humbert surrendered at Ballinamuck. The parish comprises 41,$440\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which the greater part is in Lower Killoe, on the northern side of the river Camlin; the northern part is mountainous, and contains a good deal of bog, but the southern part is rich grazing-land. At Creeve is a quarry of very fine limestone; at Ballinamuck, a fine freestone-flag quarry; and there is abundance of potters'-clay. The principal seats are Farra, Newtown Bond, and Bawnmore. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the gift of the Bishop, divided into Upper and Lower Killoe, the former of which is united to Clongesh, and the latter to Templemichael. the rectory is impropriate in Sir J. B. Piers, Bart. The tithe rent-charge of Lower Killoe amounts to £609. 4. 8., of which £207. 14. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the rector of Clongesh; the tithe of Upper Killoe amounts to £150, of which £67. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the rector of Templemichael. There is a church in Lower Killoe, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits, in 1824, gave £900, and Willoughby Bond, Esq., £200; also a church at Drumlish, in Upper Killoe, for the erection of which the Board gave £900, in 1824. A glebe of 79 acres is attached to the church in Lower Killoe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms three districts, namely, Moyne and Drimard, Drumlish and Ballinamuck, and Killoe and Ainbegs, and contains six chapels. At Corboy is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. There are public schools in Lower Killoe, to one of which the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ardagh contributes £20 annually; and in Upper Killoe are three public schools, to which the Countess Dowager of Rosse contributes £8, Viscount Lorton £10, Willoughby Bond, Esq., £8, and the rector £2, annually. At Newtown-Bond are the ruins of a church, and near Bawnmore those of an ancient castle and two Danish forts: on the townland of Cloonagh is a large red flagstone, inscribed with many emblems or characters.—See Ballinamuck and Drumlish.

KILLOFIN, a parish, in the union of Kilrush, barony of Clonderlaw, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 7 miles (S. W.) from Kildysart, and on the river Shannon; containing 3985 inhabitants. It comprises 669$2\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and is almost entirely under tillage, yielding abundant crops; there is some bog. In several parts are indications of coal, and culm is obtained at Slievedooly and Clonkerry. The south-western part of the parish consists of a peninsula, projecting into the Shannon, and forming the south-east side of Clonderlaw bay: on Kilkeran Point, at its extremity, is a battery mounting six 24-pounders and two howitzers, with a bomb-proof barrack for a detachment of artillerymen. The principal seats are Ballyartney, Clonkerry, and Kilkeran Lodge. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilmurry-Clonderlaw; the rectory is impropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £213, of which £120 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killofin is also part of the union or district of Kilmurry-Clonderlaw, and has a handsome cruciform chapel near Labasheeda. Some remains of the parish church still exist, and its burial-ground is still used; at Kilkerin are the ruins of a small church, with a burial-ground which is used for the interment of children; and at Killanna are the ruins of an ancient building, supposed to have been a monastery. In Millpark is a chalybeate spring.—See Labasheeda.

KILLOGHCONNOGHAN, or Kilaconnigan, a parish, in the union of Trim, barony of Lune, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Trim, and on the road from Dublin to Mullingar; containing 2319 inhabitants. It comprises 11,$561\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres: about one-fourth is bog, much of which was planted by the late Earl of Darnley; the remainder is principally under tillage. There is a good quarry of limestone. Fairs are held on March 25th, May 12th, Aug. 15th, and Nov. 1st. The principal seats are Elm Grove, Parkstown, and Kilmur. The village of Ballivor, or Kilbaliver, is a constabulary police station; and contains the parish church, the Roman Catholic chapel, a school, and a dispensary. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Meath, and in the gift of the Earl of Darnley, who is impropriator of the rectory: the tithe rent-charge is £225, payable to the impropriator, who allows the perpetual curate £69. 4. per annum. The church is a neat structure with a spire, erected in 1820, by aid of a gift of £200 from the late Earl of Darnley, and a loan of £700 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built in 1822, by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the same Board, and a subscription of £100 from the earl; the glebe comprises 21 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castlerickard, and has a handsome chapel, towards the erection of which the late Earl of Darnley gave £100, and half an acre of land for a site. There are some remains of a Franciscan friary and a castle at Donore, and of a castle at Carranstown.

KILLOGILLEEN, a parish, partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in that of Dunkellin, union of Loughrea, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 5 miles (W.) from Loughrea, on the road from that place to Ardrahan; containing 1074 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3604¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Killinane: the rectory is appropriate to the see and archdeaconry of Kilmacduagh, and the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge is £90, of which £15 are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £13. 10. to the archdeacon, £15 to the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the incumbent. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel.

KILLOH.—See Killua.

KILLOKENNEDY, a parish, in the union of Limerick, barony of Tulla, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 5 miles (W.) from Killaloe, on the road from that place to Ennis; containing 3811 inhabitants. It comprises 11,656 statute acres, including much mountain pasture and some bog: good building and flag stone are obtained. The seat of Ballyquin, within the parish, is situated in Glenomera, which is celebrated as a shooting station for grouse and phcasants. At Kilbane is a constabulary police station. Killokennedy is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kiltonanlea, or Doonass; the rectory is part of the union of Omullod: the tithe rent-charge is £162. 2. per annum, of which £79. 12. 4. are payable to the vicar, and the remainder to the rector. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the districts of Broadford and Doonass, and has chapels at Kilbane and Kilmore.

KILLOLOAN, a parish, in the union of Clonmel, partly in the barony of Upperthird, county of Waterford, and partly in that of Iffa and Offa East, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2¾ miles (E. N. E.) from Clonmel, on the road from that place to Waterford; containing 970 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3208 statute acres; the land is well cultivated, and there is abundance of good limestone. The river Suir, which flows through part of the parish, is navigable for small vessels. Killoloan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Kilcash; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lismore: the tithe rent-charge is £76. 17., of which £49. 19. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a neat building, erected in 1827, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilgrant. At Gurteen are some Druidical remains; and in the Waterford part of the parish are the ivy-clad ruins of Darinlar Castle, of which only the keep and some vaults remain.

KILLONE, or Killowen, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Islands, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 2½ miles (S. by W.) from Ennis, on the road to Kildysart; containing 2777 inhabitants. It comprises about 5718¾ statute acres. Limestone abounds, and is used for manure, for which purpose sea-weed and sand from the shores of the Fergus are also used; the state of agriculture is gradually improving. About the year 1190, Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, founded an abbey here for nuns of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated it to St. John the Baptist: Slaney, the pious daughter of Donogh Carbreach, King of Thomond, was abbess of this nunnery. The ruins are beautifully situated near the north-eastern extremity of the Lake of Killone, and form a very picturesque feature in the scenery. At a short distance from them is a celebrated holy well, dedicated to St. John, on the eve of whose anniversary it is resorted to by the peasantry from various parts of the county. The principal seats are Edenvale and New Hall; both are situated in picturesque demesnes, the latter being on an eminence above the Lake of Killone, and the former celebrated for its romantic vale, in which is a secluded lake, said to communicate with the river Fergus by a subterraneous channel. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory is impropriate in Bindon Scott, Esq., who receives the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £135, and allows £10 per annum late currency for discharging the clerical duties; but the townland of Bearnageehy pays tithe to the rector of Clare-Abbey. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killone forms part of the district of Clare, and has a chapel at Ballyea.

KILLONEHAN.—See Killelonehan.

KILLONOGHAN, or Killonahon, a parish, in the union of Ennistymon, barony of Burren, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 13 miles (S. W.) from Burren, and on the western coast; containing 1369 inhabitants. This parish comprises 7350 statute acres, and consists principally of rocky mountain pasture, affording scanty but rich herbage; a detached portion is situated at some distance to the south-east, and another portion is isolated by the parish of Glaninagh. Lead is found in the vicinity of Glenvaan, and it is supposed that a vein extends into the limestone hills of Burren. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora, forming part of the union of Dromcrehy, or Rathbourney, and of the corps of the treasurership of the cathedral of Kilfenora: the tithe rent-charge is £61. 17. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Glyun, or Glenarragha, and has a chapel at Stonehall. There are some remains of the church, near which are the ruins of a castle, which consisted of a round tower.

KILLORA, a parish, in the union of Loughrea, barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, on the road from Loughrea to Galway; containing, with the post-town of Craughwell, 1618 inhabitants. It comprises 5372¼ statute acres. The principal seats are Ballimore, Rockfield, and Aggard. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Killinane, or Kilthomas; the rectory is appropriate to the see and archdeaconry: the tithe rent-charge is £117. 15., of which £21 are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £37. 10. to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called Craughwell, at which place the chapel is situated.—See Craughwell.

KILLORAN, a parish, in the union of Ballinasloe, partly in the barony of Clonmacnoon, partly in that of Leitrim, but chiefly in the barony of Longford, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Eyrecourt, and on the road from Loughrea to Ballinasloe; containing 1838 inhabitants. It comprises 5394 statute acres, of which about one-fourth are arable, and the remainder pasture land and bog. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is partly appropriate to the see, and partly with the vicarage, forms a portion of the union of Kiltormer. The tithe rent-charge is £59. 6., of which £13. 17. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Abbeygormagan, and contains a chapel.

KILLORAN, a parish, in the barony of Leney, union and county of Sligo, and province of Connaught, 6 miles (N. W.) from Ballymote, and on the road from Sligo to Tobbercurry; containing 4044 inhabitants. It comprises 13,999¾ statute acres: there is a considerable quantity of mountain land, and some bog; also limestone. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, united by act of council, in 1819, to that of Kilvarnet, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery of Achonry. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £252. 15., of which £91. 2. 6. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the entire vicarial benefice is £195. 7. 6. The church, a small building with a square tower, was erected by aid of a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits in 1766; it was enlarged in 1829 by a loan of £460 from the same Board, and was lately repaired by a grant of £176 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house was built in 1827, at a cost exceeding £1000, partly a gift and partly a loan from the Board; the glebe of the union comprises 47 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel at Carnacleigh.—See Coolaney.

KILLORGLIN, a parish, in the union of Cahiciveen, partly in the barony of Dunkerrin, partly in Magonihy, but chiefly in the barony of Trughenackmy, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 3 miles (S. W.) from Milltown, and on the road from Tralee to Cahirciveen; containing 8574 inhabitants, of whom about 1000 are in the village. The Moriarty family anciently possessed this district, from which they were expelled by M'Carty-More. It was subsequently the property of the Fitzgeralds, who bestowed the castle and manor on the Knights Templars: on the dissolution of that order it reverted to the Fitzgeralds, by whom it was forfeited in the Desmond rebellion, when the estate was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Captain Conway, after whom it is sometimes called Castle-Conway. It is now the property of the noble family of Mullins. The parish comprises 7129 statute acres: the soil is light and gravelly, and chiefly under tillage; agriculture is improving, and there is a considerable quantity of bog and limestone. At Menus is a small flour-mill. The river Lanne divides the parish into two nearly equal parts; it contains fine salmon, and is navigable for vessels of 180 tons near to the village, which is a short distance from its mouth.

The village consists of about 200 houses, and close to it is a bridge on the great line of road; it exports corn, salmon, and pigs, and imports iron, timber, and salt. Fairs are held on Aug. 11th and 12th, and Nov. 19th; at the first, called Puck Fair, unbroken Kerry ponies, goats, &c., are sold, and a male goat is sometimes ornamented and paraded about. The village has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Cahirciveen, Tralee, and Newcastle; it is a constabulary police station, and has petty-sessions monthly. A manorial court is held occasionally, for the recovery of debts under 40s.: the manor is nearly co-extensive with the parish, comprising 6170½ statute acres, and descended from Captain Conway to the Blennerhassett family, from which it was purchased, in 1797, by Lord Ventry. The romantic glen of the river Cara is on the western border of this parish. The principal seats are Annagarry, Ardmoniel Cottage, Clifton Cottage, Altavilla, and Annadale. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £500, of which £300 are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the Mullins family, in whom the tithes of the manor are impropriate. The church is a plain structure with a square tower, erected on land given by the Rev. F. Mullins, and for the building of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £800, in 1816. The glebe-house was built by means of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the same Board; the glebe consists of 11 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, including also the whole of Knockane, except Glencare, and has a chapel, built on an acre of land given by the late Lord Ventry, and since much improved and ornamented. At Droumavalley are the ruins of a church, to which a large burial-ground is attached; and there are remains of another old church at Dungeel; also extensive remains of the castle of the Knights Templars, which till lately was inhabited.

KILLOSCULLY, a parish, in the union of Nenagh, barony of Owney and Arra, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Newport, and on the road from Dudley to Limerick; containing 3099 inhabitants. It comprises 14,439 statute acres. The surface is very mountainous, including the Keeper mountain, the loftiest of the range, rising 2265 feet; the base and sides afford tolerably good pasturage, and within the last few years the lower part has been planted. To the south-east of this mountain rises the river Newport, which passes northward through the vale of Glencolloo to Kilvolane, in its course giving motion to several mills. There are other mountains in the parish affording tolerable pasturage. The lower lands have been much improved by draining; and a large drain has been constructed by Lord Bloomfield, in order to get access to a fine bed of marl, which affords a valuable manure. There are several bogs, in which has been found timber of large growth, lying horizontally from 10 to 20 feet below the surface. On Lord Bloomfield's property is an extensive quarry, from which the stone for building some of the houses on the estate was raised; a vein of copper-ore has also been discovered, but has not yet been worked; and slates of good quality for roofing have been quarried, but not to any great extent. Lord Bloomfield some years ago built a handsome lodge in the Elizabethan style, which commands many fine views; and laid out an extensive nursery, from which considerable plantations have been made on the surrounding mountains. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel, and is a rectory and vicarage, till lately forming part of the union of Kilnerath, or St. John's Newport: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. The church, a neat edifice, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £900 and Lord Bloomfield also contributed, was built in 1829, near the Keeper mountain. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballinahinch, and has a neat chapel with a school-house adjoining. A school-house has been built on the townland of Drumban, by Lord Bloomfield, and is supported by his lordship. In the marl-pits have been found the fossil remains of the elk, or moose-deer, of very large dimensions; some of which have been preserved entire, and are to be seen at Laughton House.

KILLOSKEHANE, or KILLSKELAN, a parish, in the unions of ROSCREA and THURLES, barony of IKERRIN, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W. S. W.) from Templemore, and on the road from Burris-o'-leigh to Dunkerrin; containing 743 inhabitants. It comprises 2542 statute acres, consisting chiefly of very fine pasturage; there is plenty of good limestone. Killoskehane Castle is situated in a well-planted demesne, and includes part of the ancient castle in the modern mansion. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel, and is a rectory and vicarage, forming part of the union of Kilfithmone: the tithe rent-charge is £82. 10.

KILLOSSORY, a parish, in the union of BALROTHERY, barony of NETHERCROSS, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Swords, and on the road from Dublin to Drogheda; containing 391 inhabitants. It comprises 2731 statute acres; the land is of good quality, and the system of agriculture improving. The principal seats are, Rathbeale, the residence of the Corbally family, a spacious mansion, situated in an improved demesne commanding some fine views; Rawlestown; Lays; and Lispopple. Here is a station of the constabulary police. The parish is in the diocese of Dublin; the rectory is appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin, and the curacy forms part of the union of Swords: the tithe rent-charge is £121. 9. 6., payable to the economy fund. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killossory is the head of a district called Rolleston, comprising also the parishes of Clonmethan, Kilsallaghan, and Palmerstown, and containing two chapels, situated respectively at Rolleston in this parish, and at Oldtown in Clonmethan. The font of the old church was removed to that of Swords, on the demolition of which it was removed to the Roman Catholic chapel of this parish, where it is still preserved. Near the ruins of the old church, a school-house was erected in 1823. There are some remains of the ancient castle of Bragil, which, with the manor, was granted by James I. to Sir Richard Bolton, chancellor of Ireland, in whose family it remains: it was defended, during the absence of her husband, by Lady Bolton, against Ruah O'Neill, by whom it was burnt; and Lady Bolton perished in the flames. Considerable portions of the interior walls are yet standing, but the outworks have been long levelled.

KILLOTERAN, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (W.) from Waterford, and on the river Suir; containing 662 inhabitants, and 2493 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, forming part of the corps of the deanery of Waterford: the tithe rent-charge is £116. 5., and there is a glebe of 17 acres. The church is a plain edifice, repaired lately by a grant of £164 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

KILLOUGH, or ST.-ANNE'S-PORT, a sea-port and post-town, in the parish of RATHMULLEN, union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of LECALE, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (S. E.) from Downpatrick, and 78¾ (N.) from Dublin; containing 1148 inhabitants. This place is situated on the harbour to which it gives name, on the eastern coast, in lat. 54° 15′ (N.) and long. 5° 37′ 30″ (W.). The town contains 246 houses, built along the margin of the bay, and has a considerable coasting trade with the principal ports in the Irish Channel: the chief exports are corn and live cattle, of the former of which very great quantities are shipped; and the principal imports are coal and salt. A lucrative fishery is carried on off the coast; haddock and whiting are taken in great quantities, and from 12 to 20 boats are daily employed during the year. The manufacture of salt is also carried on, upon a small scale. The harbour is about half a league to the east of St. John's Point, and affords safe shelter for coasting-vessels and for merchant-ships of 150 tons' burthen; there is a good roadstead in off-shore winds for vessels navigating the channel, and the harbour is the rendezvous of a considerable portion of the numerous fishing-vessels that frequent this coast. It is admirably adapted for a safety harbour, and is, indeed, the only one so adapted along this part of the coast: by the erection of a breakwater on the Water rock, a safety harbour might be formed where vessels could enter and find shelter in any gale. The new lighthouse at St. John's Point deserves especial notice: after repeated and disastrous shipwrecks on these shores, the Dublin Ballast Board, on the representation of Captain Browne, of Janeville, consented to erect a lighthouse on his property here, and the work was executed under his immediate superintendence; it is of Morne cut granite, and is considered one of the most finished structures of the kind in the United Kingdom. The light is a remitting one, visible for 45 seconds, and obscured for 15 seconds, in every minute; this effect is produced by clock-machinery, the principle of the light being refractive and dioptrick, on the French plan. The light-house is the only one of the description on the coasts of Britain, or at least was so when erected; and no ship-wreck has occurred since the light was first exhibited, in May, 1844. The pier and quays extend on both sides of the entrance to the bay, and were greatly improved by the late Viscount Bangor, at an expense of more than £18,000. The post-office is under that of Downpatrick. Fairs are held on the first Friday (O. S.) in February, June 9th, Aug. 17th, and Nov. 12th, for live stock and pedlery; and a manorial court is held on the first Tuesday in every month.

The LIVING is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Incumbent of Rathmullen. The church, which was rebuilt in 1716, and subsequently fell into a state of dilapidation, was again rebuilt in 1802, by the munificence of the Rev. J. Hamilton, who had died in 1797 and bequeathed £1200 for that purpose. It is a neat edifice, on the site of the former, in the early English style, with a tower surmounted by an octangular spire, affording an excellent landmark for mariners entering the port. The glebe-house, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits granted £450 as a gift and £50 as a loan, is a comfortable residence. The stipend of the curate is £100, of which £20 are paid by Lord Bangor, as impropriator of Rathmullen, and £80 by the trustees of Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel is in the town, and there is also a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Near the church is a handsome male and female school built by the late Viscount Bangor, at a cost of between £200 and £300; it was chiefly supported by his lordship during his lifetime, and is now supported by the trustees of the Castleward estates. At St. John's Point are the ruins of a commandery of Knights Hospitallers; and about a quarter of a mile from the town, on the shore, is a beautiful grotto, in which is a well, seven feet deep, supplied with water oozing through a mass of tufa at the top of the cavern. About half a mile from the town, on the road to Downpatrick, is a copious spring, the water of which is specifically lighter by one-fourth part than spring water in general; and close to the shore is St. Scordin's Well, issuing from a rocky bank, and discharging at the rate of one hogshead per hour, without any diminution in the driest weather. Not far from this is a hole in the rock, which at the ebbing and flowing of the tide emits a sound resembling that of a huntsman's horn.

KILLOUGHTER, a parish, in the barony of TULLAGHGARVEY, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. N. E.) from Belturbet, on the road from that place to Cootchill; containing about 6130 inhabitants. It comprises 7633 statute acres, all arable and pasture land except about 250 acres of lake and bog. A description of gravel is found on some ground here, largely impregnated with iron-ore, and it is supposed a mine might be worked to advantage; in the townland of Corcashel is a kind of yellow clay, which when dissolved in water makes a fine wash for colouring walls, precisely resembling oil painting, and leaving the same gloss. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Kilmore, formed out of the parish of Annagh in 1813, and in the gift of the Incumbent of that parish: the tithe rent-charge is £15, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have granted an augmentation of £60 per annum. The church is a neat plain building with a square tower, erected in 1814, by a gift of £800 and a loan of £400 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board, in 1822, and has a glebe of 19½ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel near Red Hills. There is a meeting-house for Primitive Methodists; two schools are in connexion with the Church Education Society, and two under the Board of National Education. About a mile from the glebe, in the adjoining townland of Clara, is a remarkable Druidical stone, called Cloghard, or "the high stone;" it is oblong and very flat, and was set originally upon two large upright stones, one at either end, but is now broken in the middle: as the material differs from that found on the hill, this stone, which is of huge dimensions, must have been brought hither by art. On the townland of Drumavrack were discovered, in 1845, some caves of a curious description, flagged beneath and above with large flat stones; three or four of these caves are connected by small apertures with each other: they are supposed to have been ancient burial-places.

KILLOULAGH.—See KILWEILAGH.

KILLOWEN, KILLOWNEY, or KILROWEN, a parish, situated in the union of BANDON, barony of KINNALMEAKY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (W.) from Bandon, on the road from that place to Dunmanway; containing 366 inhabitants. It comprises 1264 statute acres; the land is generally good, and a better system of agriculture is now beginning to be pursued. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of Lord Kinsale: the tithe rent-charge is £105. 9. 6. Divine service is performed in a house licensed by the bishop. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Templemartin. Here is a large mass of white quartz, called by the peasantry the "Holy stone," around which, according to tradition, the priest formerly assembled the parishioners for public worship.

KILLOWEN, or ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, a parish, in the union and barony of COLERAINE, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER; forming part of the suburbs of Coleraine, and containing 2708 inhabitants. This parish, which is included within the present borough of Coleraine, is situated on the western bank of the river Bann, and is connected with the town, on the opposite side, by a fine newly-built stone bridge of three arches. That part of the parish which is more especially the suburb consists chiefly of a long street called Captain-street, forming a continuation of Bridge-street, Coleraine. It contains many small houses, nearly the whole of which are held at will by tenants under the Clothworkers' Company of London, which company obtained a lease of the parish from the Irish Society, to whom it had been granted by James I. in 1609. In another street, called Killowen-street, and which is bishop's land, is the church. A small trade is carried on, chiefly in the manufacture of calicoes and ginghams; and fairs are held on May 12th and July 5th. The parish comprises 1788 statute acres: the lands are chiefly under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture greatly improved. Jackson's Hall, now vacant, occupies the site of an ancient castle erected in 1213 by Mac Ughtry, who in that year destroyed the abbey founded on the spot by St. Carbreus in 540.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £120. The original parish church, which was part of a priory founded in 1080, was in 1830 converted into a school-house; and a small neat church, without either tower or spire, was built at an expense of £1000, towards which £300 were given by the Clothworkers' Company, £100 by Bishop Knox, £50 by the Irish Society, and £170 as a gift and £380 as a loan by the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house, towards the erection of which the same Board made a loan of £297 and a gift of £402, was built in 1822: the glebe comprises 50 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Killowen, or Coleraine, comprising also the parishes of Dunboe, Macosquin, and Aghadowy, and containing three chapels, situated respectively at Killowen, Dunboe, and Aghadowy. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. About 270 children are educated in five public schools, of which the parochial schools are assisted by a gift of £20 per annum from the Clothworkers' Company, by grants from the Irish Society, and by a donation from the rector; a school at Laurel Hill was founded and endowed with £50 per annum by the late R. Kyle, Esq., in 1830. There are also three Sunday schools. Remains of some fine encampments or forts may be seen at Cranagh Hill and Ballycarn, and one of smaller dimensions near the church. On the confines of the parish, near Camus, are two strongly impregnated springs, one chalybeate, the other holding pure sulphur in solution.

KILLOWER, a parish, in the union of Tuam, barony of Clare, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 4½ miles (W. by N.) from Tuam, on the road from that place to Headford; containing 905 inhabitants. It comprises 3596½ statute acres, of which a considerable quantity is reclaimable bog. Fairs are held at Castle-Hackett on June 2nd and Oct. 2nd. The seats are Castle-Hackett, Cloonaghmore, and Silane. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Headford: the tithe rent-charge is £84. 9. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish forms part of the union or district of Headford. There are the ruins of a castle at Castle-Hackett.

KILLOWILLAN, a parish, in the union of Fermoy, barony of Barrymore, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Fermoy, on the road from that place to Tallow; containing about 335 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1093 statute acres, was originally a townland in the parish of Castle-Lyons, but became a parish on being given by Charles II. to the Bishop of Cloyne, as part of his mensal lands. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, entirely appropriate to the bishop's mensal: the tithe rent-charge is £41. 10. 9. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Castle-Lyons.

KILL-ST.-LAWRENCE, a parish, in the barony of Gaultier, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Waterford; containing 71 inhabitants, and 308 statute acres. It was a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, forming part of the late union of Killure: the tithe rent-charge is £18. 15.

KILL ST. NICHOLAS, a parish, in the barony of Gaultier, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 5 miles (E.) from Waterford, and on Waterford harbour; containing, with the town of Passage, 1743 inhabitants. It comprises 2884 statute acres, including a very small quantity of bog, and abundance of good building-stone. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, united episcopally in 1813 to the rectory of Faithlegg, and more recently to that of Crook, and in the gift of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £156. 9., and of the whole union £381. 13. The church is at Passage, and was lately repaired by a grant of £239 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is a glebe of 22½ acres, but no glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Faithlegg and Killea, and has a chapel at Passage. At Cross are some vitriolic springs.—See Passage.

KILLUA, or Killoah, a parish, in the union of Kells, barony of Delvin, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Athboy, on the road from that place to Oldcastle; containing, with the town of Clonmellon, 1950 inhabitants. It comprises 5259¼ statute acres, about half of which is in tillage; and contains limestone, but neither waste land nor bog. Killua Castle is the handsome castellated residence of Sir T. Chapman, Bart., and contains a fine collection of paintings by the old masters; the demesne comprises more than 500 acres, and includes a sheet of water, an obelisk to Sir Walter Raleigh, and the ruins of a commandery of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. Ballinlough Castle, the seat of Sir J. Nugent, Bart., is in a demesne of above 300 acres. Killua is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Killallon; the rectory is impropriate in N. Ogle, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £93. 15., of which £60 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, which is at Clonmellon, and is a neat structure with a handsome spire, was built about 60 years since, partly at the expense of Sir B. Chapman, and has been repaired by a grant of £251 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Clonmellon, including also the parishes of Killallon and Clonarney, and containing chapels at Clonmellon and Killallon; the former is a neat building, with a detached belfry. Here is an almshouse for four poor women, who have a weekly allowance from the Chapman family; and in Clonmellon are ten almshouses for aged and infirm labourers, who have each more than an acre of land, and £2 per annum, £5 being appropriated for keeping the houses in repair: they were established under the will of Sir B. Chapman. There are some remains of the old church, with a burial-ground attached, which is the place of interment of the Chapman family. —See Clonmellon.

KILLUCAN, a post-town and parish, in the union of Mullingar, partly in the barony of Delvin, but chiefly in that of Farbill, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 6½ miles (E.) from Mullingar, and 33 miles (W. by N.) from Dublin, on the road to Sligo and Galway; containing 9562 inhabitants, of whom 181 are in the town. This place, which is also called Killuquin, appears to have derived its name from an abbey founded here by St. Lucian, and which subsequently became the parish church. A castle called Rathwire was erected by Hugh de Lacy, of which only the foundations and some of the outworks are at present discernible. The town consists of 29 houses; is a constabulary police station; and has a sub-post-office in connexion with Kinnegad. A market is held weekly, and a handsome market-house has lately been built by Lord Longford: there are fairs on March 27th, May 25th, Sept. 29th, and Nov. 28th; and petty-sessions every Saturday. The PARISH, with the district parish of Kinnegad, comprises 35,589¾ statute acres; the surface is greatly diversified. The land is in general fertile, and principally under tillage; there are some large dairy-farms, and the system of agriculture is improved. Within the parish are some extensive tracts of bog: a railroad was recently laid down at Griffinstown, by Mr. Featherston-Haugh, for draining the bog on that estate. There are very fine quarries of black flagstone, from which were taken materials for the custom-house docks of Dublin; and on Sion Hill is a quarry having the appearance of slate, but it is not worked. The principal seats are, Lotown, situated in a richly wooded demesne; Griffinstown House; Hyde Park; Wardinstown; Curristown; Lisnabin, a handsome castellated mansion recently erected; Huntingdon; Joristown; Grangemore, a handsome house in a well-planted demesne; Riverdale; Craddenstown; Corbetstown; and Derrymoe. On the demesne of Joristown is the hill of Knockshiban, a conspicuous landmark, commanding a very extensive prospect over a richly diversified tract of country. The Royal Canal passes through the parish: there are several very small lakes; and to the west are some dry limestone tracts, curiously interspersed with patches of bog.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £804. 6. The church, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £100 and granted a loan of £1200, in 1816, is a handsome edifice with a well-proportioned spire, and contains the sepulchral vault of the Pakenham family. The glebe-house is a neat residence, and the glebe comprises 41 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: there are two chapels, situated respectively at Rathwire and Rathfarne. Of several public schools, one is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's fund, who allow the master £30 per annum, with a house and garden rent-free; and two by Lord and Lady Longford: there is a dispensary. In the old parish church were several chapels or chantries, the largest of which was dedicated to St. Mary; and at Clonfad, on the southern confines of the parish, was a very ancient religious establishment, of which St. Etchen, who died in 577, was bishop: there are still some remains of the church. Numerous raths exist in the parish; and on a hill near Lisnabin are the remains of some works called Pakenham's Fort, commanding an extensive prospect. At Ratteen are the remains of a castle, in which the Lord-Lieutenant, who in 1450 had been made prisoner, was confined for some time. Many silver coins of the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., and the protectorate, were found in two tin vessels, in ploughing near Griffinstown.

KILLUKEN, or KILLUCAN, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Carrick to Ballina; containing, with part of the market and post town of Carrick (with the rest of which it is connected by a bridge over the Shannon), 2963 inhabitants. It comprises about 1831 statute acres, and is principally under tillage, although there are several grazing-farms; the waste land consists chiefly of bog, most of which might be reclaimed, but at a considerable expense. Limestone of excellent quality abounds, and is quarried in several places for building and burning. The river Shannon skirts a small portion of the parish, and its navigation being connected with the Royal Canal at Tarmonbarry, goods can be shipped at Carrick bridge for Dublin. The principal seats are Crogan House, Cashell, Fairview, and Hermitage. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Elphin, forming the corps of the archdeaconry of Elphin; it was till lately united to the vicarages of Kilbrine and Kilcorkey, and the rectory of Ardcarne, together forming the union of Killuken, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £76. 1. The church is a very old building. There is an excellent glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £400 and lent £240, in 1816; the glebe comprises 13 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Eastersnow and Killumod, and parts of Tumna and Kilcola; which district is sometimes called Crogan and Ballynameen, and contains chapels at Crogan, Drumacool, and Drumlion, in this parish.—See CROGHAN.

KILLUKEN, a parish, in the barony and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Strokestown, on the road from that place to Castlerea; containing 3445 inhabitants. It comprises 5956¾ statute acres, the best of which is in large grazing-farms, and that of inferior quality in small arable farms; there is a great quantity of bog. Of the several lakes, Ardekellen is the largest. Limestone abounds, but it is not quarried. Killuken is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Ardclare; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork: the tithe rent-charge is £112. 1. 9., of which £53. 16. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kilcooley. There are several forts, the largest of them called Rathmore.

KILLUMOD, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Carrick-on-Shannon, on the road from that place to Elphin; containing 1857 inhabitants. It comprises 5159¾ statute acres, including several small lakes, and a quantity of bog; there is some excellent limestone. At Cartron are a bleach-green and a corn-mill. Killumod is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Aughrim; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton: the tithe rent-charge is £63, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killuken. Here are the remains of an old church, with a cemetery attached.

KILLUNAVARRA, or KILLEENAVARRA, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of DUNKELLIN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Gort, on the road from that place to Galway; containing 1717 inhabitants. It comprises 5173¾ statute acres, generally poor rocky land, though, from the use of sea-weed as manure, the land produces good crops. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Kilcolgan; the rectory is appropriate to the see of Clonfert and the living of Ardrahan: the tithe rent-charge is £89. 2. 6., of which £23. 18. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £43. 6. 3. to the incumbent of Ardrahan, and the remainder to the vicar. At Clough is a school to which Mr. Blake has given a house and 15 acres of land. There are some small remains of the church.

KILLURANE, a parish, in the union of SCARIFF, barony of LOWER TULLA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 6¼ miles (N. W. by W.) from Killaloe, and on the road from Broadford to Tulla; containing 3058 inhabitants. It comprises 7103¾ statute acres, of which about 440 are mountain pasture and bog, and nearly all the remainder arable land; part of Doon lake is in this parish. The manufacture of hair-cloth and coarse carpets is carried on to a small extent at Bally-M'Donnell. The principal seats are Derrimore, Doon, and Elm Hill. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilseily; the rectory is appropriate to the prebend of Tomgrany and the union of Omullod. The tithe rent-charge is £153. 1., of which £58. 14. are payable to the incumbent of Omullod, £24. 2. 6. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kilkishene, and has a chapel at Callaghans-Mills, which see. There are ruins of ancient castles at Monegona, Tierovane, and on the shore of the lake of Doon.

KILLURE, a parish, in the barony of GAULTIER, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Waterford, on the road to Dunmore; containing 124 inhabitants. This parish, which in its civil relations is considered as forming part of the parish of Kill-St.-Lawrence, comprises 627 statute acres. The living, which was lately suppressed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, united, with the rectory of Kill-St.-Lawrence, in 1787, to the rectories of Rossduff, Corbally, and Kilronan, together forming the union of Killure, in the patronage of the Bishop: the commissioners now appoint a curate, to whom they allow £25 a year. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £32. 5., and of the whole union £126: there is neither glebe-house nor glebe. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded here in the 12th century; it was subsequently given to the Knights Hospitallers, and after its dissolution was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Nicholas Aylmer, for 50 years, at an annual rent of £13. 6. 8.

KILLURIN, a parish, in the barony of SHELMALIER WEST, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Wexford, on the road from that place to Enniscorthy; containing, with the ancient but now merged parish of Chapel-Charon, 651 inhabitants. It comprises 1873½ statute acres, which are tolerably well cultivated. The seats are, Killurin House, the property of the Earl of Arran; Healthfield; and Penzance. A post-office has been established in the village. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, united by act of council, in 1776, to the impropriate curacies of Kilbride-Glynn, Chapel-Charon, and Whitechurch-Glynn, and episcopally to the impropriate curacy of Ballyheogue, together forming the union of Killurin, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth. The tithe rent-charge is £64. 17., of which £29. 2. 9. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent. The church, built in 1785, is a neat edifice with a tower, and had a painted window, which was destroyed in the disturbances of 1798. The glebe-house is a handsome building, erected in 1809, at a cost exceeding £1300, towards which the Board of First Fruits gave £100; the glebe comprises 24 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Glynn, comprising the parishes of Killurin, Kilbride-Glynn, Ardcandridge, and Carrigg, and parts of Coolstuffe, Whitechurch-Glynn, and the extra-parochial mountain of Forth: there is a neat chapel at Glynn, contiguous to which is a residence for the priest, given, with five acres of land, by Mr. Devereux; and there is another chapel at Barntown, in Carrigg. The parochial school, with apartments for the master, was erected in 1829 by the vicar, who gave an acre of land, and subscribes £12 per annum towards its support: about 80 children are educated in it. Here are the ruins of Carrigmanon, the ancient residence of the Devereux family. Cornwall, a small fishing-village on the river Slaney, is also in this parish.

KILLURSA, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with part of the post-town of Headford, 4995 inhabitants. It is situated on Lough Corrib, and comprises 8877½ statute acres; there is a great quantity of bog and limestone. Killursa is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Headford; the tithe rent-charge is £166. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions also the parish forms part of the union or district of Headford, and has a chapel, built in 1770 at an expense of £350. About 230 children are educated in public schools, two of which are entirely supported by R. Mansergh St. George, Esq., and the rector.

KILLURY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (E.) from Ballyheigue; containing 6480 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the southern shore of the estuary of the Shannon, and comprises 11,090 statute acres, a large portion of which consists of mountain pasture and bog: the state of agriculture is slowly improving. Petty-sessions are held every alternate Monday at Ballynoe. The gentlemen's seats are Ballynoe and Sandville House. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Crosbie family: the tithe rent-charge is £294. 5. The church, a neat structure, was lately built by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £498; it, and the glebe-house, a commodious modern residence, are situated about half a mile west of the village of Causeway. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms the head of the district of Causeway, which also includes the parishes of Ballyheigue and Rattoo; each parish contains a chapel. Two new school-houses have been built by the National Education Board. The ruins of the castles of Browne and De Cantlon still remain. On the rocky coast at Minegahane, the sea, at certain seasons, makes a prodigious noise, similar to the discharge of cannon, and which is heard at a considerable distance; it is said to precede the change of wind, and generally to indicate the approach of a storm.—See CAUSEWAY.

KILLYAN.—See KILLIAN.

KILLYBEGS, a sea-port, market, and post town, a parish, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the union of GLENTIES, partly in the barony of BOYLAGH, but chiefly in that of BANNAGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 38 miles (S. W.) from Lifford, and 127 miles (N. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Ballyshannon and Donegal to Rutland; containing 8128 inhabitants, of whom 798 are in the town. This place, which is situated on the north-west coast, was at a very early period one of the principal sea-ports in this part of the country, and formed a portion of the territories of the chiefs of Tyrconnell. The emissary of Philip II., King of Spain, landed here in 1596; and in April of the following year, a vessel from that country, laden with supplies for O'Donnell, and having some confidential agents on board, arrived for the purpose of conferring with that chieftain. In 1600, another vessel from Spain, with supplies for O'Donnell and O'Nial, landed here, and brought also a large sum of money, in order to promote the object they had in contemplation. On the plantation of Ulster, 200 acres of land were granted by James I. to Roger Jones, Esq., on condition of his laying out the site of a town, building 20 houses with land for burgesses, and assigning convenient spots for market-places, for a church and churchyard, a public school and playground, and 30 acres of common.

The TOWN is situated at the head of a beautiful and safe harbour, to which it gives name, and at the base of a vast mountainous tract extending northward; and consists of 149 houses. It is the head of a coast-guard district, comprising the stations of Dooran, Tribane, Tiellen-East, Tiellen-West, Mallinbeg, Daurus, Port Noo, and Neptune Tower, with a force of four officers and 56 men, under the control of a resident inspecting commander. A constabulary police force is also stationed here. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on Jan. 15th, Easter-Monday, May 6th, June 21st, Aug. 12th, Sept. 15th, and Nov. 12th, for general farming stock. The harbour is nearly circular in form, well sheltered, and accessible to ships of considerable burthen; vessels not drawing more than ten feet of water may anchor near the town, but the best anchorage is in $8\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms near the west side. At sea the harbour is known by the remarkably sharp pointed summit of Cruanard Hill, which is higher than any other in the neighbourhood, and to the south of which is the entrance. By charter of James I., in the 13th year of his reign, the inhabitants were incorporated under the designation of the "Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Calebegg." The corporation consisted of a provost elected annually and twelve free burgesses appointed for life, who had the power of admitting freemen; and under their charter the portreeve and free burgesses continued to return two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to Henry, Earl of Conyngham. A court of record, with jurisdiction extending to £2, was held every third Thursday; but it has been discontinued for many years, and the corporation has become altogether extinct. Petty-sessions are held irregularly.

The PARISH, from which a portion has been separated to form the district parish of Ardara, is for civil purposes distinguished into Upper and Lower Killybegs, the former containing 4838, and the latter 3290 inhabitants. It comprises $30,962\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, of which $4304\frac{1}{4}$ are in that part of Lower Killybegs which is in the barony of Boylagh; $11,074\frac{1}{4}$, including a detached portion, and 51 covered with water, are in the other part, in the barony of Bannagh; and $15,583\frac{3}{4}$, including $41\frac{3}{4}$ covered with water, are in Upper Killybegs, in the barony of Bannagh. Two-thirds of the whole are mountain and uncultivated land: agriculture is in a very unimproved state. The principal seats are Wood Hill and Fintra. The living is a consolidated rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £225. The church, a neat small edifice, was built (on rising ground to the east of the town) in 1825, at an expense of £1000, being a loan from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is of recent erection; the glebe comprehends six townlands, comprising together 2000 Irish acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Killaghtee. A new and handsome Roman Catholic chapel, St. Mary's, was opened here for divine service on the 25th of December, 1844; it is a cruciform structure, standing on an area of 8000 square feet, and is 55 feet in height, capped in the Elizabethan style, and having a tower, yet unfinished, supported by four Gothic arches: this edifice was designed from an ancient ruin in the neighbourhood. There is also a chapel in Killaghtee. A small Franciscan friary was founded here by Mac Swiney Bannig, but there are no remains. Some ruins of the castle of St. Catherine yet exist.

KILLYBEGS, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of CLANE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S. W.) from Clane, and on the Grand Canal; containing 1216 inhabitants. It comprises 2628 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, forming part of the union of Clane: the tithe rent-charge is £85. 2. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is part of the district of Carogh and Prosperous, and has a chapel at the latter place.

KILLYGALLY.—See TESSAURAN.

KILLYGARVAN, a parish, in the union of MILFORD, barony of KILMACRENAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 12 miles (N. E. by N.) from Letterkenny; containing, with the town of Rathmullen, 3644 inhabitants, and comprising 9132 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Raphoe, and was formerly part of the corps of the deanery, from which it was separated by act of council, in 1835; the living is now a rectory and vicarage, in the gift of the Crown, and the tithe rent-charge is 115. 10. The church is a plain building, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £900, and lent £300, in 1813. The Board also gave £450, and lent £50, for the erection of a glebe-house, in 1818: the glebe comprises 5*a.* 1*r.* 17*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tullyaughnish, and has a chapel. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and one for Wesleyan Methodists.

KILLYGLEN, a parish, in the union of LARNE, barony of UPPER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Larne, on the road from that place to Glenarm; containing 605 inhabitants. This parish, which in the Ordnance survey is called a grange belonging to Killegan parish, comprises 2295½ statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Connor: the tithe rent-charge is £46. 12. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Larne.

KILLYGORDON, a village, in the parish of DONAGHMORE, union of STRANORLAR, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER; containing 294 inhabitants.

KILLYLEA, a district parish, in the union of ARMAGH, partly in the barony of ARMAGH, and partly in that of TURENEY, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (W.) from the city of Armagh; containing about 6000 inhabitants. This district, which is on the road from Armagh to Caledon, was formed out of the parishes of Armagh, Tynan, and Derrynoose, under the provisions of the act 8th George IV. cap. 43; and comprises 5743 statute acres of very fertile arable and pasture land, under an excellent system of cultivation. A great part of the parish and the whole of the village belong to Trinity College, Dublin. There are some excellent quarries of freestone, clay-slate, and limestone, the last of which is extensively worked, there being in connexion with it a manufactory of tombstones, gate-piers, window-stools, &c.: coal also exists, but is not worked. Linen-weaving is carried on to a considerable extent; and a large number of the young females are constantly employed in the embroidering of muslins for the Scotch houses in that trade.

The village, which is on the side of a planted hill near the Ulster canal, contains 337 inhabitants, and consists of one long street of houses built of stone, terminated by the church, which stands on the top of the hill, and forms a conspicuous object for many miles round, the eminence being so great that no less than twenty-five churches are visible to the naked eye from the churchyard, together with a rich and varied view extending into seven counties. A post-office here, with a mail twice a day, is in connexion with the Armagh and Tynan offices; and a well-attended cattle-fair is held on the last Friday of each month. A monthly manor court is holden for the recovery of debts under 40s. The principal seats in the parish and neighbourhood are, Elm Park, the residence of the Earl of Charlemont; Caledon House, of the Earl of Caledon; Tynan Abbey, of Sir James M. Stronge, Bart.; Glasslough House, of C. P. Leslie, Esq.; Knappa; Wood Park, of Acheson St. George, Esq.; Fellows Hall; Mount Irwin; Bondville; Ashfort; Port-Nelligan; Annagola; and Dartan. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the alternate patronage of the Rectors of Armagh, Derrynoose, and Tynan, each of whom contributes to the perpetual curate's stipend. The church, which is one of the neatest rural churches in the diocese, was built by subscription, in 1831-2, at a cost of about £1650, partly defrayed by a grant of £900 from the Board of First Fruits; the roof is of metal, and the building has a handsome square tower. There are four schools, one of which is in connexion with the Ladies' (London) Female School Society, who give a liberal salary to the teacher, and provide working materials and requisites for the pupils; another is endowed by Trinity College, Dublin; the third by Lady Hassard, on whose property it is situated; and the fourth by Colonel Close, the proprietor of the estate on which it is built. Two of the railways about to be commenced, viz.: those to connect Newry and Enniskillen, and Armagh and Omagh, respectively, will run through this district.

KILLYLEAGH, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, partly in the barony of CASTLEREAGH, but chiefly in that of DUFFERIN, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Downpatrick, and 78¾ (N. by N.) from Dublin, on the coach-road from Belfast to Downpatrick; containing 6688 inhabitants, of whom 1116 are in the town. This place, which is situated on the western shore of Strangford lough, was a port of some eminence previously to the conquest of Ireland by the English; and, with the adjoining barony of Kinalarty, formed part of the territories of the native sept of the M'Cartans. It was afterwards granted to De Courcy, who, in order to protect it from the attacks of the powerful chieftain of that sept, erected castles on every advantageous site round the shore of the lake, among which the principal was the castle of Dufferin. In 1356, Edward III. appointed John De Mandeville warden of this castle, which subsequently fell into the hands of the O'Nials, who maintained possession of it till 1561, when the adjoining territory was by Elizabeth granted to Hugo White, who shortly afterwards erected a castle at Killyleagh, into which he removed his warden from Castle Dufferin. Shane O'Nial besieged the newly erected castle in 1567, when, meeting with a powerful resistance, he set fire to the town; and a league being subsequently made between the M'Cartans and the O'Nials, they jointly attacked the castle, dispossessed the family of White, and usurped the uncontrolled dominion of the entire country. On the suppression of the Tyrone rebellion at the close of the 16th century, the possessions of the M'Cartans were confiscated; and the manor and district of Killyleagh were eventually granted by James I. to Sir James Hamilton, who restored and considerably enlarged the castle, which, after his elevation to the peerage by the title of Lord Claneboy, he made his principal residence. The castle was besieged and taken by General Monk for the parliament, in 1648, and was partly demolished in the war of that period, but was substantially repaired in 1666, and in it was born Archibald Hamilton Rowan, whose grandson is now the proprietor. It is a large and strong pile of building in the later English style, occupying an eminence which commands the town; but affords no protection to the harbour.

The TOWN is pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence on the western shore of Strangford lough, and consists of two nearly parallel streets, intersected by a longer street, which forms the principal thoroughfare; it contains 226 houses, built principally of clay-slate found in the parish. The cotton manufacture is carried on upon a very extensive scale. Some mills were built upon a copious stream, in 1824, by Messrs. Martin and Co., and were greatly enlarged in 1828: in these works are 13,798 spindles employing 186 persons, and 244 power-looms attended by 156 persons constantly engaged in weaving printers' cloths for the Manchester market; and connected with this manufactory are more than 2000 hand-looms in the neighbouring districts. The buildings, which are very spacious and six stories high, are lighted with gas made on the premises, and the proprietors have erected a steam-engine of 35-horse power. The trade of the port is limited, and consists principally in the exportation of wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, butter, kelp, and cotton goods; and in the importation of cotton, wool, coal, iron, salt, and general merchandise. The harbour is well sheltered, and is accessible to vessels not drawing more than 10 feet of water: the quay and basin are very commodious, and were completed in 1833, at an expense of more than £1000, defrayed solely by the late Lord Dufferin. The market is on Friday, and the fairs on April 10th, Trinity-Monday, Oct. 11th, and Dec. 11th. A constabulary police force is stationed in the town, and there are barracks for the North Down militia, of which this place is the head-quarters. The inhabitants received a charter from James I., in the 10th year of his reign, by which they were incorporated under the designation of the "Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Killileagh." By this charter the corporation consisted of a provost (annually elected), 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, assisted by a town-clerk, two sergeants-at-mace, and other officers, all of whom were chosen by the provost and free burgesses, by whom also freemen were admitted. In 1840 this body was abolished. The corporation, under their charter, returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to Sir James Stevenson Blackwood, Bart., afterwards Lord Dufferin. The court of record for the borough, which had jurisdiction to the extent of five marks, has long been discontinued. The seneschal of the manor, who is appointed by Mr. Hamilton, holds a court every three weeks for the recovery of debts not exceeding £10, and a court-leet annually; a court of petty-sessions is held every alternate week.

The parish comprises 11,759¼ statute acres (including 123¼ under water), of which 988¼ are in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, and the remainder in that of Dufferin. The soil is generally fertile, and the system of agriculture improved; there is very little waste land, and the bogs are productive both of turf and of bog-fir. Here are extensive quarries of basalt and clay-slate, from which was taken the whole of the stone of which the town is built. The principal seats are Delamont, Ringdufferin, Killyleagh Castle, Tullyvery House, Ardigon House, Shrigley, Gosean, and the handsome residence of the Hon. Hans Blackwood in the town. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £596. 5. The church, a handsome cruciform structure, with a tower surmounted by a spire of good proportions, was originally built in 1640, but becoming dilapidated, was rebuilt, and the tower and the spire added, by Lord Dufferin, at an expense of more than £5000, exclusively of a loan of £2000 from the Board of First Fruits in 1812. It contains some good monuments, including one to the memory of Captain Blackwood, who fell at Waterloo; another to Captain Blackwood of the North Downshire militia; and a third to the Rev. James Clewlow: in the churchyard is the sepulchral vault of the Dufferin family, recently erected, in which Admiral Blackwood was interred, and near which is a monument raised by the parishioners to the Rev. Peter Carlton, the late rector. The glebe-house, towards the erection of which, in 1815, the Board of First Fruits contributed £100 and a loan of £1350, is a very handsome residence; the glebe comprises 14 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmore: the chapel, a small neat building, was erected in 1832. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. Of several schools, three were built and are supported by Lord and Lady Dufferin, D. Gordon, Esq., and the Rev. A. R. Hamilton. The remains of the ancient parish church are still visible, in a low marshy meadow to the north-west of the town; the eastern gable, perforated with two narrow lancet-shaped windows, is yet standing. Sir Hans Sloane, the celebrated physician and naturalist, was born here in 1660. The barony of which this place is the head gives the title of Baron to the family of Blackwood, Barons of Dufferin and Claneboy.

KILLYMAN, a parish, in the union of ARMAGH, partly in the barony of O'NEILLAND WEST, county of ARMAGH, but chiefly in that of DUNGANNON, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Moy; on the river Blackwater, and the road from Belfast to Dungannon; containing 8220 inhabitants. It comprises 10,559½ statute acres, of which 3154¾ are in Armagh, and 7404½ in Tyrone. The land is exceedingly fertile, and the system of agriculture improved; there is abundance of bog, and on the lands of Dungorman a quarry of red sandstone, which is chiefly used for building and for flags. The river for nearly two miles forms a boundary here between the counties, and, after separating those parts of the parish which are in opposite baronies, falls into Lough Neagh; it is crossed by Verner's bridge, a handsome structure of one arch, with others on each side forming a continued causeway, which is frequently overflowed, leaving only the central arch visible above the river. The surface of the parish is marked by numerous elevations, the highest of which are Drumina, Roan hill, and Lowertown, the valleys between which are good meadow land. There are extensive meadows along the banks of the Blackwater and the Roan; and at Bernagh is an extensive wood of full-grown oaks, which, with the plantations of Roan hill and the other woods and plantations in the parish, has a very fine effect. Limestone, freestone, basalt, quartz, clay, and clay-slate are found in abundance; there are also indications of coal. In the sandstone near Roan hill are interesting specimens of fossil fish entirely perfect, with the fins minutely distinct. The gentlemen's seats are, Bernagh, a handsome mansion on the great line of road; Church Hill, the seat of Colonel Verner, M.P., who was created a baronet June 27, 1846, a spacious and elegant residence, situated in an extensive and improved demesne, and commanding a fine view of the river Blackwater; Brookfield; Rhone Hill; Tamnamore; and Cranebrook. The manufacture of linen and cotton is extensively carried on throughout the neighbourhood; and there are three large bleach-greens; at Twyford is a paper-mill, and at Lower Corr, a large manufactory for coarse earthenware, besides others on a smaller scale in various parts of the parish. At Verner's-Bridge is a receiving-house for letters under Moy; and a manorial court is held monthly by the seneschal of the Lord Primate, in which debts to the amount of £5 are recoverable. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £363. 9. The church, a neat structure, was erected in 1824, by a loan of £2000 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe-house is a handsome edifice, and the glebe comprises 229 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Dungannon; the chapel is a neat stone building, roofed with slate. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. About 250 children are taught in four public schools, of which the parochial school is aided by £10 annually from the incumbent; another is partly supported by Richard Lloyd, Esq., and one wholly by Sir W. Verner. At Mullinakill is an ancient cemetery, which is still used.

KILLYMARD, a parish, in the barony of BANNAGH, union and county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, on the western side of the town of Donegal, from which it is separated by the river Esk; containing 4743 inhabitants. It comprises 28,230 statute acres, of which 470¼ are in Lough Esk and 202½ in smaller loughs: about 18,000 are barren mountain and waste land. The principal seats are Lough Esk and Rosselongan. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, forming the corps of the prebend of Killymard in the cathedral of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £207. 14. per annum. The Board of First Fruits, in 1830, granted a loan of £800 for the erection of the church, and, in 1816, gave £200 and lent £600 for the erection of the glebe-house, which has a glebe of 495 statute acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a small chapel. Here are also a place of worship for Presbyterians of the Seceding Synod, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. Within the limits of the parish is a fine sulphureous spa of great efficacy in cutaneous diseases, over which Mr. Murray, its proprietor, has erected a pump-room, and hot, cold, and shower baths.

KILLYON, a parish, in the union of TRIM, barony of UPPER MOYFENRAGH, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Clonard; on the road from Trim to Kinnegad, and on the river Boyne; containing 784 inhabitants. It comprises 4316½ statute acres: the land is generally fertile, and there is some meadow and pasture of superior quality on the banks of the Boyne; there are several patches of bog. The Royal Canal passes through the southern part of the parish. Killyon House is the property of the representatives of the late Lady Loftus, but is at present unoccupied. The parish is in the diocese of Meath: the rectory is impropriate in Lady Loftus' representatives, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Clonard; the tithe rent-charge is £103. 16. 11., of which £69. 4. 7½. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Killyon is part of the district of Longwood, and has a chapel. There are some remains of the church.

KILMACABEA, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, partly in the Eastern division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, but chiefly in the West division of that of EAST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 11½ miles (W.) from Clonakilty, and on the road from Cork to Skibbereen; containing 6209 inhabitants. It is situated at the head of Glandore harbour, and comprises 13,757 statute acres; there are about 100 acres of plantations and 1400 of bog, besides several small lakes. The land is generally rocky; about two-thirds are under tillage; but agriculture is in an unimproved state. The substratum is clay-slate, with some calcareous schist and magnesian limestone. The living, until recently, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, united to Kilfaughnabeg, and in the gift of the Bishop: the rectory was partly appropriate to the economy fund of Ross cathedral, partly impropriate in the Gumbleton family, and partly united to those of Kilfaughnabeg, Kilcoe, Aghadown, Kilcaskin, and part of Tullagh, which formed the corps of the archdeaconry of Ross, also in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe composition amounted to £590, of which £99. 5. 6. were payable to the impropriator, £19. 16. 9. to the economy fund, £175. 17. 9. to the archdeacon, and £295 to the vicar; the entire tithes of the vicarial union amounted to £435, and of the corps of the archdeaconry to £774. 16. 9. At present, the living of Kilmacabea is a separate vicarage, with part of the rectory united, the remainder of the rectory being chiefly impropriate in the Townsend family; the tithe rent-charge is £442. 10., of which £74. 9. 2. are payable to the impropriator, £14. 17. 7. to the economy fund, and the rest to the incumbent. The archdeacon now receives no tithe. The church, a handsome building with a lofty square tower, in the village of Leap, was erected in 1828, at an expense of £900, by the Board of First Fruits. There is a glebe of 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Kilfaughnabeg, and has a large and commodious chapel at Leap. The parochial school was endowed with an acre of land by the late General O'Donovan, and there are various national and other schools. The ruins of the old church are near the village of Leap, the neighbourhood of which is very romantic and beautiful.

KILMACAHILL.—See KILMOCAHILL.

KILMACALLANE, or KILMACALLEN, a parish, in the barony of TIRAGHRILL, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. E.) from Collooney, on the road from that place to Ballyfarnon; containing 5098 inhabitants. It comprises 9928 statute acres: the land, which is chiefly in tillage, is wet and spongy, and there is a considerable quantity of bog and marsh. Fairs are held at Castle-Baldwin on June 4th and Nov. 3rd. The principal seats are, Cooper's Hill, the residence of the Cooper family; Lakeview; and Heapstown. It is a rectory and vicarage, and was formerly a prebend also, in the diocese of Elphin: the prebend consisted of portions of the tithes of Taunagh, Drumcollum, Ballynakill, and Ballysumaghan, amounting under the Composition act to £158. 15. 4.; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton, and the tithe rent-charge of Kilmacallane is £124. 2. 4., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar; the vicarage was till recently part of the union of Boyle. The church, a plain building in Riverstown, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £183, was erected in 1817, the Board of First Fruits having given £900, and lent £500. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 19 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Riverstown, comprising this parish, Drumcollum, and Taunagh, and containing chapels at Riverstown and Ballycash. There is also a meeting-house for Wesleyan Methodists at Riverstown. Part of the old church remains, and its burial-ground is still used as a cemetery.

KILMACALOGUE.—See TUOSIST.

KILMACANOGUE, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Bray, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford; containing 2336 inhabitants. The village comprises 17 houses, and is situated between the bases of the Great and Small Sugar Loaf mountains, on the road to the Glen of the Downs. The parish comprises $5401\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, including a considerable quantity of mountainous waste land and some bog; the system of agriculture is improving. The seats are, Hollybrooke House, the residence of Sir G. F. Hodson, Bart., a handsome mansion in the Elizabethan style, erected in 1835, and surrounded with beautiful grounds; Wingfield; Kilmacanogue House; Grove Hill; and several other good houses. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, forming part of the union of Delgany: the tithe rent-charge is £90. 12. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Bray, and contains a small chapel. The remains of the church, covered with ivy, are in the burial-ground. General Wolfe was born at Kilmurry, in this parish.

KILMACDONOUGH, a parish, in the union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Youghal; containing 3838 inhabitants. It forms a peninsula on the south-western side of Youghal bay, and comprises 6241 statute acres; its general aspect is hilly, and the coast bold and rocky. At the extremity is Ring Point, about half a mile from which is Capell Island, which is separately described. The small village of Ballymacoda is situated about a mile from the coast, on an inlet of the bay, from which at low water a great quantity of sand is obtained. In the parish are a coast-guard station, a signal tower, and a dispensary: the principal seats are, Ballykinnelly, which was formerly a religious establishment; Ring; and Greenland. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, forming part of the union of Kilcredan: the rectory was till lately the corps of the prebend of Kilmacdonough in the cathedral of Cloyne. The tithe rent-charge is £759. 11. 9., of which £506. 7. 6. are now payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Ballymacoda, which includes the parishes of Kilmacdonough, Kilcredan, Ightermurragh, and Bobillane, and contains chapels at Ballymacoda and Lady's-Bridge. There are two national schools, and a Sunday school supported by the vicar. Here are the ruins of Ballymacoda Castle, which is said to have been built by Thomas Fitzgerald in 1521; and of an old church.

KILMACDUAGH, a parish, and the seat of a diocese, in the union of GORT, barony of KILTARTAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, at the junction of the roads from Ennis to Galway and Ballinasloe; containing, with part of the post-town of Gort, 4149 inhabitants. This SEE was founded by St. Colman, son of Duach, of the noble family of Hy Fiacrii of Connaught, distinguished from other Colmans, his contemporaries, by the appellation of Mac Duach, and who, after seven years' strict seclusion, about the year 620 fixed his residence at this place, where he built a monastery and church, called after him Killmac-Duach, whence the diocese has taken its name. The establishment was amply endowed by Guair, then king of Connaught, and by his successors. Mac Duach presided over the diocese till his death: of his successors previously to the arrival of the English, there occurs the name of one only, Indrect, who died in 814. Maurice, bishop of this see, who died in 1283, erected on the site of the original foundation, at a short distance from the present cathedral church, a monastery for Augustinian canons, which subsisted till the Reformation, when it was granted to the Earl of Clanrickarde. Stephen Kerovan, who was consecrated in 1573, was translated to the see of Clonfert in 1582, from which time this see remained vacant till 1587, when Roland Linch succeeded to the prelacy; and he being, in 1602, translated to the see of Clonfert, obtained permission to hold this diocese with it in commendam, since which period the two sees continued to be held together till the recent death of the Right Rev. Dr. Butson, when both were annexed to the see of Killaloe, and the temporalities vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV.

Kilmacduagh is one of the sixteen dioceses that constitute the Ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and is wholly within the county of Galway, comprising an estimated superficies of 64,000 acres. The lands belonging to the see comprise $3950\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and the gross revenue, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £875. The Quarta Pars still prevails in this diocese; the bishop, or rather the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, receiving one-fourth part of the tithe of every parish. The chapter consists of a dean, archdeacon, treasurer, precentor, and provost, with the two prebendaries of Kinvarra and Island-Eddy: there are neither minor canons nor vicars-choral, and there is no economy fund. The total number of parishes in the diocese is 21, comprised in four unions or benefices, of which one is in the patronage of the Crown, one in that of the Marquess of Clanrickarde, one in that of the Bishop, and one in the alternate patronage of the Bishop and the Marquess. There are four churches, one other building in which divine service is performed, and four glebe-houses: the cathedral, which is also the parish church of Kilmacduagh, is a modern edifice. In the Roman Catholic divisions the diocese is united with that of Kilfenora, and comprises 11 parochial benefices or unions, containing 14 chapels, which are served by 15 clergymen, of whom 11 are parish priests and 4 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of the bishop is Kinvarra, where he resides.

K I L—M A

The parish comprises 8804½ statute acres, of which about 600 are waste and exhausted bog, and the remainder in a tolerable state of cultivation; from the exhausted state of the bogs, fuel is scarce. The LIVING is a vicarage, episcopally united from time immemorial to the vicarage of Kilbeaconty and the rectory of Kiltarton, together constituting the union and corps of the deanery of Kilmacduagh, in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is appropriate to the treasurership and precentorship of the cathedral of St. Colman. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £166. 14. 8., of which £52. 10. are payable to the treasurer, £45 to the precentor, and the remainder to the dean; the gross annual value of the deanery, including tithes and glebe, before the passing of the Rent-charge act was £452. 13. The church, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1400, in 1814, is a handsome edifice. The same Board contributed £300 and a loan of £500 towards the erection of the deanery-house: the glebe of the union comprises 4½ acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has two chapels; one of them at Gort, a large slated building; and one of smaller dimensions at Taernevin, which is a plain thatched building. Some remains of the monastery built on the site of the ancient abbey founded by St. Colman, yet exist to the north-west of the cathedral, and are situated on a neck of land between two loughs; they consist chiefly of the church, which, though small, appears to have been of very elegant design. To the south of the church is the sacristy, and adjoining it is an arched room in which probably were deposited the valuable effects belonging to the establishment; south of these, are the chapel and refectory. To the north, about two feet from the church, is an old wall, which, according to tradition, belonged to a place for penance; and not far from it is a holy well, with a circular inclosure. Near the church, also, is an ancient round tower, which declines about 17 feet from the perpendicular. In a lake in the parish, called Lough Deehan, the waters having sunk very low in the year 1784 or 1785, a house was discovered in the mud at the bottom, formed of oak timber of great thickness, and the sides and roof of which were of wattle-work of the same substance; it appeared as if intended to float, and the timber of which it was constructed was perfectly sound.

KILMACDUANE, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, partly in the barony of IBRICKANE, but chiefly in the barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 5¾ miles (N. by E.) from Kilrush, on the road to Miltown-Malbay; containing 6584 inhabitants. It comprises 16,868 statute acres, of which a large portion consists of hilly pasture and bog. Fairs are held at Cooreclare, or Conclare, on May 6th, June 4th and 26th, July 10th, Oct. 20th, and Dec. 20th, for general farming stock: a court is occasionally held there by the seneschal for the manor of Kilrush, at which small debts are recoverable; and it is also a station of the constabulary police. The townland of Gurrantuohy, though entirely isolated by the parish of Kilrush, belongs to this parish. Kilmacduane is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilmurry-Clonderlaw; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Castlecoote, and the tithe rent-charge is £228. 9. 3., of which £138. 9. 3. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The townlands of Cahirfeenich and Acres are exempt from the payment of rectorial tithe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmihill, or Kilmichael: there are chapels at Cooreclare and Creegh. The ruins of the church still remain.

KILMACKEVOGE, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4¾ miles (S. W.) from New Ross, on the road from that place to Waterford; containing 1239 inhabitants, and 3231¼ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Rosbercon; the rectory is impropriate in the corporation of Waterford, and the tithe rent-charge is £123. 15., of which £82. 10. are payable to the corporation, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Sliewruagh.

KILMACLASSAR, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. E.) from Newport, on the road from that place to Castlebar; containing 3548 inhabitants. This parish, the surface of which is very uneven, comprises 6865½ statute acres; it is chiefly under tillage, but there is a great quantity of bog. Very good limestone is obtained; and there is a bleach-green. Kilmaclassar is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Aughaval; the rectory is appropriate to the prebends of Killabegs and Faldown, and the tithe rent-charge is £97. 10., of which £34. 2. 6. are payable to the prebendaries, and the remainder to the vicar. Divine service is performed in a school-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kilmina, and has a neat chapel, built about 1820, at an expense of £600.

KILMACLEAGUE, a parish, in the barony of GAULTIER, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Waterford; containing 1025 inhabitants, and 3462 statute acres of poor wet land. This parish lies to the north-east of Tramore bay. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, forming part of the union of Ballinakill; the rectory forms part of the corps of the chancellorship in the cathedral of Waterford, and the tithe rent-charge is £164. 12. 7., of which £76. 3. 4. are payable to the vicar. At Monamintra, near this parish, is a church; and in its vicinity, within the parish, are some mineral springs.

KILMACLENAN, or KILMACLENY, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Buttevant, and on the road from Liscarrol to Mallow; containing 322 inhabitants. It comprises 1042 statute acres. The land is in general good, and is nearly equally divided between tillage and pasture; the state of agriculture has latterly been much improved, and a considerable number of cattle are fattened. Limestone of superior quality is obtained at a quarry, from which stones weighing nearly five tons each have been taken; and yellow ochre is found near the old castle of Kilmaclenan. Patents exist for three fairs at Kilmaclenan, which for several years have been held at Ballyclough. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, being the corps of the prebend of Kilmaclenan in the cathedral of Cloyne, in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £69. 4. 6. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Kilbrin. The castle of Kilmaclenan, and the old mansion-house adjoining it, both now in ruins, are said to have been erected by the family of Barry; part of the outworks of the castle also remains. A little to the south-east are the ruins of the church, dedicated to St. Colman.

KILMACNEVIN, a parish, in the union of Mullingar, barony of Moygoish, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (N. W.) from Mullingar, on the road from that place to Colehill; containing 1760 inhabitants. It comprises 5016 statute acres; and is entirely under tillage, excepting a large quantity of bog. Limestone abounds, but of an inferior kind. The Royal Canal runs through the parish; and a large cattle-fair is held at Empor on the last day of May. Kilmacnevin is a curacy, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Leney; the rectory is impropriate in Sir J. B. Piers, Bart., and the tithe rent-charge is £97. 10., which is payable to the impropriator. There is a glebe of eight acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Miltown, and has a chapel at Empor. Mr. Tuite allows £10 per annum to the master of a school, besides the school-house and half an acre of land. There are remains of the castle of Empor, and of an old fort; also of the church of Kilmacnevin, and of one at Churchtown, which is the burial-place of the Tuite family.

KILMACOEN, or Kilmacowen, a parish, in the barony of Upper Carbery, union and county of Sligo, and province of Connaught, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Sligo, and on the Ballysadere channel; containing 2011 inhabitants. The name signifies the "Church of the Sons of Oen:" St. Diermit, eldest brother of St. Cormac, founded a church here on lands given by Flann-Dubh, dynast of the Hy Fiacrii. The parish comprises 3548 statute acres: the soil is light and stony, and principally under tillage; there is a small quantity of bog. Kilmacoen is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of St. John's, Sligo: the tithe rent-charge is £135. 11. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions also the parish is part of the union or district of St. John's, Sligo. The burial-ground of the church, which is in ruins, is still used for interment. Here are some Druidical altars and cromlechs: and a golden torques was found some time since.

KILMACOMB, a parish, in the barony of Gaultier, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Waterford; containing, with the ecclesiastical parish of Rossduff, 817 inhabitants. It comprises 2401 statute acres. Woodstown, the seat of Lord Carew, is a short distance from Waterford harbour; and from it a low strand extends about two miles to a projecting headland named Credan, in which are three caves of considerable dimensions, branching into various chambers consisting of natural arches of great symmetry and beauty: they appear to have been formed by the descent of a stream on the pudding-stone rock. Near Woodstown is a sheet of fresh water, called Bel Lake, which covers about 50 statute acres. In the south-western part of the parish there is peat; also the remains of an ancient wood, consisting of fir, oak, and birch. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, forming part of the union of Ballinakill; the rectory forms part of the corps of the chancellorship in Waterford cathedral, and the tithe rent-charge is £92. 12., of which £55 11. are payable to the chancellor, and the remainder to the vicar. On the hill of Kilmacomb is a circle of stones, about 30 yards in diameter, inclosing five large stones.

KILMACOMOGUE, a parish, in the union of Bantry, partly in the Western division of the barony of East Carbery, and partly in the Eastern division of that of West Carbery, but chiefly in the barony of Bantry, county of Cork, and province of Munster; containing, with the post-town of Bantry and the island of Whiddy, 16,188 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated at the extremity of Bantry bay, comprises 64,568 statute acres. Very great improvements have been made in agriculture since 1815, and a large portion of land has been brought into profitable cultivation. The principal manure is the calcareous deposit found in abundance on the shores of the bay, and which in some places is so mixed with coral sand as to be quite as effective as pure lime in fertilising the soil: sea-weed is also used. There are, however, still more than 20,000 acres of waste land, the greater portion of which is mountainous, in some places quite barren, and in others affording pasturage for young cattle, of which vast herds are reared; there are also about 15,000 acres of bog and marshy ground, much of which is capable of being reclaimed. The surrounding scenery is strikingly varied, and in some parts characterised by features of majestic grandeur. Glengariff, partly in this parish, and within 10 miles of Bantry, is much resorted to for the singular variety and indescribable beauty of its scenery. It is situated on the picturesque bay to which it gives name, at the north-eastern extremity of Bantry bay; and derives its name, signifying the "rough glen," from its wild and rugged aspect in the midst of rocks, cliffs, and mountains thrown together in the greatest confusion, and finely contrasted with the richness of luxuriant woods and verdant meadows, shaded with thriving plantations intermixed with evergreens and flowering shrubs. The Bay of Bantry, from many points of view, has the appearance of a fine lake, and is studded with numerous rocky islets fringed with evergreens; of these, the island of Whiddy is the largest, and is crowned with a small fort mounting five pieces of cannon, erected by government after the attempt of the French in 1796. Along the north-western shore rises the Sugar Loaf mountain, supported by the smaller mountains called the Ghoal: the sides of these mountains, dark and deeply indented, are in fine contrast with the bright and smooth surface of the bay; and their summits, frequently concealed by flying clouds and quickly emerging into the sun's rays, present an ever-changing scene. Far behind is a precipitous cliff, which for many generations has been the resort of eagles, and concerning which the peasantry have many interesting traditions, in connexion with the O'Sullivans, the ancient chieftains of Bere.

The mountains are of the schistose formation, based on argillaceous grit. In a small rock in Reendonagan bay, limestone is found mixed with the grit, but it can be only partially calcined, and is therefore of little use; the schistose rocks merge into clay-slate, and slate of a tolerably good colour is found in several parts. Four rivers intersect the parish in their course to the bay; namely, the Maulagh, or Moyalla, which, on its entrance into the bay, forms a beautiful fall of 30 feet at Donnemark; the Auvane, which rises in the pass of Caminea, and joins the bay at Ballylickey; the Coomola, which forms the small creek of that name; and the Drumgariff, which forms the north-western boundary of the parish and barony. There are also several small lakes, but none deserving of particular notice. Glengariff Castle is a spacious and elegant mansion, situated under the shelter of a mountain which gradually declines towards the water's edge and is covered from the base to the summit with valuable young timber; the approach to the house is through a noble avenue more than a mile in length, affording in many of its openings a fine view of the bay and the opposite mountains. At the extremity of the bay is seen the Glengariff Hotel, originally a poor cabin, which has been converted into a very commodious house, and forms a picturesque feature in the landscape. From this point the woods of Glengariff, the property of the Earl of Bantry, wind for seven miles through the glen towards the west: the trees are chiefly oak and birch, with a large proportion of arbutus springing up luxuriantly from the crevices of almost every rock; and the woods are annually thinned to the amount of about £1000. Bantry Lodge is a handsome building in the cottage style, surrounded by a plantation of ash, and now the residence of the Earl of Bantry; it is situated in the bosom of the glen, inclosed by lofty mountains and rugged cliffs: a road leading from the house directly to the hotel has been made by his lordship, for the accommodation of visiters. The other seats in the parish are, Sea-Court, belonging to Viscount Bearhaven; Merino, the seat of the Hon. Robert White; Carriganass; Inchiclough; Ballylickey; Gurtenroe; Drumbree Cottage; Newtown; Ardnagashil; Reendonegan; Donnemark; and Mount-View. A constabulary police force is stationed in the parish.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore and Lord Riversdale, and the tithe rent-charge is £889. 16., of which £421. 6. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house, for which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1500 and made a gift of £100, is a handsome residence, built in 1816, on a glebe of 42¼ acres. The church, which was completed in 1818, at a cost exceeding £2000, raised partly by subscription, but chiefly by a loan of £1500 from the Board, is a neat structure in the early English style, with a tower of three stages, which, from the varied colour of the stone, has a singular appearance; it is situated in the town of Bantry. Divine service is also performed in school-houses at Glengariff and Snave. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the principal chapel, a spacious and handsome building, on an eminence in the rear of the town, was erected by subscription, and there are chapels at Calkil and Comola.

On the sea-shore, near the town, was a small monastery, founded in 1466 for Franciscan friars by Dermot O'Sullivan Bere; the cemetery, still called The Abbey, is remaining, and is used by the Roman Catholics as a burial-place. Within the demesne of Newtown, about half a mile to the north-west of Bantry, are the remains of a fortification raised by Ireton during the parliamentary war: it consists of a quadrilateral area, and was defended by angular bastions and surrounded by a fosse, but the walls and towers have long been demolished, and the cannon was at the same time thrown into a very deep well; the moat still remains entire. Not far from this spot is the beautiful cascade of Donnemark; and at another place, called Newtown, to the south of Bantry, is a very antique stone pillar in a burial-ground, with some rude sculpture of men in armour, and other curious devices. Danish forts are numerously scattered over the parish; and, in 1834, more than 3000 silver coins, chiefly pence, groats, and half-groats, of the reigns of the earlier Edwards and Henrys, and of Alexander, King of Scotland, were found. At Carriganass are the ruins of the castle built by O'Sullivan Bere, and garrisoned by Daniel O'Sullivan against the forces of Elizabeth; it surrendered, after the capture of Dunboy Fort, to Sir George Carew, and at present consists of a lofty square tower on a precipitous rock rising from the banks of the river Auvane, and some extensive outworks. On the same river, near its influx into the bay, are the ruined gables of the castle of Rindisart, the stronghold of Sir Owen O'Sullivan, which was taken by Ireton in the parliamentary war, and by his orders demolished. Near Carriganass are the extensive and ivy-clad ruins of the old church of Kilmacomogue, and not far from the town those of the old church of Bantry, from the floor of which rise some lofty poplars. There are several chalybeate springs, the most esteemed of which is near the old abbey of Bantry; and in the vicinity of lake Capanabool is a cromlech surrounded by nine upright stones. —See BANTRY and WHIDDY ISLAND.

KILMACOW, a parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of IVERK, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Waterford, on the road to Thomastown; containing 2120 inhabitants, of whom 187 are in the village. It comprises 4445 statute acres, and has some good limestone quarries. The village contains 34 houses, and is a constabulary police station; petty-sessions are held in it every alternate week. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £270. The glebe-house was erected in 1818, at a cost exceeding £1500, by aid of a loan of £675 and a gift of £100 from the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church is a neat edifice with a handsome spire, for building which the late Board lent £850, in 1818. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilmacow, Dunkit, Gaulskill, Ullid, Kilbeacon, and part of Killaghy, and containing chapels at Kilmacow, Mullinavat, and Hill. The parochial school was built on land given by Mr. Roche. There are some fine ruins of Grandison, or Graney, Castle, consisting of the remains of the keep, the great hall, and three circular towers, on the margin of the river Suir. It is supposed to have been erected by Pierce Butler, eighth earl of Ormonde, and lord-deputy of Ireland in 1521. During the parliamentary war it was held by Colonel Butler for Charles I., but was finally surrendered to Colonel Axtel, Cromwell's governor of Kilkenny, and was afterwards allowed to fall into decay.—See GRANEY.

KILMACOW, a parish, in the union of RATHDRUM, barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 2¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Rathdrum, and on the lower road from Arklow to Wicklow. This small parish is situated in the vicinity of the Cronebane copper-mines, and comprises 816 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Castlemacadam.

KILMACREAN, or KILMACRENAN, also called CUMMER, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. E.) from Tuam, on the road to Galway; containing 1889 inhabitants. The parish comprises 9314¾ statute acres. The land is cultivated under an improved system of agriculture; there is, however, much reclaimable bog and rocky waste. Here are numerous turloughs, which are navigable for lighters in the winter months, but are dry in summer, when they afford excellent pasture, and good training ground for race-horses. Limestone is obtained in the parish. The principal seats are Ballinderry, Ballybanagher, Cluankin, Currofin, Ardstrea, and Annagh. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Moylough: the tithe rent-charge is £210. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district called Clare-Tuam, or Currofin, and has a chapel at Currofin, which is a neat stone building. Here are the ruins of Ballinderry Castle; of an old fort, or encampment, with five long low rooms, flagged over, and communicating with each other by narrow passages; and of an old church, with a burial-ground attached.

KILMACREDOCK, an ancient parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of NORTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER; containing 31 inhabitants, and comprising 479 statute acres.

KILMACREE.—See KILMOCREE.

KILMACREHY, a parish, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Ennistymon, and on the north side of Liscanor bay on the western coast; containing 4264 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7403 statute acres. Within its limits is the headland called Hag's Head, a lofty basaltic promontory situated in lat. 52° 16′ 40″, and lon. 9° 25′ 20″: from this point the cliffs gradually ascend to Moher, where they attain their greatest elevation; that called Stokeen is 587 feet above the level of the sea. The waves break with tremendous force against the rocks; part of the Spanish Armada was, in 1588, wrecked on the shore. On the most elevated point of these stupendous cliffs, an ornamental building in the castellated style has been erected by Cornelius O'Brien, Esq., for the accommodation of visiters to this bold and iron-bound coast, from which is obtained a magnificent view embracing nearly the whole line of coast from Loop Head to the northern extremity of the bay of Galway, together with the Arran Isles and a vast expanse of the Atlantic Ocean. Puffins are taken here by persons who are suspended over the lofty precipices in the cavities of which these birds deposit their young. A considerable portion of the parish consists of mountain pasture: the arable land is generally manured with sea-weed and sand, and the state of agriculture is generally improving. The gentlemen's seats are, Birchfield, the residence of Mr. O'Brien, who has much improved his estate and the condition of his tenantry by the erection of neat slated cottages and farm-buildings, and by other judicious arrangements; and Moher. The parish is in the diocese of Kilfenora: the rectory forms part of the corps of the archdeaconry, and the vicarage part of the union of Kilmanaheen, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £173. 2., and there is a glebe of 2½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Liscanor, which also includes the parish of Killaspuglenane; the principal chapel is at Liscanor, and there is a chapel for the rural district. The ruins of the church retain several fine specimens of arches and mouldings, now imbedded in the walls. At Dough and Liscanor are the ruined castles respectively so called; and near Birchfield is a holy well, dedicated to St. Bridget, and much resorted to by the peasantry: this well has, at Mr. O'Brien's expense, been surrounded by tasteful plantations and rustic seats, and at the entrance is a neat lodge.—See LISCANOR.

KILMACRENAN, a post-town and parish, in the union of MILFORD, barony of KILMACRENAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Letterkenny, on the road to Dunfanaghy; containing 9343 inhabitants. St. Columb founded an abbey here, which was richly endowed; and one of the O'Doncils, princes of Tyrconnell, subsequently founded an abbey for conventual Franciscans, which at the Dissolution was granted to Trinity College, Dublin: the present church is supposed to be part of it, and has a mitred head sculptured in relief over the door. Near the village is the rock of Doune, on which the O'Donells were always inaugurated by priests whom they regarded as descendants of St. Columb: the last inauguration was that of Sir Niall Garbh O'Donell, the successor of Hugh Roe O'Donell, but the ceremony being performed without the Lord-Lieutenant's consent, he was degraded from his chieftainship. The PARISH comprises 35,617 statute acres, of which 782¾ are in small loughs, and 6 in the tideway of the river Lackagh: the system of agriculture is improving, and there is some mountain and bog; fine granite is obtained. The village has a sub-post office to Letterkenny, and is a constabulary police and a revenue police station; a new barrack has been just built for each of these forces: fairs are held on the first day of every month, and there is a dispensary. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin: the tithe rent-charge is £506. 5. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £100, and lent £1125, in 1815; the glebe comprises 150 acres. The church, a handsome edifice, was erected in 1846, at a cost of nearly £1300, of which £250 were local subscriptions, and the remainder was supplied from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is partly the head of a district, and partly united to Gartan, and has a chapel in each portion. There is also a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. Lough Salt mountain, 1541 feet high, is in this parish, and commands a magnificent prospect: the lough, which is 815 feet above the level of the sea, and 204 feet deep, is on the side of the mountain; and from its vicinity, fine views of Lough Swilly to the east, and Letterkenny and the surrounding country to the south and west, are obtained. In the neighbourhood of the lake is a rocking-stone; there is a cromlech at Lough Keil, and at Milford the Giant's grave.

KILMACSHALGAN, a parish, in the barony of TYRERAGH, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 16 miles (W. by S.) from Sligo; containing, with the post-town of Dromore-West, 3872 inhabitants. It comprises 26,008½ statute acres, the greater portion of which is reclaimable mountain land and bog; the cultivated part is chiefly under tillage; and there are quarries of limestone, freestone, and slate. The principal seats are Dromore House, Fare M'Fare, Belville, and Marino Cottage. Petty-sessions are held fortnightly on Thursdays at Comcall, where there is a spa. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, with that of Templeboy episcopally united, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Colonel Knox Gore. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £300, payable in equal parts to the impropriator and the vicar; and the tithe of the whole vicarial union is £307. 10.: there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises nine acres. The church is a neat edifice with a square tower, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits lent £1300, in 1820. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a large chapel. There are some remains of the church, with a burial-place attached; two cromlechs; and some forts.

KILMACTALWAY, a parish, in the union of SOUTH DUBLIN, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Dublin; containing 437 inhabitants. The parish comprises 249½ statute acres. The chief seats are, Castle Bagot, a spacious mansion in a well-wooded demesne of about 500 statute acres; and Ballybane. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Archbishop, forming the corps of the prebend of Kilmactalway in Christ Church cathedral, Dublin, and held with the union of Clondalkin: the tithe rent-charge is £138. 9. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Lucan.

KILMACTEIGUE, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of LENEY, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (N. E.) from Foxford, on the road to Ballymote; containing 9097 inhabitants. It comprises 32,533 statute acres, about half of which is arable and pasture; the remainder is mountain land, with some bog: agriculture is improving. There are some quarries of limestone, which is principally procured for building, and for repairing the roads: iron-ore from the mountains was smelted at Foxford, until the wood used for fuel was exhausted. Fine salmon are taken in the river Moy. Lough Talt is situated in the midst of high mountains, on which large flocks of goats, &c., feed in summer; it is about a mile long, well stocked with small trout, and contains two rocky islands, which in summer are covered with gulls. Near the lough is a constabulary police station. The principal seats are Glen Eask and Cloonbarry. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 5. There is a glebe-house, built at an expense of £1300, of which the Board of First Fruits gave £300, and lent £500, in 1814: the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a plain building. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has chapels at Kilmacteigue, Barrintogher, and Lough Talt, the last lately built. There are several public schools, to one of which Mr. Jones has given an acre of land. At Belclare is an ancient castle.—See BANADA and ARDCLARE.

KILMACTHOMAS, a post-town, partly in the parish of BALLYLANEEN, but chiefly in that of ROSSMIRE, barony of DECIES without DRUM, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 12 miles (W. S. W.) from Waterford, and 87¾ (S. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Cork to Waterford; containing 1197 inhabitants, and 214 houses. The town is situated on a steep hill, at the foot of which flows the small river Mahon; there is a good stone bridge. It has a dispensary, and is the head-quarters of the constabulary police for the county: petty-sessions are held here, or at Stradbally, on alternate Tuesdays, and fairs are held on Feb. 2nd, March 17th, May 12th, Aug. 12th, Sept. 29th, and Dec. 6th and 21st. A castle existed at this place, which was taken by Sir Charles Vavasour in 1643; it belonged to the Poer family, who are still the chief owners of property in the neighbourhood.

KILMACTRANY, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of TIRAGHRILL, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (N.) from Boyle, on the road to Ballyfarnon; containing 4604 inhabitants. This parish comprises 13,447 statute acres, including much bog and mountain land; the soil is light, and agriculture is in a backward state. Limestone is abundant; iron-ore exists; and a seam of coal, 22 inches thick, has been discovered in the mountains of Geevagh. The parish is situated on Lough Arrow, a picturesque sheet of water at the base of the Curlew mountains, about a mile from Lough Key, by which it communicates with the Shannon: the lake is five miles in length and two in its greatest breadth, is studded with islands, and is remarkable for the size and fine flavour of its trout. On the western side, but in another parish, is Hollybrook House, a handsome residence, the plantations of which form a pleasing picture when viewed from the opposite shore. Petty-sessions are held every fortnight on Tuesday, and here is a constabulary police station. The estate of Kingsborough gives the title of viscount to the eldest son of the Earl of Kingston. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, united to the vicarages of Shancoe and Killadoon, and in the gift of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in W. Mulloy, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £79. 12., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar; and the tithe of the whole vicarial benefice is £67. 3. 8. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1819, gave £650 and lent £150: the glebe comprises 13 acres, subject to a rent of £2 per annum. The church is a small building, for the erection of which the Board gave £800, in 1816; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £305 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a union or district, called Geevagh, which is co-extensive with the Protestant union, and has a handsome chapel, ornamented with minarets, at Geevagh, and another at Highwood. There is a remarkable cromlech, called Leaba Diarmud i Grange, or "Darby and Granye's bed," consisting of a horizontal stone, supported by four others set upright. Among the ruins of the old church is a mutilated cross.

KILMACUD, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Dublin; containing 192 inhabitants. It comprises 286 statute acres, in a high state of cultivation; and, from the salubrity of its air and the beauty of its marine and mountain views, is a favourite spot for country residences. Among these are, Redesdale House, the seat of His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin; Kilmacud House; Merville; Lakelands; Woodley; Westbury; Priory; and Parson's Green. It is a chapelry, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Stillorgan; the tithe rentcharge is £31. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Booterstown. This is said to be the birth-place of St. Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarne, from whom its name is derived.

KILMACUMSY, or KILMACUNSY, a parish, in the barony of FRENCHPARK, union of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (N. W.) from Elphin, and on the road from Boyle to Roscommon; containing 2686 inhabitants, and 5454 statute acres. Much of its surface is occupied with gentle elevations of limestone and limestone-gravel, in which are several extensive natural caverns. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Ardclare; the rectory was till lately part of the corps of the precentorship of Elphin cathedral. The tithe rent-charge is £69. 5., which is equally divided between the rector and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Elphin.

KILMACUNNA.—See LUSMAGH.

KILMAGUE.—See KILMAOGUE.

KILMAHON, a parish, in the union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. E.) from Cloyne, and on the southern coast; containing 1785 inhabitants. It comprises 2849 statute acres. The land is generally rich and well cultivated, and a beautiful vale extends from the coast up to Cloyne; but near Ballycotton, during easterly winds, the sea beats over the strand with great fury. The valley rests on a substratum of limestone, which rises to the surface at Moanagarra, where a small quarry is worked: the higher grounds are based on clay-slate. The principal seats are Snugborough, Shanagary House, Ballybane, and the glebe-house, in the pleasure-grounds of which are some fine verbenas and other exotic plants. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £380. The glebehouse was built in 1807, by the then incumbent, at a cost exceeding £1300, with the aid of a gift of £210 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 12 acres. The church, which is a remarkably neat edifice, was built in 1800: the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £147 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Cloyne, and has a small plain chapel at Shanagary. At Ballymaloe is a very curious old house, built by the Fitzgeralds, and forfeited in the war of 1641; it is now the property of Mr. Forster, and in the hall are two pairs of elks' horns of very large size, found on the estate in 1714. At Shanagary are the ruins of a castle, which was unsuccessfully defended by the Earl of Desmond against Queen Elizabeth's troops; it was held by the Irish in 1641, but was captured by Cromwell, by whose orders it was dismantled.

KILMAHUDDRICK, a parish, in the union of SOUTH DUBLIN, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 6 inhabitants, and comprising 181¼ statute acres. It is a chapelry, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Clondalkin: the tithe rent-charge is £12. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Lucan. There are some remains of the church; and of a castle at Grange.

KILMAINBEG, a parish, in the barony of KILMAIN, union of BALLINROBE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. E.) from Ballinrobe, and on the confines of the county of Galway; containing 1491 inhabitants. It comprises 3614 statute acres, which are principally under tillage. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Kilmainmore; the rectory is partly appropriate to the prebend of Killabeggs and partly to the vicarage, and the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £103. 6. 6., of which £7. 10. are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilmainbeg is part of the district of Kilmain.

KILMAINHAM, a suburban village of the metropolis, in the parish of ST. JAMES, barony of NEWCASTLE, union of SOUTH DUBLIN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER; containing 670 inhabitants. This place, formerly called Kilmaignend, derived that name from a monastery on the south side of the city, of which St. Maignend was abbot about the beginning of the 7th century. On or near the site of this monastery subsequently stood the ancient PRIORY of Kilmainham, founded in 1174 for Knights Templars by Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The endowments of the priory, which were ample, were confirmed by Henry II.; and the founder, after bestowing on it all the lands of Kilmainham, died in 1176, and was interred in Christ Church, Dublin. Upon the suppression of this order, in 1307, the lands and possessions of the priory were assigned by the Pope to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and confirmed to them by Edward II.; and the priory itself, which had been previously an hospital for the sick and infirm, became an asylum for guests and strangers, and was held by persons of the highest rank: its priors sat as barons in the house of lords, and some of them were chancellors and lords-deputies of Ireland. Prior Keating, in 1482, having seized the castle of Dublin and disposed of the property of the hospital, was removed from his office; but he made his appointed successor prisoner, and compelled him to resign; and having given his warmest support to the imposture of Lambert Simnel, it was enacted that none but a person of English descent should in future be appointed prior. In 1535, John Rawson, an Englishman, who had been elected prior in conformity to that enactment, surrendered the priory, with all its possessions, into the hands of the king, by whom he was created Viscount Clontarf, with an annual revenue of 500 marks out of the hospital estate. In 1557, Sir Oswald Massingberd was made prior by the authority of Cardinal Pole, the Pope's legate, and was confirmed in the former possessions of the priory by Queen Mary; but on the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he privately withdrew from the kingdom. The buildings of the priory were spacious, and of very elegant design; it was frequently the residence of the lords-deputies, and after its dissolution was still regarded as one of the finest buildings in the country.

About the year 1675, Arthur, Earl of Granard, suggested to the Earl of Essex, then lord-lieutenant, the foundation of a MILITARY establishment for the reception of disabled and superannuated soldiers; and the Duke of Ormonde, by incessant applications to the king for the same purpose, received from Charles II., in 1679, an order for carrying it into effect. For this object, 64 Irish acres adjacent to the site of the priory, and other lands then forming part of the Phœnix Park, were granted for the site of the institution. The first stone was laid by the duke, in 1680, and the whole was completed in three years, after a design by Sir Christopher Wren, at an expense of £23,559. It is a quadrangular structure, 306 feet long, 288 feet broad, and two stories high, inclosing an area of 210 feet square, laid down in grass and intersected by walks meeting in the centre; the exterior fronts, with the exception of the north or principal front, which is of stone, are of brick rough-cast. Over the northern entrance, which is of the Corinthian order, is a square tower lighted by arched windows, with a clock turret surmounted by an octagonal spire; and in the centre of the eastern front is a wide archway leading into the quadrangle, which on three sides and part of the fourth is surrounded by a piazza of Doric arches, affording a covered passage to the dining-hall in the centre of the north range. The dining-hall is 100 feet in length and 50 in width; the lower part of the walls is wainscoted with oak and ornamented with muskets, bayonets, and other military weapons fancifully arranged, and the upper part decorated with portraits of most of the sovereigns and other distinguished personages; the ceiling is flat and divided into compartments, and in the central compartment is a large clock dial. On the south side of the hall is a gallery, supported on brackets of carved oak, and leading from the apartments of the master of the hospital, at the west end of the hall, to the chapel, which is at the east end. The chapel is 86 feet long and 40 wide, and has a venerable and imposing appearance: the east window, which formerly belonged to the ancient priory, is embellished with stained glass; the altar is of Irish oak exquisitely carved, and of the Corinthian order. The master's seat is under a canopy in the gallery at the west extremity of the chapel, and on each side of it are pews for the various officers of the hospital; the ceiling is most elaborately ornamented in stucco, and divided into coved compartments filled with elegant and finely executed designs. The remainder of the north range is occupied by the apartments of the master, who is always the commander of the forces for the time being; and the other parts of the building contain apartments for the inmates opening on the ground floor into the piazzas, which are neatly flagged, or from the upper story into spacious galleries above. The deputy-master's house occupies a detached situation near the master's garden; and in the north-east part of the grounds is the infirmary, which, with the late additions, contains 48 beds, and cells for 12 lunatics.

The present establishment is for 5 captains, an adjutant, and 250 invalid soldiers, selected from the list of out-pensioners in Ireland, amounting to 20,000; they are supplied with clothing, diet, medical attendance, and every necessary comfort and accommodation, similar to those of Chelsea. The institution is under the direction of a governor, who is generally an officer of high rank, and the immediate management of a master, deputy-master, chaplain, secretary, registrar, pay-master, physician, surgeon, assistant-surgeon, apothecary, reader, providore, chamberlain, butler, and fueler; all of whom (except the physician and surgeon, who live near the infirmary,) have apartments in the house. The expenses of the establishment amount annually to something more than £10,000, and, together with the original cost of the building, were defrayed by a deduction of sixpence in the pound from all military issues from the Irish treasury, till 1796, when, on the surrender to government of a considerable portion of the estates, it was resolved to make an annual grant of parliament for its support.

The VILLAGE is connected with the metropolis on the eastern side by a range of buildings along the great western road, and is situated in a small valley watered by a stream which, a little below it, falls into the Liffey. The Hibernian mills were established in 1812 by Messrs. Willans, for the manufacture of the finest woollen cloths, which trade they have successfully pursued; and having greatly extended their establishment, it now affords employment to nearly 500 persons, for whom the proprietors have erected suitable dwellings, and also a place of worship of the Independent denomination. The election of members for the county takes place here; and by an act of council issued on the 10th of Jan., 1837, under the act of the 6th and 7th of William IV., for extending the jurisdiction and regulating the proceedings of the civil-bill court in Ireland, four general sessions of the peace are held annually at Kilmainham, for one of the two districts into which the county has been divided. This district consists of the baronies of Castleknock and Coolock, except the parts of the parishes of Swords, Killossory, and Malahide which are in Coolock barony; also of the part of Finglas parish, in the barony of Nethercross; and the baronies of Newcastle, Uppercross, and Rathdown: for the particulars of the other district, see SWORDS. The jurisdiction of the manor court, which is also held here, on alternate Mondays, embraces the whole of the barony of Newcastle: debts can be recovered in it to any amount, but the seneschal never takes cognizance of any above £10. The court-house, of recent erection, is a spacious and handsome building; and adjoining it is the county gaol, a well-arranged edifice inclosed by a lofty wall: the main building consists of two quadrangles, containing apartments for the keeper, 69 sleeping-cells, eight small day-rooms, nine yards, two large hospital rooms, a chapel, and ten rooms for debtors; and in one of the yards is a tread-mill. Convicts from the north of Ireland are lodged in this prison previously to transportation. Adjoining the Royal Hospital is an extensive cemetery, anciently the burial-place of the original monastery, subsequently of the Knights Templars and the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and still used by the inhabitants of Dublin. In it is an ancient tombstone of one entire block of coarse granite, nine feet above the surface of the ground, supposed to be a memorial of some of the Irish princes that fell in the battle of Clontarf. About 50 years since, having fallen down, it was again erected, when many Danish coins were found, and also a sword of the same period; the sword was placed by the master of the hospital in the hall leading to his apartments, where it still remains.

KILMAINHAM-WOOD, a parish, in the union of Kells, barony of Lower Kells, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 3 miles (N. W.) from Nobber, and on the road from Kells to Kingscourt; containing 1412 inhabitants, of whom 137 are in the village. This parish comprises 3716 statute acres: after the suppression of the order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, it was granted by the crown to the Barnwalls, from whom it was purchased about a century since, by the Hon. Colonel Hussey, of Westown. There are some quarries of stone for building, a tuck and a corn mill, and a few looms employed by the inhabitants for their own use. The village contains a constabulary police station, and a dispensary; a good fair for store cattle is held in it on May 5th. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the gift of the Bishop: the parish is tithe free, and the income of the vicar consists of a payment of £50 per annum from Mr. Hussey, with an augmentation from Primate Boulter's fund. The church is a plain building, erected in 1803 by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £135. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with part of Bailieborough, or Moybologue, in the diocese of Kilmore, the whole being called the union or district of Moybologue or Tivorcher; in each parish is a chapel. There is a national school, enlarged in 1835, by aid of a grant of £53 from the Board of Education.

KILMAINMORE, a parish, in the union of Ballinrobe, barony of Kilmaine, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Ballinrobe, and on the road from Galway to Westport; containing 4877 inhabitants. It comprises 13,792¼ statute acres, principally in pasture, and has excellent sheep pastures at Ellistron: fine limestone is quarried, and at the eastern extremity is a considerable quantity of reclaimable bog, but fuel is scarce. Petty-sessions are held every Wednesday at the village, which is a constabulary police station, and has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Hollymount: fairs are held on July 12th and Oct. 28th, and are well supplied with cattle and sheep. The principal seats are Glencorrib, Milford, Turin Castle, Cloghans, Fortville, and Rathgraher. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, episcopally united to the rectory and vicarage of Moorgaga, and part of the rectory and vicarage of Kilmainbeg; the union is in the patronage of the Bishop, as is also the rectory, which forms the corps of the prebend of Kilmainmore in the cathedral of Tuam and is held with the union. The tithe rent-charge of this parish amounts to £299. 15. 6., and of the whole union to £436. 17.: there is a glebe-house, with a glebe of eight acres. The church is a plain neat building, to which a tower was added about 30 years since by the Rev. F. Rutledge. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district co-extensive with the union of the Established Church: the chapel is a splendid building, lately erected by the Rev. J. Browne, a little to the west of Kilmaine, on the road to the village of Neale. The parochial school is aided by annual donations of £5 from the rector, and £6 from the curate, who has also given two acres of land, and Mr. Flanagan a house rent-free. In the centre of the village are the ruins of an ancient religious house, with a large burial-ground attached; and there are ruins of castles at Turin, Ellistron, Ballisnahiney, Cragduff, and Killernan. A spring rising in the village soon disappears, and takes a subterraneous course for about a mile; in the winter it forms a turlough. The parish gives the title of Baron to Lord Kilmaine.

KILMALANOGUE, barony of Longford, county of Galway.—See Kilnabronogue.

KILMALEERY, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Bunratty Lower, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 1 mile (S. W.) from Newmarket, and on the east bank of the river Fergus; containing 737 inhabitants. It comprises 2266¾ statute acres: the land is in general of superior quality, particularly on the shore of the Fergus, where it is exceedingly rich. At Carrigeary is a small quay, where turf and sea manure are landed, and whence corn is occasionally sent to Limerick; at Cahirbane is the ancient seat of James Creagh, Esq. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe; the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Tomfinlough or Tradree, and the vicarage part of the vicarial union of Kilnasoolagh. The tithe rent-charge is £87. 5., of which £51. 2. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Newmarket, and has a chapel at Carrigeary. The ruined castles of Urlin and Clenagh still remain; the latter, a lofty square tower nearly entire, was once the residence of the Mac Mahons.

KILMALKEADER.—See Kilmelchedor.

KILMALLOCK, an ancient corporate and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, forming a liberty, in the county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 15¾ miles (S.) from Limerick, and 109½ (S. W.) from Dublin, on the high road to Cork; containing 3126 inhabitants, of whom 1408 are in the town. This place, called anciently Killocia and Kilmocheallog, derived its name from an abbey founded for Canons Regular by St. Mochecallog or St. Molach, in the beginning of the 7th century. Its early history is involved in great obscurity; and of its progress to that state of distinction and importance which, from the magnificence of its ruins, obtained for it, long after its decline, the appellation of the "Balbec" of Ireland, little is now known. It appears to have been inhabited at a remote period by several of the chief nobility and gentry, and to have been a corporate town either by prescription or by charter granted at a very early date, as its privileges as a borough are recited in a charter of Edward III., by which that monarch bestowed on the provost and commonalty certain tolls and customs towards the repair of its fortifications. The town was surrounded with a stone wall of great strength, fortified with mounds of earth.

and having four gateway-towers of lofty and imposing character, called respectively St. John's-gate, Water-gate, Ivy-gate, and Blosom's-gate; of which only the last is now remaining. In 1291, a Dominican monastery was founded to the east of the town, by Gilbert, son of John of Callan, Lord of Offaley, which was soon after amply endowed; a general chapter of the order was held in it in 1340, and it continued to flourish till the Dissolution, when it was given by Elizabeth to the corporation. The inhabitants obtained a grant of tolls for murage in 1482; and in consideration of the losses they had sustained in defending the town against the assaults of the enemy, they were again incorporated by Edward IV., who also made Kilmallock one of the cities in which he established a royal mint. In 1483, it is enumerated among the principal towns where a coin of Richard III., then recently struck, was by act of parliament made current.

During the wars in the reign of Elizabeth, the town was a principal military station of the English, and the garrison was frequently employed in the most important services. The place was taken by surprise, in 1568, by James Fitz-Maurice, who put the sovereign and several of the principal inhabitants to death, and burned the town in order to prevent its occupation by the Lord-Deputy, who was marching against him from Buttevant. It was, however, restored by the encouragement of Sir Henry Sydney, lord-deputy, who left a garrison for its defence; and in 1572, Sir J. Perrot, the first lord-president of Munster, compelled Fitz-Maurice to surrender, and to make his submission to the queen's mercy in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. In 1597, Sir W. Drury came hither with a force of 900 men, to oppose Sir John of Desmond with his Spanish and Irish forces, and issued a proclamation summoning all the nobility and gentry of Munster to repair to his standard. Sir W. Pelham, who succeeded him, issued another proclamation to the same purpose; and Gerald, 16th earl of Desmond, declining to obey, was declared a rebel unless he surrendered himself within 20 days; on failing to comply with which, his vast estates, consisting of 570,000 plantation acres, were forfeited to the crown, and the earl and his countess suffered the severest hardships, secreting themselves in the woods and mountains around the town. Sir Nicholas Malby, who succeeded to the command of the forces, leaving a garrison of 340 men here, pursued, with the remainder of his forces, the troops under Sir John of Desmond, whom he defeated at Manister-Nenagh; and in 1582, a detachment of the garrison attacked the earl in his retreat at day-break, slew his servants, carried off his provisions, and would have taken himself and his countess prisoners, had they not escaped by concealing themselves in the river, immersed up to their chins behind one of its banks. In 1584, after the death of the earl, Elizabeth granted the town a new charter, with some extensive tracts of land, and various tolls and customs; empowering the inhabitants to elect a sovereign, to hold courts of record with jurisdiction not exceeding £20, to levy assessments for the repair of the fortifications, and grant licences for the distillation of spirituous liquors; and conferring various other privileges, as ample as those of Kilkenny and Clonmel, with exemption from all taxes except those assessed by parliament.

In 1590, James Fitzgerald, who had assumed the title of earl of Desmond, laid siege to the town, at the head of a formidable body of native Irish, but was compelled to retire by Sir Thomas Norris, lord-president, assisted by the Earl of Ormonde; and in 1600, James, son of the late earl, who had been educated in England, where he had been detained as a hostage, was sent over to Ireland by the English government to destroy the popularity of the chieftain who had usurped the title. The young earl was received with loud acclamations by the inhabitants of the surrounding country; but on his attending divine service at the Protestant church on the following day, these demonstrations of joy were changed into expressions of abhorrence and disgust. The garrison soon after surprised and defeated the forces of James Fitzgerald, killed 120 of his party, and seized all their arms, cattle, and horses. In 1642, the Irish army under the command of Lord Mountgarret, Lord Purcell, and Garret Barry, took possession of the town, which in May of the following year was besieged by Lord Inchiquin with a force of 700 men, but without success. The Earl of Castlehaven, commander-in-chief of the Irish army, in 1645 deposited all his military stores in this town, which eventually fell into the hands of the parliamentarians; and the fortifications were soon after dismantled by order of Cromwell: they were subsequently restored by the corporation, but were again destroyed, by the Irish forces under the Duke of Berwick, in 1690.

The town is pleasingly situated on the western bank of a small stream called the Lubach, and its walls inclosed a spacious quadrilateral area, in which were several castellated mansions inhabited by wealthy families. The mansions were all built of hewn stone, and communicated by noble castellated gateways with the streets of the city inhabited by the trading and commercial classes, of which only the foundations can now be traced. Considerable portions of the walls are still remaining; but of the ancient mansions and castles not more than two have been preserved, one belonging to the Earl of Buckinghamshire, and the other to the family of Godsall. In the centre of the present town is the noble castle with its gateway, through which structure the road, now diverted to the east, formerly passed, and in which the Earl of Castlehaven deposited his military stores; it is still in good preservation, and was subsequently used by the corporation, whose property it was, as an armoury and citadel. On the south-west is Blosom's-gate, through which the Charleville road passes; it, also, is in good preservation, and from it is continued the ancient wall, nearly perfect, for about a quarter of a mile. Till lately the town had remained in such a state of decay as to present only the appearance of a rural village; but since 1816, several good houses of stone have been erected in the principal street, which is now a handsome thoroughfare, inhabited by respectable tradesmen. The town consists of 251 houses: the streets are at present neither paved nor lighted; the inhabitants are supplied with water chiefly from the Lubach. The property is much divided, probably from its great eligibility as a place of residence at an early period; the principal proprietors are the Earls of Buckinghamshire, Sandwich, Kenmare, Ranfurly, and Cork, Lord Lisle, Sir Leonard Holmes, and the Maunsell family. Close to the town are very extensive flour-mills, the property of

Mr. Creed; and not far distant, on the same river, are the Glenfield oat-mills, built in 1825, at a great expense, on the site of the old manor mills, and employing about 20 persons. There is also a tanyard, in the town; but except for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood, there is neither trade nor manufacture. The markets, on Monday and Thursday, have been discontinued for many years; fairs are held on Feb. 21st, March 25th, and Whit-Tuesday, chiefly for pigs, and sometimes for cattle and sheep, but they are very indifferently attended.

By charter of the 27th of Elizabeth the CORPORATION consisted, until its dissolution in 1840, of a sovereign, and an unlimited number of burgesses, of whom 12 formed the council, assisted by a town-clerk, serjeant-at-mace, and other officers. The sovereign, who might appoint a deputy, was annually elected from the burgesses on the Monday after Michaelmas-day by the council, and immediately on his election appointed 12 of the burgesses to be of the council for the ensuing year; by this body all the corporate functions were performed. The sovereign was justice of the peace within the borough, and also one of the county magistrates, who had concurrent jurisdiction. The burgesses were elected by the council; there was no class of freemen distinct from them. The corporation returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the sum of £15,000, awarded as compensation, was paid to Richard Oliver, afterwards Richard Oliver Gascoigne, Esq. The borough court, which had jurisdiction extending to £20, has been long discontinued: a court in the nature of a court of conscience was held, until the year 1840, every alternate Friday before the sovereign, or the deputy-sovereign, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40*s*. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Fridays, and a constabulary police force is stationed in the town. The corporation, though nominally existing, was to available purposes almost extinct before its formal dissolution in 1840.

The parish comprises 4074 statute acres: of these, about eight are in common, and the remaindcr nearly in equal portions in pasture and under tillage; there are several quarries of stone for building, and the system of agriculture is improving. Near the town is Mount-Coote, a spacious and handsome modern mansion, finely situated in the centre of an ample and picturesque demesne, highly improved by the proprietor with ornamental plantations, in which, and in the general improvement of his large estate, many of the labouring classes have found employment. Near the town, also, is The Towers, the splendid seat of the Evans family, a large castellated mansion in the ancient baronial style, consisting of a centre flanked by lofty circular towers, and two extensive wings, one of which, on the west, is connected with a noble gateway leading to the offices, which occupy the sides of a quadrangular area; the whole is of hewn limestone, forming a magnificent structure in a richly wooded demesne, commanding some fine views of mountain and vale, and embellished with a lake extending to the walls of Kilmallock. Abbey View is situated close to the town, and commands some interesting views and picturesque scenery; Mill View and Riversfield are houses pleasantly situated in the immediate vicinity of the town.

Kilmallock is in the diocese of Limerick; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of the cathedral of Limerick, and the vicarage to the dean and chapter, to whom it was granted in 1674 by royal charter, which also united it to the rectory of Kilbreedy-Major, and to the rectories and vicarages of Particles, Ballingaddy, and Athnassy, together forming the economy fund of the cathedral. The parochial duties are performed by a stipendiary curate, who receives £90 per annum from the dean and chapter. The tithe rent-charge is £225, of which £150 are payable to the lessee of the vicars-choral, and the remainder to the economy fund; the aggregate tithe for the union of the economy fund is £603. 18. 6. There is no glebe-house; the glebe lands of the union comprise 89¼ acres, of which 18¼ are in this parish. The CHURCH, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and formerly collegiate, is an ancient and spacious structure, built in various successive styles of English architecture, and consisting of a nave, aisles, and south transept, which have been roofless since 1657, when the church was partly destroyed by Cromwell, and of a spacious and lofty choir, which is fitted up for divine service. The nave is separated from the aisles by a series of massive square pillars, supporting lofty pointed arches, and the choir has an east window combining five lancet-shaped lights. In the aisles and transept are altar-tombs to the Fitzgeralds, Verdons, Healeys, Blakeneys, and Coppingers; they are generally of the 17th century, and rudely sculptured; the figures are sunk, and the inscriptions in relief. In the choir is a handsome monument to the family of Coote, of Castle Coote. The exterior of the church is embattled, and at the west end of the north aisle is an ancient round tower, pierced with numerous windows, and differing greatly from others of that class. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Tankardstown, Ballingaddy, and Kilquane, and parts of the parishes of Bulgadine and Uregare; and containing two chapels, situated at Kilmallock and Ballingaddy. The chapel in the town is a spacious building, erected in 1814, and subsequently enlarged: that at Ballingaddy is two miles from the town, and near it are the ruins of a former chapel, the cemetery of which, still used as a burial-ground, has been planted with trees by Mr. Coote, of Mount-Coote. The male and female parochial schools are held in the castle belonging to the late corporation, and are chiefly supported by the dean and chapter, by whom they have been endowed with about an acre of land, and by subscriptions. The union workhouse, on a site of seven acres purchased for £587, was completed in 1840, at an expense of £7000, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers.

The REMAINS of the Dominican monastery, situated on the banks of the Lubach, are extensive and beautifully picturesque; they consist chiefly of the lofty square central tower and the choir of the church, the former in a state of great dilapidation, and the latter tolerably perfect. The east window is of the lancet form, combining an arrangement of five lights, and the windows on the south side are enriched with delicate tracery; the choir is unrivalled for symmetry and elegance of design, and contains the broken tomb of the last of the White Knights, the representative of whom is the present Earl of Kingston. Parts of the conventual buildings, on the north, are still tolerably entire. Close to the bank of the river are also the ruins of the abbot's private residence, which after the Reformation was the residence of several of the sovereigns of the borough, and was inhabited by the White Knight in 1604. About half a milé to the north of the town are some ruins of ecclesiastical buildings; and the site of an ancient hospital for lepers is still called the Spital field. There are several traces of military encampments around the town; and great numbers of human bones have been discovered in the grounds of Mount-Coote, which have been collected and interred near the spot where they were found, under a monument erected by the proprietor of the demesne. Kilmallock formerly gave the title of Viscount to a branch of the Sarsfield family, by whom it was forfeited in consequence of their adherence to James II.

KILMALOG, Kilmallock, or Kilmalogue, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Ballaghkeen, county of Wexford, province of Leinster, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Enniscorthy, on the road to Wexford; containing 1408 inhabitants. It comprises 4093¾ statute acres, which are chiefly under cultivation, with the exception of part of a bog called Itty: blue and white marl are abundant, and building-stone is found at Garryvarren. The principal seats are Balliukeel, Kilmallock, and Willmount. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Castle-Ellis or Kilmalog; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth, and the tithe rent-charge is £151. 19., of which £90. 11. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the liberty of Crossabeg, and has a new chapel at Ballymurn. Some remains of the church exist in a large burial-ground, which is still much used for interment.

KILMALOODA, a parish, in the union of Bandon, Eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 6¼ miles (S. S. W.) from Bandon, on the road to Clonakilty; containing 3281 inhabitants. It comprises 7347 statute acres, including 298 acres at Cloggogh, which are tithe free. The soil is in general light, being based on a substratum of clay-slate; four-fifths of the land are cultivated under the old system, and much of the remainder consists of rough pasture and furze brakes. An improved system of agriculture has, however, commenced in the parish, in two quarters. At Aghalusky, Mr. Jones, with a view to the improvement of his tenantry, has established a model farm, judiciously managed by a Scotch steward; and the tenants are beginning to follow the system of stall-feeding, the rotation of crops, and culture of green crops; while in another part W. E. Wright, Esq., has taken in hand a large farm of inferior land, which by draining and sub-soiling he has considerably improved. Near Monteen and Skeaf are some veins of copper-ore, and at Ballymacarthy or Balinascarthy is a large flour-mill. The principal seats are Kilmolooda House, Skeaf House, and Skeaf. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Rev. T. Walker: the tithe rent-charge is £506. 5. Here is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1813, gave £100 and lent £1500; the glebe comprises 18 acres. The church, a large and neat edifice with a lofty square tower, was built in 1795. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Timoleague, and has a large plain chapel at Cloggogh. There is a parochial school, chiefly supported by the rector, under the Church Education Society; and a national school has been built lately. To the west of the church are the ruins of Monteen Castle, built by the M'Carthys in 1346; at Cloggogh are the picturesque remains of an abbey.

KILMALY, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Islands, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (W. S. W.) from Ennis, on the mountain road to Miltown-Malbay; containing 4908 inhabitants. It comprises 23,936¾ statute acres, about one-half of which consists of coarse mountain pasture and bog, and the remainder of arable land of various quality: the state of agriculture is gradually improving. Fairs are held at Conolly on Jan. 2nd, April 17th, July 18th, and Oct. 3rd. Lough-Burke, the ancient seat of the family of Burke, is picturesquely situated on the lake to which it gives name. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Dromcliffe, and the vicarage (separated in 1832 from the vicarial union of Dromcliffe) now forms a separate benefice, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £152. 6., of which £96. 18. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. A church has been built at a cost of £388, of which £288 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Inch, or West Dromcliffe; there are chapels at Kilmaly, Inch, and Conolly. On every hill in this parish (nearly 30 in number) is an ancient fort or rath; and the ruins of the old church are still to be seen, in the burial-ground.

KILMANAGH, a parish, in the union of Callan, barony of Cranagh, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (N.) from Callan, and on the road from Kilkenny to Ballingarry; containing 1950 inhabitants, of whom 115 are in the village. The name of this place was originally Kilnamanagh, or the "chapel of the monks;" and it is stated that St. Natalis, founder and abbot of an establishment here, died in 563. It comprises 5620¾ statute acres, almost equally divided between arable and pasture land, both of which are well cultivated; there is abundance of limestone, and culm is raised at Killeen. Here is a grist-mill. Petty-sessions are held fortnightly in the village, where are a constabulary police station, and a dispensary. The principal seats are Shipton and Pottlerath. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and till lately in the gift of the Bishop, forming the corps of the prebend of Kilmanagh in the cathedral of Kilkenny; the patronage is now exercised by the Lord Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, who must present a fellow or ex-fellow of Trinity College. The tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. 5.: the glebe-house was built in 1807, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of 200 acres. The church is a small plain building, erected about a century since. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballycallan, and contains a chapel, a plain building, with a school-house adjoining. The parochial school is endowed with ¾ of an acre of land. There are considerable remains of the old church, and of a castle at Pottlerath.

KILMANAGHAN, a parish, in the poor-law union of Tullamore, partly in the barony of Clonlonan, county of Westmeath, but chiefly in that of Kilcoursey, King's county, and province of Leinster; containing, with part of the post-town of Moate, 3526 inhabitants of whom 1450 are in the county of Westmeath. This parish, which is also called Kilmonagh, comprises 8197 statute acres, of which a considerable quantity is bog; agriculture is in an improved state. There is a large woollen-cloth manufactory. The principal seats are Kilfylan, Ballyboilan, Brookville, Moyally, and Rockfield. The parish is in the diocese of Meath: the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire; the vicarage forms part of the union of Clara. The tithe rent-charge is £185. 15. 6., of which £110. 15. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar: the glebe comprises 53 acres, valued at £106 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Kilcumreagh, and called the union of Tubber and Kilmanaghan; in each parish is a chapel. Part of the church remains, with a burial-ground attached.

KILMANAHEEN, a parish, in the union of Ennistymon, barony of Corcomroe, county of Clare, and province of Munster, on the road from Ennis to Miltown-Malbay; containing, with the post-town of Ennistymon and the village of Lahinch (both of which are separately described), 6436 inhabitants. It comprises 8177 statute acres; a large portion consists of hilly pasture, and from its situation on the bay of Liscanor, the portion under tillage is manured with sea-weed and sand, which are here procured in abundance: the state of agriculture is gradually improving. The principal seats are, Ennistymon House, Lahenzy, Woodmount, and Moy, the occasional residence of Sir W. Fitzgerald, Bart. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora: the rectory is united to those of Kilmacrehy and Killaspuglenane, constituting the corps of the archdeaconry; and the three vicarages, together with those of Killeilagh and Kilmoon, form the union of Kilmanaheen, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of this parish amounts to £190. 12. 3.; the entire tithe of the archdeaconry to £294. 19., and of the vicarial union to £221. 6. 6. The glebe-house is a modern building, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits contributed a loan of £369 and a gift of a similar sum: there is a glebe of 43 acres, subject to a charge of £10 per annum late currency. The church (at Ennistymon), built in 1831, is a handsome structure, for the erection of which the same Board granted a loan of £1000. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ennistymon, which also comprises the parish of Clouney and contains the chapels of Ennistymon, Lahinch, and Kilthomas. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILMANLOE, or Kilroe, a parish, in the union of Kanturk, barony of Duhallow, county of Cork, and province of Munster; containing, with part of the town of Kanturk, 1798 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Scarlane, comprises 919 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, partly impropriate in the family of Longfield, of Longueville, and partly appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral of Cloyne: the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £96, is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the appropriators. There is no provision for the cure of souls; the perpetual curate of Kanturk performs the occasional duties without stipend. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kanturk.

KILMANMAN, or Clonaslee, a parish, in the union of Mountmellick, barony of Tinnehinch, Queen's county, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (S. E.) from Balliboy; containing 4565 inhabitants. The name signifies the "church of Manman," and a church is said to have been founded here in the 7th century. Manman built the monastery of Lanchoil, or Lahoil, and called it Corrigeen, or the "hermitage of the rocks;" it is about two miles west from Kilmanman church, and near it is a barrow, called the "Giant's grave." At Killyshane was a nunnery, the burial-ground of which, with several monumental stones of great antiquity, was discovered in 1768. A manor court is held monthly at Clonaslee, which is a constabulary police station. The parish comprises 16,848¾ statute acres; and is in the diocese of Kildare: the rectory is impropriate in General E. Dunne; the vicarage forms part of the union of Rosinallis, or Oregan; and a perpetual curacy, consisting of this parish and two townlands of the parish of Rerymore, and called Clonaslee, is in the patronage of the Vicar. The tithe rent-charge is £212. 10. 9., of which £133. 1. are payable to the impropriator, £44. 17. 4. to the vicar, and the remainder to the perpetual curate. The church is at Clonaslee, and was rebuilt in 1814. Besides the vicar's glebe, the perpetual curate has a glebe-house and a glebe of 27 statute acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms the greater part of the district of Clonaslee, where the chapel is situated. There are two public schools at Clonaslee, under the Church Education Society and the National Board respectively. In this parish is Lough Annagh, which is three miles in circumference, and abounds with pike, roach, and perch: in the middle of the lake, where it is most shallow, certain oak framing is yet visible; and there is a traditional report that in the war of 1641 a party of insurgents had a wooden house erected on this platform, whence they went out at night in a boat and plundered the surrounding country. The principal residences are, Brittas; Castle Cuffe, in the grounds of which are the ruins of the baronial house erected by the first Sir Charles Coote, Bart., and destroyed in 1641; Edge Hill; and Coolnabanch. That this district was formerly well wooded, appears from Queen Elizabeth having thanked an English commander for conducting a party of her cavalry through the woods of Oregan.—See Clonaslee.

KILMANNAGH.—See Kilnamannagh.

KILMANNAN, or Kilmannon, a parish, in the barony of Bargy, union and county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (S. W.) from Wexford, on the road to Bannow; containing 1127 inhabitants. It comprises 4251¼ statute acres, and is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Mulraukin; the tithe rent-charge is £142. 10. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Rathangan, and has a chapel at Claristowo. The tower, or belfry, of the church is still standing, and from its large size is called the castle of Kilmannon: here is also an ancient castle called Great Gurteen.

KILMAOGUE, or KILMAGUE, a parish, in the union of NAAS, partly in the barony of EAST OPHALY, but chiefly in the barony of CONNELL, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Kildare; containing 3496 inhabitants. This parish, through which the Grand Canal passes, comprises $10,881\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres: agriculture is improving. The village contains 30 houses, and 142 inhabitants: a patent exists for fairs on May 25th, June 29th, and Sept. 25th, but none are held. The principal seats are New Park, Doro Ville, and Annsboro'. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, episcopally united in 1782 to the rectory and vicarage of Rathernon, and the rectory of Lulliamore (which is a prebend in the cathedral of Kildare), and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £184. 5. 6., and of the whole benefice £300. The glebe-house is in Rathernon parish; the glebes of the union comprise $28\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church has been rebuilt by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £558. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Allen and Milltown, comprising Kilmaogue, Rathernon, Feighcullen, Rathbride, and Pollardstown; and has a large chapel at the Leap. Here are several Danish forts. A new village has been erected in the centre of the parish, under the superintendence of the Rev. A. J. Preston, which is intended to be "a refuge for Protestants," and is now in a flourishing condition. —See ROBERTSTOWN.

KILMASTULLA, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of OWNEY and ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Killaloe, and on the road from Limerick to Dublin; containing 2046 inhabitants, and comprising 4805 statute acres. The land is mountainous, but chiefly under tillage; there is some bog, and plenty of gritstone. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, united by act of council, in 1790, to the rectory and vicarage of Templeichally or Templekelly, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £239, and of the whole benefice £508. 4. 3. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises $2\frac{1}{4}$ acres. The church is a plain building, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £500 in 1791. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballina, and has a neat chapel at Boher.

KILMEADEN, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Waterford, and on the river Suir; containing 2620 inhabitants, and comprising 9243 statute acres. Kilmeaden Castle, which from an early period was a chief seat of the Poers, was defended by one of them against Cromwell, but was taken and destroyed by his troops, and the unfortunate proprietor instantly hanged on an adjoining tree. The estate was divided among soldiers of the republican army, who transferred their shares to a gentleman named Ottrington, by whom several families from Ulster were settled on the property: the tomb of this Ottrington is in the churchyard, having been erected by his grand-daughter, Elizabeth, Viscountess Doneraile, through whom the estates were inherited by the present viscount. At Fair Brook was an extensive paper-manufactory, affording employment to about 140 persons; it is now a manufactory for blankets, and at Pouldrew are a large corn-mill and stores: the river Suir is here navigable for vessels of considerable burthen. There is a constabulary police station at the village, and near it is a chalybeate spring. The principal seat is Mount Congreve. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Waterford, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and to the deanery, chancellorship, and treasurership of the cathedral of Waterford. The tithe rent-charge is £297. 3., of which £169. 13. are divided among the appropriators, and the remainder paid to the vicar. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1807, gave £100 and lent £380; and a glebe of 11*a*. 2*p*., is attached to the vicarage, as is also a glebe of 15 acres which until lately belonged to the rectory. The late church was a plain building of great antiquity; a new edifice has been recently built upon its site, at a cost of £558, paid from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel. The parochial school is aided by an annual donation from Viscount Doneraile, and another school is aided by Mrs. Christmas; they afford instruction to about 70 children.

KILMEAN, or KILMAIN, a parish, in the barony of ATHLONE, union and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Roscommon, on the road to Athlone; containing 3194 inhabitants. This parish comprises 8966 statute acres: the soil is light, and the system of agriculture not much improved; there is a small quantity of bog. Limestone of very good quality is quarried, and much used in the neighbourhood for building, and for manufacturing into mantel-pieces; a small pottery is also carried on, which is supplied with clay found in the vicinity. The gentlemen's seats are, Moate Park, the residence of Lord Crofton, a substantial building of limestone, situated in a richly wooded demesne, and commanding from some high hills in the grounds extensive views of the Shannon and surrounding country; and Ballymurry House. Kilmean is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, constituting part of the union of Killenvoy; the rectory is impropriate in the Incorporated Society, and the tithe rent-charge is £95, half payable to the impropriators and half to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of St. John's; the chapel, a plain thatched building, is in the townland of Curroy. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends. A school is supported by the National Board, and another is under the Church Education Society. In the demesne of Moate Park are the remains of an old church, the cemetery of which is still used.

KILMEEDY, a parish, in the union of NEWCASTLE, barony of UPPER CONNELLO, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E.) from Newcastle, on the road to Castletown; containing 4739 inhabitants, of whom 222 are in the village. It comprises 9037 statute acres, about one-eighth of which is under tillage, and the remainder principally meadow and pasture, including some large dairy-farms: here is some profitable bog, together with about 1000 acres of mountain land, consisting chiefly of silicious grit, of which there are good quarries; the low lands are in some parts based on limestone. The village is small; it has a cattle-fair on Nov. 7th. At the village of Feenah is a dispensary. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, forming part of the union of Corcomohide; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of Limerick cathedral: the vicarial tithe rent-charge of the parish is £86. 17. 8. The church, which is near the village, was erected in 1665, when the vicarage was created; it is in bad condition, and has been condemned. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballyegran, and has a chapel. A school-house at Heathfield is now occupied by police.

KILMEEN, a parish, in the union of Kanturk, barony of Duhallow, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Newmarket; on the river Blackwater, and on the new road from Roskeenbridge to Castleisland; containing 10,380 inhabitants. It comprises 36,710 statute acres, about one-fourth of which is arable land; of the remainder, which consists chiefly of mountain pasture and bog, a large portion is now likely to be brought into cultivation, and the state of agriculture improved, by means of the facilities afforded by the government roads recently constructed through this previously wild and almost impassable district. A court for the manor of Castle M'Auliffe is occasionally held, in which debts not exceeding 40*s.* late currency are recoverable. The principal seat is Woodview, situated in a well-planted demesne. A portion of the crown estate of Pobble O'Keefe, now in progress of improvement, is within the limits of the parish. Kilmeen is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Donoughmore, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Droumtariffe, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge, £555, is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Boherbee, which also includes small portions of the parishes of Droumtariffe and Nohoval-Daly: the chapel at Boherbee is a spacious modern building; there is also a chapel at Cushkeem or Cuscian. Of the ancient castle of M'Auliffe, the chief seat of the sept of that name, the foundations only can now be traced.—See Boherbee and King-William's-town.

KILMEEN, a parish, partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, but chiefly in the Western division of the barony of East Carbery, union of Dunmanway, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 5 miles (N. W.) from Clonakilty, on the road to Dunmanway; containing 3736 inhabitants. It comprises 8667 statute acres, of which 5324 are arable, 1408 pasture, 864 bog, 80 woodland, and the remainder rough pasture and waste land. The surface is uneven, and the soil light but productive; about half of the land has been brought into tillage under the old system since new roads were opened in 1820. At Oak Mount and Lisnabrinny are extensive remains of ancient woods; and large plantations have been formed round the glebe-house. There is a constabulary police station at Ballygurteen, where cattle-fairs are held on June 24th, July 25th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 21st. The principal seats are Bennett's Grove, Oak Mount, and Lisnabrinny. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £562. 10. The glebe-house was erected in 1790, by the then incumbent, with the aid of a gift of £100 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 25 acres. The church is a very neat edifice with a square tower, for the erection of which the same Board granted a loan of £460, in 1810. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising Kilmeen and Castleventry, and part of Kilkerranmore, in the two first of which are chapels; that of Kilmeen, situated at Rossmore, is a large plain edifice. The parochial school is under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, and is aided by the rector; the master's house is a good building, and the school is endowed with two acres of land by Mr. Cox. To the west of the church is the strong castle of Ballinward, which was built by Randal Oge Harley; it was garrisoned by the English in 1641, subsequently dismantled by order of Cromwell, and granted with the adjoining lands to the Archbishop of Dublin by Charles II. Here are several ancient raths, one of which, near Lisnabrinny, has a very curious entrance.

KILMEEN, a parish, in the union of Loughrea, partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in the barony of Leitrim, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 3 miles (E.) from Loughrea, on the road to Eyrecourt; containing 980 inhabitants. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming the corps of the prebend of Kilmeen in the cathedral of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £87. 4. 8. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a small chapel. There are the ruins of a castle at Ballydoogan.

KILMEGAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Kinelarty, partly in Lecale, but chiefly in Upper Iveagh, union of Downpatrick, county of Down, and province of Ulster; containing, with the post-town of Castlewellan (which is described under its own head), 7467 inhabitants. It comprises 13,971¾ statute acres; 1793 are in Kinelarty, 5983¼ (of which 22¼ are water) in Lecale, and 6195¼ (of which 107 are water) in Upper Iveagh. Of the entire surface, about 500 are woodland, 800 pasture, 150 bog, and the remainder arable. The greater part of the townland of Murlough is covered with sand, which is constantly drifted in from Dundrum bay; the land near Castlewellan is stony, cold, and marshy, but in other parts of the parish the soil is rich and well cultivated. There are several quarries of granite; lead-ore has been found in different parts, and there are mines of lead and zinc in Slieve-Croob, and in the hill above Dundrum, which see. Slieve-Croob, situated on the northern boundary of the parish, rises 1755 feet above the level of the sea. The principal seats are, that of Earl Annesley at Castlewellan lake; Ballywillwill; Mount Panther; Wood Lodge; Woodlawn; Greenvale; Annsbro'; and Clanvaraghan. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, forming part of the union of Kilkeel; the tithe rent-charge is £375. The church is a large handsome edifice, for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £109: divine service is also performed in the market-house at Castlewellan. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Castlewellan, and has chapels at Castlewellan, Aughlisnafin, and Ballywillwill. At Castlewellan are likewise meeting-houses for Presbyterians of the General Assembly, and Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school, near the church, is supported by the Marquess of Downshire and the rector; the late marquess gave the master a house, a garden, and an acre of land. There are other public schools; one of them aided by Earl Annesley, and some in connexion with the National Board of Education. At Sliddery ford, near Dundrum, is a cromlech, the table-stone of which is flat on the upper surface, and convex beneath, resting upon three upright stones, each four feet high; near this cromlech is a circle of upright stones, the entrance of which is marked by two stones larger than the rest. On a hill called Slieve-na-boil-trough, and near a small lake, is another cromlech, consisting of a table-stone of rough grit, in the shape of a coffin, ten feet long, and five feet in the broadest part, resting on three supporters, about 6½ feet from the ground.

KILMELCHEDOR, or KILMALKEADER, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 9½ miles (N. N. W.) from Dingle, and on the eastern side of Smerwick harbour; containing 2333 inhabitants. It comprises 5900 statute acres, which chiefly consist of mountain pasture and bog. From the improvement of the roads in this district, and the abundance of sea manure, the state of agriculture is gradually improving: some of the inhabitants are employed in the fishery of Smerwick harbour, and salmon is taken at the mouth of the Moorstown river, which runs into the harbour, and partly bounds the parish on the north. Kilmelchedor is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is partly impropriate in Lord Ventry; the remainder, with the vicarage, one-fifth of the rectory of Ardfert, and the entire rectory of Fenit, constituting the union and corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Ardfert, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £62. 5., of which £9. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire tithe of the benefice amounts to £167. 1. 6. There is no church or glebe-house, but there is a glebe of about five acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Keel or Terreter, which also comprises the parishes of Dunurlin, Donquin, Kilquane, and Marhyn, and the detached portion of South Cloghane called the Lateeves: there is a chapel at Carrig, near the village of Muriagh, in this parish; and another at Boulteens, in the parish of Dunurlin.

The parish is remarkable for its remains of antiquity, among which the most curious is one of the stone-roofed anchorite cells, supposed to be the most ancient description of buildings in Ireland, except the round towers. It is about 20 feet long, 10 wide, and 20 high, with a small door at one end and a neat window at the other, and is formed by a kind of parabolic arch entirely of stone, strongly jointed, but without mortar; it is still nearly perfect. Near it is the ancient castle of Gallerus, built by one of the Knights of Kerry. The church of Kilmelchedor, now in ruins, is one of the oldest in the county, and is said to have been built by the Spaniards; at the entrance is a finely sculptured Norman arch. Some of the tombstones are inscribed with Ogham and other ancient characters, and in the churchyard is a curious stone cross of considerable size. At Kill are the ruins of a friary, also supposed to have been founded by the Spaniards when they colonised this district; and in the vicinity are the remains of an old fortification, and another stone-roofed cell, but in a less perfect state than the preceding. The beautiful crystals called "Kerry diamonds" are found on the rocky shore of the parish.

KILMENAN, a parish, in the barony of FASSADINING, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2¾ miles (S. by W.) from Ballynakill, and near the river Nore; containing 319 inhabitants, and 1005¼ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Attanagh; the tithe rent-charge is £45. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballyragget.

KILMESSAN, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of LOWER DEECE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (N. W.) from Dunshaughlin, on the road to Bective-Bridge; containing 773 inhabitants, of whom 138 are in the village, which contains 25 houses. The parish comprises 3337 statute acres. Swainstown is a handsome residence in an extensive and well-planted demesne. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, united episcopally, in 1828, to the chapelry of Macetown, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Drogheda, in whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £168. 15., of which £37. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross value of the vicarial benefice, tithe and glebe inclusive, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £321. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 12½ acres valued at £28 per annum. The church, built in 1731, is a neat structure, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £297. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Dunsany, and has a handsome chapel at Kilmessan.

KILMICHAEL, county CLARE.—See KILMIHILL.

KILMICHAEL, a parish, in the union of DUNMANWAY, partly in the Western division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, but chiefly in the barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Macroom, on the road to Dunmanway; containing 6250 inhabitants. It comprises 20,869 statute acres; about half is good pasture, one-third arable, and the remainder bog and mountain. The substratum is slaty, containing indications of copper, particularly in the bed of the river Lee, which separates this parish from Kinneigh. Here is a constabulary police station. The principal seats are Cooldaniel, Carrigbuoy, and Greenville, in the demesne of which last are some lakes with great numbers of swans and water-fowl; also an ancient rath, now planted, where a bag of copper coins, and several apartments communicating by narrow passages, have been discovered. The house was attacked in 1822 by the Whiteboys, who were repulsed, and several of them killed. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, episcopally united, in 1797, to part of the rectory and vicarage of Macloneigh, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £519. 5., and of the entire benefice £706. 15. There is no glebe-house; the glebe of Kilmichael comprises 7 acres, and in Macloneigh is a glebe of 48 acres. The church, a small building accommodating 80 persons, was lately erected by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at a cost of £450. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also Macloneigh, Kilmurry, and Dunisky, and containing three chapels, two in Kilmichael, and one in Macloneigh.

KILMICHAELOGUE.—See GOREY.

KILMICKLIN, or KILMILCON, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Tipperary, on the new line of road to Nenagh; containing 161 inhabitants, and comprising 588 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, entirely appropriate to the archbishop's mensal; the tithe rent-charge is £14. 5.

KILMIHILL, or KILMICHAEL, a parish, in the union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Kildysart, and on the road from Kilrush to Ennis; containing 5090 inhabitants, of whom 118 are in the village. It comprises 18,772¼ statute acres, about two-thirds of which consist of arable land of medium quality, and the remainder principally of mountain pasture: there is a considerable portion of waste and bog. Fairs are held at the village on May 19th, July 18th, and Sept. 29th; and a court for the manor of Crovreahan is occasionally held at Kilmichael by the seneschal, in which small debts are recoverable. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Lord Castlecoote and in Bindon Scott, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilfarboy. The tithe rent-charge is £144, of which £47. 1. 6. are payable to Lord Castlecoote's representatives, £41. 10. 9. to Mr. Scott, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which also comprises the parish of Kilmacduane and contains the chapel of Kilmichael, and those of Cooreclare and Creegh in Kilmacduane. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILMINA, a parish, in the union of WESTPORT, barony of BURRISHOOLE, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; adjoining the post-town of Newport, and containing, with several inhabited islands, 7876 inhabitants. It comprises 10,762 statute acres, of which five-sixths are arable and pasture, and a small quantity bog. Rosslands, a seat in the parish, is delightfully situated on a creek of Clew bay, in which are several islands. The chief are, Inishbee, Inishcuttle, and Inishnakellive, the property of Sir S. O'Malley, Bart.; Inishduff, on which are the ruins of an ancient church; Inishgowley, Island Tagart, Clynish (a tithe-free island), and Inishturk, the property of the Marquess of Sligo; Inishrahen, Inishee, Inishleague; and Ioishugh, on which last is a coast-guard station; also a remarkable clay cliff, 90 feet high. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly appropriate to the vicarage, and the tithe rent-charge is £262. 10., of which £232. 4. are payable to the vicar. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of seven acres on Calf Island. The church was erected in 1835, by a grant of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising this parish and Kilmaclasser, in each of which is a chapel; that of Kilmina is a large handsome building, erected in 1822 at an expense of £1200. There are two public schools, one of which is under the National Board; the other is at the Roman Catholic chapel. On the island of Clynish is a very ancient burial-place, in which stone coffins are frequently found; and in the township of Killeen, where the vicar resides, is a graveyard, supposed to be the oldest in the county; it lies in a small creek, and is surrounded by four Danish forts: coffins of very rude description have been raised in the fields adjoining it, and one measuring more than six feet, composed of long and weighty stones, was raised in 1845, but there was not a vestige of a skeleton. Traces exist in the parish of Druidical altars; and bones of animals, supposed to have been offered in sacrifice, are commonly dug from a depth in the ground.

KILMOCAHILL, a parish, in the barony of GOWRAN, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N.) from Gowran, and on the road from Dublin to Waterford; containing 1552 inhabitants. It comprises 4593¼ statute acres, and is mostly good arable land, with the exception of 100 acres of mountain land at Knockadeen. Limestone and flagstone abound, and there is a marble-quarry at Butler's Grove: indications of coal exist on the edge of the parish, adjoining Shankill. Here is a corn-mill worked by a small stream, which falls into the Barrow. The principal seats are, Mount Rothe, the property of Sir T. M'Kenny, Bart.; Viewmount; and Paulstown Castle, an ancient square pile of building, said to have formerly been the residence of Sir Pearse Butler. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Master and Brethren of the Hospital of the Holy Ghost, Waterford, and in Henry Flood, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £277. 10., of which £150 are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house was built in 1826, by a gift of £400, and a loan of £300, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of five acres. The church is a neat structure, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1806, gave £500. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Grange-Silvae.

KILMOCAR, a parish, in the barony of FASSADINING, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Castlecomer, and near the river Nore; containing 1997 inhabitants. It comprises 4815½ statute acres, of which about two-thirds are arable and pasture, and the remainder mountain. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde, and the tithe rent-charge is £193. 10., of which £127. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Conahy, and partly in that of Ballyragget.

KILMOCREE, a parish, in the barony of FORTH, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Wexford; on the south-western part of Wexford harbour, and on the high road from Wexford to Killinick and Rosslare; containing 218 inhabitants. It comprises 1112¼ statute acres, which are partly under tillage, but chiefly in pasture; the cultivation of green crops has been introduced, and agriculture generally is in an improved state. A small inlet, separating this parish from Killinick, is navigable for lighters, which bring up coal and other articles. Grange, a seat in the parish, is agreeably situated in a thriving plantation near the shore of the harbour. Kilmocree is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Killinick; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Portsmouth, and the tithe rent-charge is £44. 18. 8., of which £13. 8. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilmocree is part of the district of Piercetown, and has a chapel on the border of the parish. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILMODUM, a parish, in the union of KILKENNY, partly in the barony of FASSADINING, but chiefly in the barony of GOWRAN, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4½ miles (S.) from Castlecomer; on the river Dinin and the road to Kilkenny; containing 1119 inhabitants, and comprising 3425 statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Dunmore; the rectory is impropriate in the corporation of Kilkenny, and the tithe rent-charge is £157. 10., of which £105 are payable to the impropriators, and £52. 10. to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of St. John's district.

KILMODUMOGE, a parish, in the barony of FASSADINING, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (S. by W.) from Castlecomer; containing 551 inhabitants, and comprising 1726½ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Mothell; the tithe rent-charge is £118. 9. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Muckalee.

KILMOE, a parish, in the union of SKIBBEREEN, Western division of the barony of WEST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing, with the villages of Rock Island and Crookhaven (both of which are described under their respective heads), 7234 inhabitants. It forms a peninsula on the southern coast, bounded by Dunmanus bay and Crookhaven; and comprises 13,994 statute acres. About one-third of the land is under tillage, chiefly by spade husbandry, and the remainder is bog and mountain land, but the bases of the mountains afford good pasturage; the highest mountain is Cahir, near Mizen Head. The scenery is very bold and interesting. The mountains are of schistose formation, based on argillaceous grit, with veins of quartz intermingled; deposits of copper are found in various places, and masses of it are to be seen in the mountain streams, but no mines have been opened. There are several small lakes. On the western and southern boundaries are three remarkable headlands; namely, Three-Castle Head; Mizen Head, called by Ptolemy Notium, or the South Promontory, it being the most south-western land in Ireland, in lat. 51° 26′ 16″, and lon. 9° 50′; and Brow Head, also said to be the Notium of Ptolemy. Dunmanus bay, which bounds the parish on the north-west, has deep water and good anchorage almost as far up as Mannin Island, but is greatly exposed to westerly winds, and is little frequented except by small vessels, which can ride in Dunmanus creek or above Mannin Island. Besides this island, there are in the bay, Owen, Horse, Colt, Lamb, Bird, Furze, and Carbery Islands, of which, the last is inhabited. Within the limits of the parish are numerous bays and creeks; the principal are Ballydevlin bay, Crookhaven, and Barley Cove, in each of which is good anchorage. Petty-sessions are held at Tourmore on alternate Wednesdays, and there is a constabulary police station at Goleen. The seats are Rockview, Seaview, Rock-Island House, Ballydevlin, Crookhaven House, Ballynaule, Goleen House, and Tourmore. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £375. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 7*a.* 4*p.*, and here are some extensive tracts of mountain land belonging to the see of Cork, now in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The church, at Crookhaven, has been rebuilt at a cost of £732, of which £582 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £150 were raised by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of West Skull, and has a chapel at Goleen, built in 1806. The three castles which give name to the promontory of Three-Castle Head are detached buildings, within a gun-shot of each other; they are on the cliff, near a spacious and very clear lake, and are stated to have been built by the Mahonys in the 15th century. At Ballydevlin is a castle called Desmond Castle, built in 1495, likewise by the Mahonys. Some remains of ancient castles also exist at Lisgriffin, and on the shore of the lake of Dunkelly; and near the head of Barley Cove are the ruins of the old parochial church.

KILMOGANNY, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of KELLS, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. W.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Kilkenny to Carrick-on-Suir; containing 2635 inhabitants, of whom 593 are in the village. During the parliamentary war, a party of Cromwell's troops had a skirmish here with the Walsh party, of Castlehall, which they defeated: William III. passed a night at Rossenarre, on his way to Limerick. The parish comprises 7454¾ statute acres, including about 500 acres of woodland and a large tract of mountain: it contains slate, limestone, freestone, and flagstone; also a mill. A patent for two fairs exists, but they are not much frequented. Rossenarre, the residence of W. Morris Reade, Esq., is an elegant seat in a demesne of 600 acres, about 200 of which are planted. The village consists of 105 houses, generally handsome and well built, and has lately been much improved; contains a receiving-house for letters under Kilkenny; is a constabulary police station; and has petty-sessions, and a fever hospital and dispensary: near it is a large nursery of forest-trees. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, united to the rectories and vicarages of Aughaviller and Kilkeasy, and in the patronage of the Bishop; net income, £320. There is a glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1822, gave £450 and lent £50: the glebe comprises 5½ acres. The church, which is a handsome structure, was built in 1831, by a loan of £750 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donamagan, and has a chapel. There is a school in connexion with the Church Education Society. Remains of castellated residences of the Walsh family still exist at Castlehill, Clone, and Kerchill; there are also some chalybeate springs.

KILMOILY, or KILMAYLY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Tralee, and on the western coast; containing 4459 inhabitants, of whom 140 are in the village. The parish comprises 7750 statute acres, chiefly in tillage. Several families of the settlers called "Palatines" reside at Toherbanne, where a colony was established more than a century since by an ancestor of the present proprietor. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, appropriate to the see; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the tithe rent-charge is £337. 10., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the bishop, who allows £50 per annum for discharging the clerical duties. There is no church, glebe-house, or glebe; but divine service is regularly performed in the school-house at Toherbanne, and it is in contemplation by the bishop to procure the erection of a church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ardfert; there is a chapel at Lerrigs. The school-house at Toherbanne, with apartments for the master, was erected by subscription in 1835. Near the churchyard are the ruins of Ballykealy Castle, an ancient residence of the Fitzmaurices.

KILMOKEA, a parish, in the union of NEW ROSS, barony of SHELBURNE, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from New Ross, on the road to Fethard; containing 1220 inhabitants. It comprises $3420\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, and is chiefly under tillage. The soil is light, but in some parts very good; the green slab on the banks of the Barrow, containing a testaceous sediment equal to the finest marl, is used for manure, and the state of agriculture has been much improved under the auspices of the South Wexford Agricultural Association. A part of the parish, called "the Island," has since the recession of the tide been embanked and reclaimed. The Barrow is navigable here for vessels of the largest class, and an inlet from it extending to the village of Campile is navigable for small craft. This parish, and the adjoining parish of Whitechurch, derive much advantage from the late establishment of two steamers between Ross and Waterford; by means of these, a cheap and ready transit is found for agricultural produce and farming stock of all kinds, and an agreeable and commodious conveyance for the residents in the neighbourhood. The seats are Kilmanock and Fruit Hill, in the demesne of which latter, remarkable for its fine timber, is a clump of evergreen oaks, here considered a great curiosity. Kilmokea is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Whitechurch, and of the corps of the prebend of that name in the cathedral of Ferns: the tithe rent-charge is £222. 18. 6. There is a handsome glebe-house, built in 1810, by the then incumbent, at a cost exceeding £1200, and much improved by the Rev. John K. Robinson, the present rector; it commands a beautiful view of the river Barrow: the glebe consists of 19 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Sutton's parish, comprising the parishes of Whitechurch, Kilmokea, and Ballybrazill, and part of Old Ross and St. James's: there is a new chapel at Horewood, with a commodious house for the priest; the old chapel has been converted into a school, with apartments for the master and mistress. Here are the remains of Ballykearogue Castle, and of its chapel; they are stated to have been built by Roger de Sutton, who in 1170 accompanied Robert Fitzstephen and Hervey de Montemarisco into Ireland, and obtained from the latter large grants of land in the barony of Shelburne: the neighbourhood is often called after him Sutton's parish. In "the Island" are vestiges of two intrenchments, by some supposed to have been thrown up by the Danes to defend the pass to Ballinlaw ferry.

KILMOLARA, a parish, in the union of BALLINROBE, barony of KILMAIN, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Ballinrobe, on the road to Cong; containing 1296 inhabitants. It is situated on Lough Mask, and comprises 3961 statute acres, principally in tillage; there are some fine limestone quarries. Neale Park is the handsome house and demesne of Lord Kilmaine. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, united to the rectories and vicarages of Ballincalla and Ross, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £150, and of the whole benefice £708. 15. The glebe-house and glebe of the union are in Ballincalla. The church, a neat plain building with a square tower, likewise situated in the parish of Ballincalla, has been repaired by a grant of £125 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called The Neale, comprising also the parish of Ballincalla; the chapel is at The Neale. In Neale Park are some remarkable antiquities, particularly a stone on which are carved the figure of an unicorn opposite to a man surrounded with a glory, and a lion below them. According to an inscription beneath this stone, it was found in a cave near the spot, and the figures were the gods worshipped here by Edda and Con, after the latter of whom, it is said, Connaught was named: the figures were called in Irish "Dine Feale," or "Gods of Felicity," from which the place was called Nehale, or "The Neale."

KILMOLASH, a parish, partly in the barony of DECIES-WITHIN-DRUM, but chiefly in that of DECIES-WITHOUT-DRUM, unions of LISMORE and DUNGARVAN, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. E.) from Lismore; containing 1491 inhabitants. It comprises 3689 statute acres, of which about three-fourths are arable; and includes some bog and mountain land, and about 70 acres of woodland. The river Phinisk flows through the parish; and on its banks, at Bewley, is a cavern in the limestone rock, near which was formerly a religious edifice, said to have belonged to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The principal seats are Woodstock and Ballinaparka. Kilmolash is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory forms part of the union of Kilrush and of the corps of the archdeaconry of Lismore, and the tithe rent-charge is £174. 7. 6., of which £116. 5. are payable to the rector and the remainder to the vicar. Here are the ruins of an ancient building, called Clough, where it is said King John and his attendants halted on their way from Waterford to Cork. It consisted of a quadrangle of about a quarter of an acre, inclosed with high walls defended by towers at the angles, with a drawbridge on the south side; the towers only appear to have been roofed. Part of the ruins of the church also still exist.

KILMOLERAN, a parish, in the union of Carrick-on-Suir, barony of Upperthird, county of Waterford, and province of Munster; containing, with the suburb of the town of Carrick-on-Suir, called Carrickbeg, 3113 inhabitants. An abbey is said to have been erected at Bolhendesart by St. Maidoc of Ferns, in the 6th century. The parish comprises 1938 statute acres, forming a beautiful tract on the southern bank of the river Suir, and includes the demesne of Coolnamuck, around which are some remarkably fine trees: the ruins of a castle built by Giraldus Wall, add considerably to the beauty of the place, and are preserved with great care. Kilmoleran is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the vicarial union of Dysart; the rectory forms part of the corps of the prebend of Dysart in the cathedral of Lismore, and the tithe rent-charge is £144. 4., of which £96. 2. 6. are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. Glan-Patrick, which is now within the western boundary of the parish, was formerly a separate parish. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilmoleran is the head of a district, called Carrickbeg, comprising the parishes of Kilmoleran, Dysart, and Fenagh, with part of Carrick, and containing chapels at Carrickbeg and Windgap. The ancient castle of Ballyclough stands on a steep hill, all the accessible parts of which are commanded by loop-holes and embrasures: a circular staircase conducts to the watch tower, from which there is an extensive view.

KILMONEY, a parish, in the union of Kinsale, barony of Kerricurrihy, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 8 miles (S. E. by S.) from Cork, and on the road from Robert's Cove to Carrigaline, containing 771 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the river Awenbwuy or Ownabuy, comprises 1431 statute acres; about 50 acres are woodland, 100 bog and waste, and the remainder good arable land. The soil is generally fertile, and most of it under cultivation, but the system of agriculture is in a very unimproved state: the principal manure is sea-sand, brought from Crosshaven, but in some places lime obtained from Carrigaline is used. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and in many parts beautifully picturesque. Kilmoney is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union of Tracton; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Shannon, and the tithe rent-charge is £82. 10. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Carrigaline, also called Templebready. In the demesne of Kilmoney House are the ruins of the old church.

KILMONOGUE, a parish, in the union of Kinsale, barony of Kinnalea, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 5 miles (N. E.) from Kinsale, and on the southern coast; containing 1178 inhabitants. This place, in 1642, became the head-quarters of a numerous body of the Irish forces, who encamped at Belgooley with the design of making a simultaneous attack upon Cork, Bandon, and Kinsale, of which plan part only was carried into execution. A very thriving village has recently sprung up here. Mr. Downing has erected some spacious boulting-mills, at an expense of £7000; they are worked by machinery of the most improved description, and are capable of producing 15,000 bags of flour annually. There are also a manufactory of starch from potatoes alone, and a vinegar distillery. Several neat houses are now in progress, and it is intended to erect a court-house, in which petty-sessions will be held. Herrings frequent the bay in large shoals, and are sometimes taken in great quantities. Oyster haven, on the shore of which this place is situated, is a creek about two miles to the east of the entrance to the harbour of Kinsale, affording good shelter for vessels in nine feet at low water, and the entrance to which is on the west side of the Sovereign's Isles; the best anchorage is on the west side, in the mouth of that branch which runs to the westward. The parish comprises 3061 statute acres: the soil is for the most part deep and rich; about one-fourth is under tillage, and the remainder principally in large dairy-farms. The system of agriculture is generally very indifferent. There are large tracts of slob both at Newborough and Mount Long, which might be reclaimed and brought into cultivation; indeed the tract at Newborough is now undergoing this process by Mr. Daunt. The principal manure is sea-sand, which is raised in great quantities in the haven, and brought up in large boats, of which about 40 are thus engaged, each employing three men. The chief seats are, Newborough, a retired and pleasant residence on the eastern side of the haven, and in the midst of thriving plantations; and Oatlands, a handsome modern mansion, occupying an eminence commanding an extensive and varied inland prospect of great beauty, with a pleasing view of the groves of Newborough on the south. The ancient residence of the Knolles family, at Killeigh, is now in ruins.

The living is a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Cork: the rectory is partly impropriate in the Earl of Shannon, and partly belongs to the union of St. Peter's, Cork, and the corps of the archdeaconry; the perpetual curacy is united to that of Nohoval. The tithe rent-charge is £159. 18., of which £49. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and £110. 8. to the archdeacon of Cork. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clontead. The male and female parochial schools, for which houses were built partly from the lord-lieutenant's fund, are supported by subscription, and endowed with an acre and three-quarters of land, and a male and female school at Newborough is supported by Mr. Daunt and the Cork Diocesan Association. On the shore of the haven are the ruins of the parish church; and not far distant stand those of Mount-Long Castle, built by the family of Long in the reign of Elizabeth, and which in the war of 1641 was taken by Cromwell, and with the annexed estate given to some of his soldiers.

KILMOON, a parish, in the union of Ennistymon, barony of Burren, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 8 miles (N.) from Ennistymon, and on the road from Ballyvaughan to the bay of Ballyhaline; containing 1239 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from an ancient conventual church of which no records are extant, comprises 6461 statute acres: 5285 are applotted under the Tithe act; the remainder consists chiefly of rocky mountain and bog. With the exception only of the townlands of Lisdoonvarna and Ballytigue, which belong to the Stackpoole family, the whole of the parish, together with that of Kilheny or Killeany, and the castle, town, and lands of Dungan in the barony of Bunratty, were granted by Charles II. to Pierse Creagh, Esq., as a reward for his services against Cromwell, and in compensation for the loss of his estate of Adare, in the county of Limerick; great part of the property is held, with the manorial rights and privileges, by his descendant, Pierse Creagh, Esq., of Rathbane. The surface is in general hilly, and intersected by deep ravines formed by torrents rushing periodically from the mountain of Slieveilva, on the northern confines of the parish, one of the highest mountains in the county, and celebrated for its abundance of grouse. Nearly two-thirds of the parish have a very rich substratum of limestone, lying about two feet beneath the surface, and producing most luxuriant herbage, highly prized for grazing cattle, of which large droves are sent to the Cork and Liverpool markets. Of the remainder, the greater part is dry bog covered with heath, which might be easily reclaimed and brought into cultivation, from the abundance of limestone. Very rich iron-ore has been found in several places; and on the townland of Rathbane both coal and iron are stated to abound, though neither has yet been worked: slate also has been discovered on the mountain of Slieveilva. Rathbane is the residence of the Creagh family, who have greatly improved the ample and picturesque demesne in which it is situated; large plantations have been made along the romantic glens, and on the banks of two beautiful rivulets which encircle the grounds.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora; the rectory forming part of the union of Killeilagh, and the vicarage part of the union of Kilmanaheen: the tithe rent-charge is £55. 7., two-thirds payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Tuoclea. There are some slight remains of the convent, church, and cemetery of Kilmoon; and within the limits of the parish are three large earthworks, and five stone forts called Cahers, said to have been Danish encampments. There are also considerable remains of the old castle of Lisdoonvarna, with its terraces, garden walls, and fortifications; it was formerly the property of the Davorens, an ancient and powerful family in Burren, but now belongs to the Stackpoole family.

On the demesne of Rathbane are several very powerful mineral SPRINGS, sometimes erroneously called the Lisdoonvarna spas. One of them is celebrated as among the strongest chalybeates in the kingdom: it contains so large a portion of iron, that in a few seconds it stains with a ferruginous colour any substance with which it may come in contact; and it has been found peculiarly efficacious in hepatitis, consumption, scorbutic and bilious affections, and rheumatism. Near this is another spring, which on analysis was found to contain, in addition to the iron, considerable portions of sulphur and magnesia; the water is used with great benefit as an aperient. On the opposite side of a deep ravine, is a spring powerfully impregnated with naphtha, the exhalations of which taint the surrounding air; silver thrown into the water is instantly changed to a deep gold colour; and the water has been used with success as a cure for cutaneous diseases and for rheumatism. About a furlong further up the ravine, is a fourth spring, called the Copperas well; it has not been analysed, but has been used externally from time immemorial with effect as a cure for ulcers. These mineral springs, under the appellation of the Lisdoonvarna spas, have been known and appreciated for centuries; they are situated in deep ravines at the base of lofty hills of black slate, between the strata of which are found large quantities of bright metallic ore resembling silver. From the bad state of the roads, and the want of proper accommodation, they have been comparatively neglected by invalids. Several cottages have, however, been recently built in the vicinity of the waters for the reception of visiters; and if the proprietor continues his improvements, and a facility of access be afforded, this place will probably become one of the most frequented spas in Ireland.

KILMOON, a parish, in the barony of SKREEN, union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Dunshaughlin, and on the road from Dublin to Belfast, by way of Ashbourne; containing 639 inhabitants. It comprises 1823 statute acres; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united by episcopal authority, in 1826, to the rectory and vicarage of Piercetownlandy: according to an arrangement which has existed for some years, the Crown and the Primate present alternately. The tithe rent-charge of Kilmoon is £109. 10., and of the entire benefice £236. 11. There is a glebe-house near the church, on a glebe of 30 acres valued at £45 per annum; and a glebe at Piercetownlandy is let for £16 per annum. The church, which is at the north-western extremity of the parish, is a plain building; it was erected in 1816 by a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, and has been repaired by a grant of £106 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Curragha or Creekstown. On the confines of the parish is a national school.

KILMORE, a parish, partly in the barony of LOWER ORIOR, but chiefly in that of O'NEILLAND WEST, union and county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Armagh to Belfast; containing, with the post-town of Richhill (which is described under its own head), 14,256 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Kilmore-Aedhain, derived that name from the foundation of a church in the territory of Huadneth, by St. Mochtee, the founder of Louth, by whom the building was dedicated to St. Aedan. The parish comprises $17,274\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which $4799\frac{3}{4}$ are in the barony of Lower Orior, and $12,474\frac{3}{4}$ in that of O'Neilland West. The soil is fertile; the system of agriculture is highly improved; there is no waste land, and only a small quantity of bog. Here are several quarries of whinstone, which is raised for building; and limestone is found in great abundance, and quarried both for building and for manure. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and towards the south and east are some beautiful views extending to the sea, and comprehending the mountains of Morne: the principal seats are Richhill Castle, situated in an extensive and embellished demesne; Wheatfield; Bellview; Killynhanvagh; Anna Hill; and Course Lodge. The linen manufacture is carried on, employing a great number of persons. A court is held at Richhill on the first Friday in every month for the manor of Mullalelish and Legacony, in which debts under 40*s.* are recoverable.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, constituting the corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Armagh, in the patronage of the Lord Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £909. 18. The glebe-house was built in 1793 by the then incumbent, at a cost exceeding £1700, towards which the Board of First Fruits contributed £100; it is a spacious and handsome residence, situated in grounds tastefully disposed: the glebe comprises 679 acres of profitable land. The church, with the exception of the ancient tower, was rebuilt in 1814, at an expense of £2800, of which £2000 were a loan from the Board; and in 1825 the massive square tower was surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire covered with copper, at an expense of £300, of which half was defrayed by the rector and the remainder by subscription: the edifice occupies a commanding eminence, and is seen to great advantage at a distance. A church was built in 1775 at Mullavilly, for the accommodation of the parishioners in that part of the parish: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the rector. The income of the perpetual curate amounts to £94. 4. 7½., of which £69. 4. 7½. are paid by the rector of Kilmore, and £25 out of Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund; the glebe-house was built by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50, in 1812, from the Board of First Fruits. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are two chapels, both small buildings, situated respectively at Richhill and Mullavilly. There are also places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, for the Society of Friends, and Independents. Of several public schools, two are supported by the rector, two by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's fund, and one by Miss Richardson, of Richhill Castle; two are endowed with an acre of land each by the rector, who also built the school-houses. A payment of £3. 1. 6. is annually made to the poor, arising from land near the village, called the Honey-Pot field; and Mr. Atkinson, of Greenhall, in 1827, bequeathed £50, the interest of which is annually divided by the rector among the Protestant poor. There are a mendicity association, and a voluntary poor fund. In the townland of Castle-Roe are extensive ruins of the castle which gave name to the district, and which is said to have been founded by Rory O'Nial in the reign of Elizabeth; it occupied a lofty eminence, commanding the entire country. The former glebe-house was part of the ancient abbey, and contained several dormitories and cells with narrow lights and very massive walls; but the only vestige of the abbey is the holy well, inclosed in the rector's garden. On a high hill in the parish, Cromwell is said to have had an encampment.

KILMORE, a parish, and the seat of a diocese, partly in the barony of CLONMAHON, but chiefly in that of UPPER LOUGHTEE, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Cavan, on the road to Killesandra; containing, with part of the market-town of Ballinagh (which is separately described), 7250 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name, signifying the "Great Church," from the abbey of Cella Magna, founded here at an early period by St. Columba, comprises 16,886 statute acres, including 2154 in Lough Oughter. The soil is various, and the land in some parts under profitable cultivation; there are quarries of good building-stone, and gold and silver have been found. The principal seats are Lismore Castle, the Rocks, Castle-Corby, Belleville, Bingfield, Drumheel, Lisnamandra, Drumcorbin, Tully, and Hermitage.

Arms of the Bishopric.

The DIOCESE of KILMORE does not appear to be of very ancient foundation; the first prelate of whom any mention occurs is Florence O'Conacty, who succeeded in 1231. He bore the designation of Bishop of Breffny, from the territory of that name, in which the see was situated; and his successors are styled indifferently Breffnienses, and Triburnenses, or bishops of Triburna, from the small village of that name, near which they generally resided. The first who was styled Bishop of Kilmore was Andrew MacBrady, who, in 1454, with the consent of Pope Nicholas V., converted the parish church of St. Felimy, or Fedlimid, of Kilmore, into a cathedral church, in which he placed 13 secular canons; and since that period Kilmore has given name to the see. From the unsettled state of the district which constituted this diocese, it was not affected by the Reformation so soon as others, and it continued under the control of the bishop appointed by the Pope till 1585, when John Garvey, Dean of Christ Church, Dublin, was appointed the first Protestant bishop. On his translation to the see of Armagh, this diocese remained without a bishop for fourteen years, during which period it was annexed to the bishopric of Down and Connor, till the appointment of Robert Draper, who obtained this see, together with that of Ardagh, by letters-patent of James I. In 1643 the see of Ardagh was united to that of Kilmore, and it continued to be held therewith till 1752, when it was annexed in commendam to the archbishopric of Tuam: at present, the bishop of Kilmore holds the sees of Elphin and Ardagh. Among the most eminent prelates were the venerable Bishop Bedell, and Bishops Sheridan and Cumberland.

Kilmore is one of the 16 dioceses which constitute the ecclesiastical province of Armagh; and comprehends part of the county of Meath, in the province of Leinster, part of Leitrim, in the province of Connaught, part of Fermanagh and the greater part of Cavan, in the province of Ulster; extending about 74 English miles in length, varying from 13 to 25 in breadth, and comprising an estimated superficies of 497,250 acres, of which 2200 are in Meath, 184,750 in Leitrim, 29,300 in Fermanagh, and 281,000 in Cavan. The lands belonging to the see comprise 28,531 acres; and the gross annual value of the bishopric, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £7477. 17. The corporation consists of a bishop, dean, and archdeacon, but there are neither prebendaries nor canons to form a chapter; even the archdeaconry has no corps, but is annexed by the bishop to any parochial living at his discretion; neither is there any economy fund. The consistorial court consists of a vicar-general, surrogate, registrar, deputy-registrar, and proctor; the registrar is keeper of the records, which are all of modern date, the earliest being a registry of wills commencing in 1693. The total number of parishes in the diocese is 39, comprising 48 benefices, of which 8 are unions of two or more parishes, and 40 single parishes or parts of parishes: all are in the patronage of the Bishop or Incumbents, except the deanery, which is in the gift of the Crown; the living of Killesandra, in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin; Annagh, in the gift of Lord Farnham; and Drumgoon, in that of the Deering family. The total number of churches is about 55, and there are five other places in which divine service is performed; the number of glebe-houses is 31. By the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd of William IV., the bishopric of Elphin, on its next avoidance, or on the demise of either of the bishops of Elphin and Kilmore, was to be annexed to the diocese of Kilmore, and its temporalities vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: this provision has been carried out, as has also a similar provision with respect to the diocese of Ardagh. The cathedral, which is the parish church, is a small ancient edifice, having at the entrance a richly sculptured Norman doorway, removed from the abbey of Trinity Island, in Lough Oughter. The Episcopal palace, an elegant mansion in the Grecian style, has been rebuilt on a more eligible site near the former structure. In the Roman Catholic divisions this diocese forms a separate bishopric, and one of the eight which are suffragan to the archiepiscopal see of Armagh; it comprises 44 parochial benefices, or unions, containing 76 chapels served by 80 clergymen, of whom, including the bishop, 44 are parish priests, and 36 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of the bishop is Drumgoon, where he resides.

The LIVING of Kilmore is a vicarage, united by royal authority, at an unknown date, to the vicarage of Ballintemple and the rectory and vicarage of Keadue, together forming the union and the corps of the deanery of Kilmore, in the patronage of the Crown; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £262. 10., of which £95. 18. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the aggregate tithe of the benefice of the dean is £632. 13. The glebe-house is an old building. The glebe here comprises 270½ acres of profitable land, and 26¾ of bog; there is also, in the parish of Ballintemple, a glebe of 103½ acres, besides which are 436½ acres of profitable land and 47 acres of bog belonging to the deanery, though not in any of the parishes within the union. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; there are two chapels, situated respectively at Ballinagh and Drumcor, the latter built in 1809, at an expense of £150. In the churchyard are interred the remains of Bishop Bedell, whose death was occasioned or accelerated by the severities he endured while in the hands of the insurgents in 1641. In such esteem was this exemplary prelate held, even by those who had hastened his decease, that they attended his funeral obsequies with the most unbounded demonstrations of respect and sorrow. In the same vault was interred Bishop Cumberland. On Trinity Island are the remains of an abbey; and on a small island in Killekeen lake are the ruins of the castle of Cloughoughter, in which Bishop Bedell was confined.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, partly in the barony of KINELARTY, but chiefly in that of UPPER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Ballinahinch, and on the road from Downpatrick to Belfast; containing 6277 inhabitants, of whom 134 are in the village. It comprises 12,854 statute acres, of which 6387¾ are in the barony of Kinelarty, and 6466¼ in Upper Castlereagh; 94 acres are water, 60 bog, 400 waste, 250 woodland, 600 pasture, and the remainder arable land in a high state of cultivation, and producing a great quantity of barley. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate, and the tithe rent-charge is £535. 10., of which £295. 10. are payable to W. Sharman Crawford, Esq., and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house was erected in 1794, at an expense of £461. 10., towards which the Board of First Fruits gave £92; the glebe comprises 29*a*. 1*r*. 17*p*., statute measure, valued at £22 per annum, and subject to a rent of £8. 5. The church is a small edifice, built about 1792, principally at the expense of the family of the present Mr. Crawford. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilmore, Inch, and Killileagh, and having two chapels in Kilmore, and one in each of the other parishes. Here is a meeting-house for Presbyterians in connexion with the Remonstrant Synod, in the burial-ground of which Dr. Moses Nelson, who was minister, and his son, Dr. William Nelson, are interred; both were distinguished classical scholars, and the Redemon academy here was very celebrated under their superintendence. William Fergie, Esq., of Springfield, in the parish, is also interred in this ground; he died in 1780, at the age of fifty, and weighed when living 42 stone. There are also meeting-houses for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and several national and other schools.

KILMORE, an ancient parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of CARBERY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER; containing 457 inhabitants, and comprising 1908 statute acres.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of UPPER DEECE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. E.) from Summerhill; containing 1274 inhabitants. It comprises 6607¾ acres, about one-third of which are arable, and the remainder pasture land, with about 16 acres of ornamental plantations, and two nurseries. The principal seats are, Larch Hill, the grounds of which are embellished with grottoes and temples; and Philpotstown. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £248. There is a glebe-house, erected at a cost of £1300, towards which the Board of First Fruits, in 1813, gave £250 and lent £500; the glebe comprises 12 acres, and is beautifully laid out as a landscape garden. The church is a small ancient building; the churchyard is judiciously planted. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Moynalvey, containing Kilmore, Galtrim, Kiltale, and Dirpatrick: there are chapels at Kilmore and Galtrim, the former a large building in the village of Moynalvey, erected in 1834, by subscription, the greater part of which was contributed by members of the Established Church; on the outside is a fine bust of Our Saviour, after Michael Angelo, presented by Miss Gregory. A dispensary, Dorcas institution, repository, and poor-shop, have been founded by the rector, Dr. Gregory.

In the churchyard is a curious round stone, placed on a pillar by the present incumbent, by whom it was discovered; the Crucifixion is represented on one of its sides, and the crown of thorns, bleeding heart, &c., on the other. Dr. Gregory also lately found a flat stone, dated 1575, containing a representation of the Crucifixion, with a legible inscription in Latin, and a defaced one in Irish, and a request to pray for the soul of Roger Mac Mahon Guineff, or Guiness. About $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west from the present church are the ruins of an ancient church, and of a castle, called Arodstown: the remains of a church are also visible at Moynalvey, about a mile to the south of which, cells, extending a considerable distance under ground, were discovered in 1834; and near them is a tract still retaining the name of "the College." To the south of the parish, sepulchral remains have been discovered within a considerable embankment. These various ruins, between which are visible the remains of fortified stations, encircle the parish; and in the centre stands an ancient bush on a mount, known by the name of Killa-more, the "great hill," and Seach-na-Killa-more, the "bush of Kilmore." The number of the antiquities creates an opinion that Kilmore was formerly a place of religious importance.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of MONAGHAN, province of ULSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Monaghan, on the road to Clones; containing 5121 inhabitants. It comprises $8689\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, including a detached portion of $334\frac{1}{4}$ acres, several small lakes, and some bog. The principal seats are Ballyleck, Brandrim, and Rosefield. The Ulster canal passes through the northern part of the parish. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £214. 12. There is a glebe-house, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £100 in 1792; the glebe comprises 43 acres. The church is a plain edifice with an elegant tower, erected in 1788, and for the repair of which £109 were lately granted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Drumsnat, and has a chapel at Corcahan.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony of NORTH BALLINTOBBER, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Drumsna, on the road to Elphin; containing 5164 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north-west and east by the river Shannon, which on the last side expands into the picturesque Lough Bodarig; on the south the parish borders upon the lough of Gillstown. The approaches from Drumsna and Jamestown are by handsome bridges over the river, affording a facility of communication with those places, which are the chief markets. Kilmore comprises $9316\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, of which about 1000 are waste and bog, and the remainder arable and pasture land. The surface is greatly undulated; many of the hills afford valuable pasturage, though the tops are generally swampy and wet, and the arable land is under profitable cultivation. Limestone of very good quality is quarried for building and for agricultural purposes; and freestone, also of good quality, and fit for millstones, abounds, but is not worked. Near the shores of Lough Bodarig, which rise boldly from the water and are agreeably diversified, is Ballycommen, formerly the seat of the Earl of Roscommon; and farther to the north is Cloonteen, a handsome and newly erected lodge, belonging to the Marquess of Westmeath. A short canal, which has been made to avoid a bend of the Shannon, crosses the north-eastern extremity of the parish; and between it and the river is Charlestown, the seat of Sir Gilbert King, Bart., beautifully situated in a richly embellished demesne. The other seats are, Kilmore House, built in 1630; Lake View; Ashfort; Ashfort Vale; Fortview; Moyglass, the property of the Marquess of Westmeath; Lowfield; Rushport; Dangan; Rhawrowanagh; Meelick; Feeragh; Tully; Cartron; Tooluscan; and Carrowquille Lodge. A fair is held at Dangan on the 25th of May, which is noted for milch-cows; petty-sessions are held every alternate Thursday; and there is a barrack for the accommodation of a small police force.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the Representative of Captain Doherty, who inherited the estate and patronage by his marriage with the youngest daughter of Bishop King: the tithe rent-charge is £150. The glebe-house, built in 1828 by a loan of £360, and a gift of £369, from the Board of First Fruits, is a good residence; the glebe comprises nine acres of excellent meadow-land, held by the rector. The church, towards the erection of which the Board granted a loan of £923 about the same time, is a neat building in good repair. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; a half parish adjoining still appertains to it, but has ceased to belong to the Protestant rectory: the chapel at Dangan, is of modern erection. A school of about 40 boys and 30 girls is held in a school-house built at the joint expense of Sir G. King and the Rev. Robert King; and there are five private schools, in which the number of children fluctuates from 100 to upwards of 200. A loan fund has been established, and also a dispensary. The late Mr. Lawder, of this parish, bequeathed £20 per annum, late currency, for clothing six poor men and six poor women; payment of this bequest was for a long time withheld, but has been lately enforced through the exertions of the rector and the interference of the Board of Charitable Bequests. A small donation was left by the Abbé O'Beirne, of Versailles, to the Roman Catholic chapel, and for the erection of a school-house, which has not been built. An abbey was founded here, according to some, by St. Patrick; and a priory by Con O'Flanigan, in 1232, having a walk underground which communicates with the Shannon: the latter was granted on lease, in 1580, to Tyrrell O'Farrell, at a rent of £3. 10., and subsequently to Sir Patrick Barnwell, who leased it to Dr. E. King, Bishop of Elphin, in 1611. Near Ballycommen are the remains of an old church named Tubber-Patrick; also the remains of a nunnery, and a fine spring called by the old people Patrick's Well, whence the place takes its name. At Kilbride, on the estate of Sir G. King, are the remains of another old church, with traces of a cemetery said to have been formerly the parochial burial-place. There are several chalybeate and sulphureous springs in the parish.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of KILNEMANAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Cashel; containing 1162 inhabitants. It comprises 2004 statute acres. Among the residences are Kilmore and Ballywalter. It is a chapelry, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the patronage of the Archbishop: the tithe rent-charge is £135. 6. 6.

KILMORE, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Nenagh, on the new road to Tipperary; containing 5138 inhabitants. It comprises 13,535 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of mountain and bog; agriculture is much improved. The mines in this parish are described in the article on Silvermines. Kilboy, the splendid seat of Lord Dunalley, is situated in a well-planted demesne of more than 600 Irish acres, which contains a fine sheet of water and a deer-park and is backed by a range of mountains: the mansion was erected about 60 years since. The other principal seats are Lissen Hall, and the glebe-house, the residence of the Very Rev. Gilbert Holmes, Dean of Ardfert. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, episcopally united, in 1801, to the rectories and vicarages of Kilnaneave and Lisbunny, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate to the precentorship of the cathedral of Killaloe, and to the bishop's mensal. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £242. 6., of which £152. 6. are payable to the lessee of the bishop, £13. 17. to the precentor, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire tithe of the incumbent's benefice is £681. 18. 6. The glebe-house was built in 1810, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £400 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1812: there is a glebe of 16*a.* 2*r.* 32*p.* The church, at Silvermines, is a very neat edifice, for the erection of which the Board lent £900, in 1809. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Silvermines, comprising also the parish of Ballynaclough, and containing a chapel at Silvermines and another in Ballynaclough. A poor's fund was till lately supported by Lord and Lady Dunalley and the incumbent. There are some remains of the old castles of Ballycahill and Tullahedy; also of the ancient castle of Dunalley, which gives the title of Baron to the Prittie family. This castle was besieged by the disbanded soldiery of James II., who, after investing it for twenty-one days, effected an entrance by treachery: an interesting account of this siege, written by Mr. Prittie, the then proprietor, who leaped off the castle unhurt, is preserved among the family papers. Here are also the ruins of the old church, with a burial-ground attached, which is the place of sepulture of the Prittie family. An abbey, of which there are no vestiges, is said to have been founded at Kilmore in 540.

KILMORE, a parish, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 9½ miles (S. S. W.) from Wexford; containing 1865 inhabitants. This place is situated on the eastern shore of the lough formed by the barrow of Ballyteigue, a long narrow sand-bank extending from Ballyteigue for nearly four Irish miles, to the entrance of the lake: the burrow abounds with rabbits, and the lake with a variety of wild-fowl. The parish comprises 4233¾ statute acres, which are partly good grazing-land, but principally under tillage; the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture has been much improved; with the exception of the burrow, there is neither bog nor waste. Limestone exists on the lands of Ballycross, but has not yet been quarried; an abundance of sea-manure, or tagweed, is procured at spring tides and after storms, affording an excellent dressing for the land. Good building-stone is found on the townland of Sarcilla. The seats are Ballycross, Ballyharty, Ballyseskin, and Ballyteigue. At Crossfarnogue Point is a small pier, where coal is occasionally landed; and more than 100 boats averaging four men each, all of which rendezvous here, are engaged in the herring, lobster, and cod fisheries off this coast. The construction of a good pier at this point, which might be accomplished at an expense of about £1500, would afford suitable protection to the numerous fishing-vessels frequenting the place, and enable the fishermen to render more effectual assistance to vessels in distress. The steam-boat Water Witch was wrecked off this place in 1833, and several lives were lost. The present pier is small and of very rude construction, having been built by the fishermen themselves, about 35 years since. The tide at the point rises from 11 to 12 feet at high water of spring, and six feet at neap, tides. A coast-guard station, one of the six forming the district of Wexford, has been established at the point. The parish is in the diocese of Ferns; the rectory is impropriate in John Rowe, Esq., of Ballycross, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Tomhaggard. The tithe rent-charge is £339. 17., of which £253. 1. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Mulrankin, Tomhaggard, and Kilturk, in each of which, except the last, there is a chapel; that of Kilmore is a spacious building erected in 1803, adjoining which a house for the priest has been lately built. Near Crossfarnogue Point, where was formerly a telegraph, are the remains of Ballyteige Castle, once belonging to the Whitty family, and now incorporated with the mansion of Ballyteigue.

KILMORE-ERRIS, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of ERRIS, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Belmullet; containing 9428 inhabitants. This parish forms the remotest district of the main land of Connaught, and extends for more than 15 miles from north to south, including the peninsula called the Mullet. It is separated from the parish of Kilcommon by the town of Belmullet, and comprises 29,492¾ statute acres. The lands are chiefly arable, with a considerable portion of good pasture, and a large tract of mountain and bog; the soil is light and sandy, and the inhabitants are much annoyed by the drifting of the sand, which is of so penetrating a quality as to find its way into the interior even of watch-cases. The system of agriculture, though backward, has been much improved under the auspices of the Very Rev. J. P. Lyons, D.D., of Binghamstown, who has employed great numbers of poor labourers in reclaiming the waste land and bogs. Towards the coast, the land is exposed to violent storms, which frequently destroy the potato crops, and involve the poorer peasantry in all the miseries of famine. Considerable quantities of barley and potatoes are sent to the markets of Westport and Newport, when the crops escape injury from the western blasts, to protect them from which the ridges are made in a direction from north to south; quite low on the eastern, and raised about two feet on the western side. The chief manure is sea-weed and shell-sand, which are found in abundance on the coast. The cattle fed here are of very inferior quality, though the pasture is tolerably good; the fences are of rude construction, consisting only of a few sods; and the dwellings of the farmers seldom contain more than one apartment, formed of stone at the base and of sods above. The peasantry subsist chiefly on sea-fish of various kinds, on shell-fish found on the coast, and on sloak or laver which they gather from the rocks. On the northern shore are some quarries of stratified granite of a very beautiful description, and of good quality for building, but it is not worked, on account of the difficulty of conveyance to any port; and on Tarmon Hill, near the southern extremity, are other quarries of granite, from which was raised the stone for building the pier at Blacksod haven. Iron-ore is also found in various parts and in great abundance. The principal seats are Bingham Castle, Binghamstown, and Bay View.

The parish is washed by the Atlantic on every side except the east, where it is separated from the main land by Blacksod bay, and on the north-east, where it is bounded by Broad haven; the isthmus between these bays, which is not more than 200 yards in breadth, can be approached only through a tract of wild mountainous country. On the western side of the peninsula are numerous rocky islets, the two largest of which are North and South Inniskea; and off the north-western extremity, about four miles from Erris Head and 1½ from Scotch Port, the nearest harbour for boats, is Eagle Island, a sharp rocky height comprising about 15 acres, of which 12 are covered with rich grass and three are barren and rugged rock. On this island the Ballast Corporation of Dublin, under the direction of government, some years ago erected two lighthouses, at an expense of £30,000, both displaying bright and steady lights visible at a great distance. The stone of which they are built was partly brought from Kingstown, near Dublin, and partly quarried on the island; the buildings contain convenient dwellings for the light-keepers. Between Blacksod Point, at the southern extremity of the peninsula, and Saddle Head on the island of Achill, in the parish of Achill, is the entrance to Blacksod Bay; and to the eastward are the entrances to the bays of Tulloghan and Bullane. Blacksod harbour is very spacious, and much to seaward, extending boldly into the Atlantic; and within it, works to any extent might be constructed for the security of vessels taking shelter: it is separated, as already observed, only by a narrow isthmus from the harbour of Broadhaven. The best anchorage is on the west side of the bay, about ½ of a mile from Barnach Isle, in from 4½ to 5 fathoms of water; but vessels not drawing more than 10 feet of water may ride farther up in from 2 to 2½ fathoms. The anchorage on the north side of the peninsula of Cleggan, though less exposed than in the open bay, is very indifferent; vessels drawing 10 or 12 feet must go up at half tide, as there are only nine feet off the western side of Cleggan at low water; the rocks at the north side of the anchorage are dry at half ebb. From the peculiar situation of the harbour and the abundance of fine granite fit for engineering purposes which the immediate neighbourhood affords, this might be rendered a highly advantageous station for steam communication with North America. Within the bay are several subordinate harbours, including Saleen and Tarmon. A pier has been built at Saleen or Binghamstown, which affords great convenience for shipping the agricultural produce, for which merchandise is brought back in exchange; and a small expenditure in completing the inner dock would make the harbour of Saleen still more useful than it is at present. A pier has also been constructed at Tarmon, of granite from the quarry on Tarmon Hill, at an expense of £1000, granted by the Board of Fisheries; and about 20 hookers of six tons each, and 100 yawls, are employed in the fishery off this coast, which is carried on by persons who are also farmers. There is a small landing-pier at Belmullet. Nearly opposite to Eagle Island is the headland of Annagh, projecting boldly into the Atlantic; and about half a mile to the west of it is a shoal called Monaster Ladizi, over which the sea constantly breaks with great violence. Fairs for live stock are held at Binghamstown on the first day of every month; there is a constabulary police station; and petty-sessions are held weekly at that place and Belmullet, each of which is described under its own head.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £195. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £450, and a loan of £180, from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church, a neat plain edifice with a square tower, built in 1827, and towards the erection of which the same Board made a loan of £800, occupies a very elevated situation at Binghamstown; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £138 for its repair. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the principal chapel, a large edifice, is at Binghamstown, and there is another chapel at Tarrane. Near the glebe-house is a remarkable subterraneous cavern, called Pullinashantina, into which the sea rushes for nearly a quarter of a mile, with extreme violence and noise; the rock is singularly formed, and part of it has fallen in, leaving a wide gap which adds to the awful grandeur of the scene. Not far from the cavern is a detached mass of rock that appears to have been severed from the other portion by some violent convulsion, and on the summit of which is a rich field of grass. To the west of Binghamstown are some ruins of the small monastery of Cross, or the Holy Cross, which was dependent on the abbey of Ballintobber; and nearly buried in the sands, are some of the walls of an ancient church said to have belonged to a nunnery formerly existing. On the shore of Broadhaven are the remains of Knocknalina Castle; and about four miles from it, on Blacksod harbour, stand the ruins of Barnach Castle, a square building of small dimensions. About a mile and a half to the north-west of the Mullet is Coulogh Castle, and on a bold headland opposite to Eagle Island are the remains of the fort of Dunamogh. On the island called Inuis Glora is an ancient burial-ground, which is still used as a place of interment. There is a very strongly impregnated chalybeate spring at Binghamstown.

KILMOREMOY, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, partly in the barony of TYRERAGH, county of SLIGO, but chiefly in that of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with the market and post town of Ballina and the town of Ardnaree (both of which are separately described), 13,129 inhabitants. The parish comprises 12,331¼ statute acres: there is much bog, and agriculture is in a backward state. The principal seats are, Belleek Abbey, a noble mansion in the later English style of architecture, erected by the proprietor at an expense of £10,000, and beautifully situated on the banks of the Moy, in a fine demesne tastefully laid out and richly planted; and Belleek Castle. It is now a rectory and a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, forming part of the union of Ardagh; the rectory was till lately appropriate to the precentorship of Killala cathedral, and the tithe rent-charge is £294. 2. 9., of which £37. 8. 6. were payable to the precentor, and the remainder to the vicar. There is a glebe-house, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £100, in 1794, and which was rebuilt by a loan of £600 and a gift of £200 from the same Board, in 1828: the glebe comprises 11 acres. The church of the union, in Ardnaree, was built in 1763, by aid of a gift of £300 from the Board, which also granted £1400 as a loan for its enlargement in 1816; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £573 for its repair. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a handsome cathedral at Ardnaree. There are also places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Within the parish are, a cromlech; the remains of an ancient castle, which gives name to the village of Ardnaree, or "the King's height;" and some ruins of the old church, with a burial-ground attached.

KILMORGAN, a parish, in the barony of CORRAN, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Ballymote, on the road to Dromahaire; containing 2343 inhabitants. It comprises 5768¼ statute acres, principally under tillage, with some pasture land and bog: the soil is generally good, and there is excellent limestone. The principal seats are Kilmorgan, Newpark, Kincrevan, and Branchfield. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Emlyfad; the rectory is impropriate in Sir Robert Gore Booth, and the tithe rent-charge is £167. 16., of which £77. 16. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is part of the district of Ballymote, and has a chapel at Kincrevan, and a nunnery. Part of the church remains, containing a large tomb of the Mac Donough family, by one of which the church was probably built. Here are also several mounds of earth covering stone graves, in which bones and urns have been found, whence it is inferred that a battle was anciently fought here.

KILMOVEE, a parish, in the union of SWINFORD, barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Ballaghadireen, on the road to Castlebar; containing 5844 inhabitants. It comprises 20,756½ statute acres, including about 8500 acres of bog; a large part is very barren and mountainous. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Castlemore; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Dillon, and the tithe rent-charge is £150. 6. 8., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has chapels at Kilmovee and Glen. There are some remains of the church, in a burial-ground.

KILMOYLAN, a parish, in the union of TUAM, barony of CLARE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5¾ miles (S.) from Tuam, and on the road from Mount-Bellew to Galway; containing 1903 inhabitants. This parish comprises 8567 statute acres, and includes the villages of Anbally and Doneanamore, near the former of which are the ruins of Anbally Castle; there are also within the parish the remains of the castles of Tavanagh and Curofin. The principal seats are Curofin and Annagh. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Moylough; the rectory constitutes the corps of the prebend of Kilmoylan in the cathedral of Tuam, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £210, half payable to the prebendary and half to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Clare-Tuam; a chapel has been built at Curofin.

KILMOYLAN, a parish, in the union of RATHKEELE, barony of SHANID, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER; adjoining the post-town of Shanagolden, and containing 3350 inhabitants. This parish is near the river Shannon, and comprises 15,091 statute acres; the land in the northern part is fertile, and rests on limestone, but the southern parts are hilly. About one-third of the whole is in cultivation; the remainder is rough mountain pasture and bog. There are very few agricultural implements, as most of the land is under spade husbandry. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Vicars-Choral of Limerick cathedral, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £174. 6., one-third payable to the vicar and the remainder to the lessees of the vicars-choral. There is no church, glebe-house, or glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Shanagolden, and has a chapel in the small village of Ballyhahill. Here are the remains of Shanid Castle, one of the principal fortresses of the earls of Desmond, and from which originated their war-cry of Shanid-a-boo: the walls are ten feet thick and forty high, and rest upon an artificial conical mound on the top of a hill, which rises abruptly from a fertile plain and is surrounded by numerous intrenchments. Near the castle is a spacious circular fort surrounded by embankments and fosses.

KILMUCKRIDGE, a parish, in the union of GOREY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Oulart; on St. George's Channel, and on the old coast-road from Wexford to Dublin; containing 1602 inhabitants. It comprises 3898¾ statute acres, principally under tillage: the soil is a rich loam, resting on a substratum of marl, which forms the chief manure; it is peculiarly adapted for tillage, and the state of agriculture has in consequence been highly improved. There is little bog, but coal is occasionally landed at Morris Castle. The principal seats are, Upton, commanding an extensive view of the sea-coast; Kilmuckridge Lodge; and Walshfield. The village of Kilmuckridge contains 270 inhabitants, of whom 189 are in this parish and the remainder in the parish of Killancooly. A lucrative herring and oyster fishery is carried on at Morris Castle; the former branch employing about 12 boats, principally belonging to this neighbourhood; and the latter about 40, principally belonging to Arklow. There is a constabulary police station in the village; and fairs are held on Jan. 1st, Easter-Monday, June 24th, and Sept. 29th: at Morris Castle is a coast-guard station. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, held with that of Melina and the vicarage of Ballyvalden: the rectory is impropriate in H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., who allows the curate £18 per annum for doing the duty; the curate also receives £40, as an augmentation, out of the parish of Donaghmore. The tithe rent-charge of Kilmuckridge is £112. 10., payable to the impropriator. The church is a neat structure, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £650 in 1815; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £138 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Litter, which also comprises the parish of Killancooly and the greater part of Monamolin: the chapel is at Litter, in this parish.

KILMUD, or KILMOOD, a parish, in the union of NEWTOWN-ARDES, barony of LOWER CASTLEREAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, contiguous to the post-town of Killinchy, and on the road from Belfast to Downpatrick; containing 2154 inhabitants. This parish (called also Kilmoodmanagh), together with an extensive manor having various important privileges, formed part of the possessions of the ancient monastery of Comber. It comprises 4634½ statute acres, of which about 34 are water; 38 consist of plantations in the demesne of Florida, and from 40 to 50 are bog. The soil is generally fertile, and the land in a high state of cultivation: there is very little waste; and the bog, as it becomes exhausted, is brought into cultivation. In almost every part of the bog are found numbers of oak, birch, and fir trees of full growth, which last especially are in high preservation; they are sawn with difficulty, and the timber, said to be more durable than oak, is much used in building. The oaks are large, some measuring 30 feet in girth, and are found beneath the fir at a depth of 26 feet, but in general much decayed. The parish is remarkably healthy, and free from poverty. Florida manor-house, an elegant mansion, is the principal seat. A court leet and baron is held every third week by the seneschal of the manor, at which debts under 40s. are recoverable, and of which the jurisdiction extends over the whole of this parish, and the townland of Drumreagh in the parish of Killinchy. Petty-sessions are also held in the manor court-house, a handsome building erected in 1822. During the disturbances of 1798, the manor of Florida raised a battalion of yeomanry; the men still retain their arms and accoutrements, but of late have been seldom called out by government to exercise.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and in the alternate patronage of the Marquess of Downshire and the family of Gordon, in the latter of whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £113. 14. 6. A handsome glebe-house was built in 1825, partly by £415 and a loan of £129 from the Board of First Fruits; and the family of Gordon, in consideration of getting the alternate presentation, gave 10 acres of land as a glebe, and endowed the vicarage with a rent-charge of £40 payable out of their estate of Florida. The church, after the dissolution of the monastery of Comber, fell into decay, and the tithes were annexed to those of the parish of Hillsborough, 14 miles distant; but in 1821, the present church, an elegant structure in the later English style, with a handsome tower and spire rising to the height of 120 feet, was erected near the site of the ancient ruins, at the joint expense of the lord of the manor and the Marquess of Londonderry, aided by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. The interior is fitted up with Riga oak; the east window, of stained glass, and of large dimensions and very beautiful, appears to have been copied from that of Salisbury cathedral. In the churchyard is a mausoleum belonging to the Gordon family. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Saintfield. A handsome school-house was erected by the late Mr. Gordon and the Marquess of Londonderry; the school is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, who pay the master £25 per annum. A school at Drumnahirk was built and is supported by Lord Dufferin, and there are also two private schools, in which are about 150 children; and a flourishing Sunday school union, consisting of more than 600 members. An extensive religious lending library is kept for the use of the poor.

KILMULLANE.—See KILLASPIGMULLANE.

KILMURRY, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, partly in the barony of EAST MUSKERRY, but chiefly in the barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Macroom, on the road to Bandon; containing 3742 inhabitants. The parish comprises 9109 statute acres. Its surface is undulating, and its substratum slate: the soil is generally cold and badly cultivated, except on the demesne farm of Sir Augustus Warren, Bart., of Warren's Court, a large and handsome house in an extensive and well-planted demesne, in which are the ruins of the old church of Kilbarry or Macloncigh. The other seats are Ballytrasna, Shandangan, Greenville, and Elmville. At the village is a constabulary police station; and fairs are held on Feb. 1st, May 1st, Sept. 8th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 21st, principally for horned cattle and pigs. The parish is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Cork; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire, who pays a curate £100 per annum for performing the parochial duties. The tithes of the parish, under the Composition act, amount to £750, but they have not been paid for fifty years. A church is about to be built by a grant from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and by subscription. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilmichael, and has a small chapel in the village. Here is the shattered ruin of the ancient castle of Clodagh, built by M'Carty More; the remains of the old church are near the village; and near the boundary of Kilmichael parish are the ruins of Dunisky church.

KILMURRY, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 2¾ miles (E.) from Limerick, and on the southern bank of the Shannon; containing 1708 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3570 statute acres, including 14½ acres of glebe, and about 35 acres of bog. The soil is very fertile; more than half of the land is in tillage, and the remainder is meadow and pasture: the surface is well planted near the Shannon. A river separates this parish from that of Castle-Connell, at the beautiful seat of the Earl of Clare, in the latter parish. Limestone is quarried in different places; and there are an excellent flour and oatmeal mill at Plassy, a paper and a flour mill at Ballyclogh, a starch-mill at Annacotty, and flour-mills at Ballysimon. The principal seats are Plassy, Milford, Shannon Park, Shannon View, Willow Bank, Rose Lawn, and Ballyclogh House. At Castle-Troy is a very neat cottage, belonging to Mr.

Materson, who at his own expense has made a gravel-walk a considerable way along the bank of the Shannon, for the convenience of the numerous visiters that frequent this place in summer to enjoy the beautiful scenery around it.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, episcopally united in 1792 to the rectory of Derrygalvin, but disjoined in 1837 ; it is in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge is £273 : the glebe-house erected in 1790 having become a ruin, a new one was lately built at his own expense by the Rev. W. Maunsell, the rector, for which he has a charge on the benefice against his successor for £458. 6. ; there are three glebes, together consisting of 12 acres. The church is a substantial edifice, with a tower and spire of hewn stone ; for its erection the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £580 in 1812. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union or district of St. Patrick's, Limerick. On the bank of the Shannon, boldly situated on a basaltic rock, are the ruins of Castle-Troy, which was erected by Dermot O'Brien in the reign of Henry III. ; and not far distant are the ruins of the ancient church of Killonan or Killowen.

KILMURRY, a parish, in the union of Carrick-on-Suir, barony of Iffa and Offa East, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Carrick-on-Suir ; near the river Suir and the high road from Clonmel to Waterford ; containing 2478 inhabitants. The parish comprises 7276 statute acres ; and is a rectory, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Kilsheelan : the tithe rent-charge is £378. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united with Grange-Mockler ; there is a chapel in each.

KILMURRY-CLONDERLAW, a parish, in the union of Kilrush, barony of Clonderlaw, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Kildysart, on the road to Kilrush ; containing 4332 inhabitants. It is situated on the north-western side of the bay of Clonderlaw, and on the river Shannon. The bay is an open but insecure roadstead, near the bottom of which is a creek ; and at the village of Knock is a small pier for the convenience of boats landing sea manure and shipping grain to Limerick. The parish comprises 10,458 statute acres, mostly under tillage ; and from the abundant supply of rich manure afforded by the bay, the crops are very good : the state of agriculture has of late years been gradually improving. There is a large portion of bog ; and in some places coal is supposed to exist, but it has not yet been worked. Fairs are held at Kilmurry-M'Mahon on the 24th of May, July, and September ; and a seneschal's court for the manor of Clonderlaw is occasionally held, in which small debts are recoverable. The gentlemen's seats are Clonderlaw, Kilmore, Thornbury, Woodlawn, Oaklands, and Carabane.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, episcopally united in 1774 to those of Killofin, Kilmacduane, Kilfedane, and Killeymur, together constituting the union of Kilmurry, in the patronage of the Bishop : the rectory is impropriate in John Scott, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £155. 15. 6., of which £90 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar ; the tithe of the entire benefice of the vicar is £387. 4. 8.

The glebe-house was built in 1811, when the Board of First Fruits granted £450 as a gift, and £53 as a loan, towards its erection ; it is at present in indifferent repair. The principal glebe comprises 17 acres, subject to a rent of £3. 1. per acre ; and there is an old glebe of 1*a.* 3*r.* near the church. The church, built in 1810 on the site of the ancient edifice, and towards which the Board granted a loan of £600, is a small plain structure with a square tower ; it had fallen into a dilapidated state, but was lately repaired and enlarged by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at an expense of £415. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, which also includes the parish of Killofin and contains the chapels of Kilmurry and Rhine : a spacious and handsome chapel has been just completed at Dromdigus. The parochial school-house was built on the smaller glebe by the Rev. J. Martin, the incumbent, aided by subscriptions and a grant from the Lord-Lieutenant's fund ; and a large school has been established at Kilmurry-M'Mahon. In the demesne of Clonderlaw are the remains of a castle, formerly the residence of Sir Teigue M'Mahon.—See Knock.

KILMURRY-ELY, a parish, in the union of Roscrea, barony of Clonlisk, King's county, and province of Leinster, 2½ miles (N. by W.) from Shinrone, and on the road from Roscrea to Banagher ; containing 1655 inhabitants, and 5385½ statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Shinrone : the tithe rent-charge is £179. 1. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Shinrone, and has a chapel at Brusna.

KILMURRY-IBRICKANE, a parish, in the union of Kilrush, barony of Ibrickane, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 4 miles (S.) from Miltown-Malbay, on the road to Kilrush ; containing, with Mutton or Enniskerry Island, 10,747 inhabitants, of whom 91 are in the village. It forms part of the dangerous western coast called "The Malbay," where if a vessel be embayed, its only chances of being saved are on the northern side of Liscanor bay, on the north-eastern side of Dunmore bay, or within the ledge of rocks opposite to Enniskerry, extending eastward from Seafield Point, in this parish. At each of these places a pier was erected by the late Fishery Board ; that at Seafield can only be approached at spring tides by vessels of 12 tons' burthen, but it is considered capable of being much improved, and would then be of great service. Here is a station of the coast-guard, being one of the six comprised in the district of Miltown-Malbay. The parish comprises 25,857¾ statute acres, a large portion of which consists of mountain pasture and bog : the arable land is generally manured with sea-weed and sand, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving. A court is occasionally held at Tromaroe by the seneschal for the manor of Moih Ibrickane, in which small debts are recoverable. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Killaloe, entirely impropriate in the family of Wyndham : the tithe rent-charge is £138. 9. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Miltown : there is a chapel of ease at Mullogh. The mountain streams in this parish form several picturesque cascades.—See Enniskerry and Mullogh.

KILMURRYNEGAUL, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Lower Bunratty, county of Clare, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Six-mile-bridge, on the road to Tulla; containing 699 inhabitants. It comprises $2917\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, mostly under tillage: the state of agriculture has of late been much improved, chiefly through the exertions of the Studdert family, of Kilkishen, whose residence, a handsome mansion surrounded by a well-wooded and highly improved demesne, is within the limits of this parish, though adjoining the village of Kilkishen, in the parish of Clonlea. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Ogashin, and the vicarage part of the union of Kilfinaghty. The tithe rent-charge is £58. 17., of which £31. 3. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Six-mile-bridge, and has a chapel near the village of Kilmurry. The ruins of the church still remain in the burial-ground, and within the limits of the parish are the ruined castles of Rossroe, Kilmurry, and Kilkishen; the last stands in Mr. Studdert's demesne.

KILMURVEY, a village, in the parish of ARRANMORE, barony of ARRAN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT: the population is returned with the parish. The village is situated on the island of Arranmore, in the bay of that name, which is also called Portmurvey. A constabulary police force has been stationed here; and there is a coast-guard station, forming one of those included in the district of Galway.

KILNABRONOGUE, or KILMALANOGUE, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (N. E.) from Portumna, on the road to Eyrecourt; containing 1126 inhabitants. The parish comprises $3552\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Clonfert; the rectory is partly appropriate to the vicarage, and the tithe rent-charge is £53. 13., of which £13. 8. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Portumna. In the adjoining parish of Clontuskert is a convent of Dominican friars, at Boulas, who superintend a school.

KILNADEEMA.—See KILLEENADEEMA.

KILNAGARENAGH.—See LEMANAGHAN.

KILNAGLORY, a parish, in the union of CORK, partly in the barony of CORK, but chiefly in that of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Cork, and on the old road from Ballincollig to Ovens; containing 1080 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the heart of a retired district, comprises 3942 statute acres. A portion of it dips into the limestone district near Ovens, and again near Ballincollig Castle; but the stone lies too deep to be profitably worked, as it can be easily procured from the adjacent parishes. The southern portion of the parish, adjoining Inniskenny, rests entirely upon a substratum of clay-slate; the surface is hilly, and the land full of springs, which is a great impediment to cultivation, especially in wet seasons. The northern or lower portion partakes of the rich and excellent quality of the limestone plain of which it forms a part, and the soil is extremely fertile. About one-third of the whole land is in pasture, and the remainder under tillage: the system of agriculture is improving; the holdings, being in the possession of a few individuals, who have both skill and capital, are in an excellent state of cultivation. The seats are Greenfield and Ballinora. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork; partly constituting the corps of the prebend of Kilnaglory in the cathedral church, and partly appropriate to the treasurer of St. Finbarr's, Cork; and in 1785 episcopally united, so far as regards the prebend, to the rectory and vicarage of Athnowen, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £270, of which £243. 15. are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the treasurer. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballincollig; there is a neat chapel at Ballinora. Here are several raths or forts.

KILNAGROSS, or KILNACROSS, a parish, in the union of BANDON, Eastern division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. E.) from Clonakilty, on the road to Bandon; containing 2060 inhabitants. It comprises 3764 statute acres, of which about 100 acres are waste land or bog, and the remainder arable: agriculture is in an improving state, the heavy wooden plough being now nearly out of use; sea-sand is used for manure. There is a quarry of excellent slate at Forkhill, and a large flour-mill at Shannon Vale. The principal seats are Shannon Vale, Fort Prospect, Ballymacowen, Castle View, and Kilnagross Cottage. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ross, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £277. The church, which was rebuilt in 1838, is a very neat edifice. There is now no glebe, though formerly, as appears by the Down survey, eight acres belonged to the parish; the rector pays rent for his house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clonakilty. A parochial school is aided by the rector, and endowed with a house and an acre of land by T. Hodnet, Esq.; there is also a Sunday school. On the summit of an eminence, about a mile eastward from the church, are the remains of a very large cromlech.

KILNALECK, a village, in the parish of KILDRUMFERTON, barony of CASTLERAGHAN, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 8 miles (S. W.) from Cavan, and on the road from Mount-Nugent to Ballyjamesduff, in connexion with which latter town here is a receiving-house for letters; there are 327 inhabitants. This village, which contains about 74 houses, has been lately in a great measure rebuilt. It is a constabulary police station; and has fairs for cattle on Feb. 2nd, March 25th, May 13th, June 11th and 29th, Aug. 10th and 26th, Sept. 11th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 17th.

KILNAMANAGH, or KILLENAMANAGH, a parish, in the barony of FRENCHPARK, union of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Boyle, on the road to Castlerea; containing 2900 inhabitants. It comprises $7621\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, principally under tillage, and includes extensive bogs and marshes: limestone is plentiful. About a mile above Lough Gara, the river Breedogue is crossed by a long low causeway bridge, near which a village has arisen. The principal seat is Kingsland. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin and union of Boyle; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton, and R. Young, Esq., of Castlerea, and the tithe rent-charge is £61. 16., half payable to the vicar, and half to the impropriators. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 25*a.* 3*r.* 26*p.* statute measure, valued at £21, and subject to a rent of £2. 12. 6., per annum. The church is in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Lough Glen, and contains a chapel. There is a school supported by the Church Education Society and the vicar.

KILNAMANNAGH, or KILMANNAGH, a parish, in the union of BANTRY, barony of BERE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Castletown; containing 6061 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south-western coast, forming a peninsula between the bays of Bantry and Ballydonagan, and comprises 13,809 statute acres. Of these, 3126 are arable, and the remainder pasture, bog, and mountain; the arable land is tolerably fertile, and is chiefly cultivated by the spade, and manured with sea-weed and sand. The mountains consist of slate, of which there are excellent quarries at Lickbarren, but imperfectly worked. The greatest copper-mines in Ireland are situated in this parish, at Allihais; they have been extensively and constantly worked since 1813, and now produce from 6000 to 7000 tons annually of good ore, valued at £9 per ton. The works are carried on both by steam and water, and employ from 1200 to 1500 men; the ore is conveyed by hookers for shipment to Swansea. There are mills at Ballydonagan for crushing the ore, and numerous houses and cottages for the persons employed have been built; a new road from Castletown to the mines has been opened, and other improvements are contemplated. Asbestos is found at Kenlogh, and near Blackhall. At the south-western extremity of the parish is Crow Head, in lat. 51° 34′ 20″ and lon. 10° 11′ 40″: on Blackhall Head is a signal station; and between it and Sheep Head is the entrance to Bantry bay. Dursey Island is separated from the coast by a deep and dangerous channel, about 50 yards wide, through which the tide runs with great rapidity. There is a coast-guard station at Garinish Point, one of the three stations in the Castletown district. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, forming part of the union of Kilaconenagh; the rectory is partly impropriate in Lord Riversdale, and partly appropriate to the vicarage, and the tithe rent-charge is £208. 19., of which £97. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilnamanagh is in the diocese of Kerry, and is the head of a district, called Castletown, comprising this parish and Kilaconenagh; there is a chapel at Cahirmore. The church is a picturesque ruin.

KILNAMARTRY, or KILNAMARTIN, a parish, in the union of MACROOM, barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Macroom; containing 2782 inhabitants. It comprises 11,680 statute acres, lying between the rivers Toome and Sullane. Agriculture is backward, and the land generally cold and unproductive; not more than one-third is in cultivation, the remainder being rough rocky pasture, bog, and marsh. Good building-stone and inferior slate are raised in several places, and there are indications of copper-ore. The principal seats are Raleagh and Cahirdahy. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £315. There is a handsome glebe-house, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1814, gave £100 and lent £900: the glebe comprises 29*a.* 28*p.* The church is a large edifice with a square tower; it was built in 1813 by a gift of £600 from the same Board, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £235 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Theronadromman, comprising the parishes of Kilnamartry and Ballyvourney, and part of Clondrohid, and containing a chapel at Caradagher, and one in Ballyvourney; the former is a large plain substantial building. The castle of Kilredagh stands on a lofty hill and commands the passes of both the rivers which bound the parish; it was very strongly built, and remained tolerably entire till 1833, when a considerable part fell.

KILNANARE.—See KILLANEAR.

KILNANEAVE, or KILLINAFFE, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Nenagh, and on the old road from Dublin to Limerick; containing 2021 inhabitants, and 6608 statute acres. Here is the seat of Monaquil. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilmore: the tithe rent-charge is £166. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Templederry.

KILNASEAR.—See CALLABEG.

KILNASOOLAGH, a parish, in the union of ENNIS, barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, adjoining the post-town of Newmarket-on-Fergus, and on the road from Ennis to Limerick; containing 1158 inhabitants. It comprises 5138 statute acres; the land is of excellent quality and mostly under tillage, and the state of agriculture is much improved, chiefly through the exertions of the late Sir Edward O'Brien, Bart. Limestone of superior quality abounds, and some of it admits of a high polish. The Latoon river, which separates this parish from Quin on the north, is navigable to the bridge for lighters of 50 tons; sea-manure is landed, and corn occasionally sent hence to Limerick. A cotton-manufactory was established a few years since, but was soon discontinued. The Newmarket petty-sessions are held every alternate Thursday at Rathfoland, on the southern border of the parish, immediately adjoining the town. Dromoland, the seat of Sir Lucius O'Brien, is a superb edifice in the castellated style, lately erected on the site of the ancient mansion, and surrounded by an extensive and richly wooded demesne, in which great improvements have been made. On an eminence in the deer-park is a turret that forms a conspicuous landmark in the navigation of the Fergus. Carrigorin, the seat of Sir William Fitzgerald, Bart., is a handsome mansion commanding a fine view of the junction of the Fergus and Shannon, and of the islands by which the former river is studded.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, united to those of Dromline and Kilmaleery, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Tradree or Tomfinlough. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £181. 11. 6., of which £110. 15. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the vicarial union is £138. 9., Irish. The glebe-house, erected about 1815, and for which the Board of First Fruits granted £400 as a gift and £260 as a loan, stands on a gentle eminence commanding an extensive prospect of the Fergus and Shannon and their numerous islands: the principal glebe comprises 12 acres, subject to a rent of £9 late currency, and there is a glebe of 1¼ acre near the church. The church, a large and handsome building with a tower surmounted by a spire, was rebuilt in 1815, at an expense of about £1500, towards which the Board granted a loan of £900; it contains a finely executed monument to Sir Donat O'Brien, and some mural tablets of the Fitzgerald family. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newmarket, where the principal chapel is situated. At Dromoland is a large school, with a garden and apartments for the master, entirely supported by the O'Brien family; a female school is also supported by Lady O'Brien. At Mohawn and Rathfoland are the ruins of the castles respectively so called.

KILNAUGHTEN, a parish, in the union of Listowel, barony of Iraghticonnor, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, on the southern shore of the river Shannon; containing, with the post-town of Tarbert (which is described under its own head), 5102 inhabitants. The parish is estimated to comprise about 9164 statute acres, of which 8340 are applotted under the Tithe act: the land is in general good, and mostly under tillage, but there is a considerable portion of bog in the southern part. Limestone is brought from Askeaton by the boats employed in conveying turf from Tarbert to Limerick, and is used for manure; the state of agriculture has latterly been much improved. On the estate of Colonel Halliburton is a quarry of excellent stone, adapted for flagging and building; the flags are chiefly sent to Limerick and other places, for the streets: the stone for the bridewell and new Roman Catholic chapel at Tarbert was taken from this quarry. The seats are, Sallow Glen, a spacious and handsome mansion, situated in a finely wooded demesne of more than 100 acres extending along the picturesque glen of that name; Pyrmont, commanding a fine view of the Shannon; Carrunakilly; Lislaghtin Abbey; Tarbert House, commanding a view of the bay of Tarbert and the river Shannon; Ahanna; and Leslie Lodge, late the residence of the family of that name.

The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is impropriate in Anthony Raymond, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Aghavallin and Listowel. Of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £200. 12., two-thirds are payable to the impropriator and the remainder to the vicar. The church for this portion of the union, a neat modern building, is near Tarbert. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish (with the exception of the townland of Kilmurly) forms part of the district of Ballylongford, also called the district of Tarbert, at which latter place is a handsome chapel of recent erection. At Sallow Glen is a school supported by Mr. Sandes; near Tarbert is one on Erasmus Smith's foundation, with two acres of land and an excellent house for the master; and a third school is chiefly supported by the Methodists of Tarbert. The ruins of the old church of Kilnaughten still remain, in the burial-ground; and at Kilmurly, or Kilmacrehy, are vestiges of another old church or chapel. On the eastern side of the creek of Ballylongford are the picturesque ruins of the abbey of Lislaghtin, founded by O'Conor Kerry for Franciscans of the Strict Observance: the tower, choir, and several other parts of the buildings, remain. These ruins, with the modern mansion, are in the parish of Aghavallin.

KILNEBOY, a parish, in the union of Ennistymon, barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare, and province of Munster; containing, with the post-town of Curofin (which is separately described), 4102 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Ennis to Kilfenora, and comprises 17,967 statute acres. A very large portion of the land is rocky pasture, a small quantity only being under tillage; the soil varies from the poorest to the richest quality, resting on a substratum of limestone. There are some extensive tracts of bog in the eastern part of the parish; coal has been discovered on the mountains of Clifden, lead-ore at Glanquin, and a rich silver-mine lately in Tullacommon, but none are worked. The surface is boldly diversified, and embellished with the picturesque lakes of Inchiquin and Tadune, the latter of which is but partly in the parish. The lake of Inchiquin is about 2½ miles in circumference, and is situated at the base of a richly wooded range of hills, forming a fine contrast to the bare limestone rocks in the vicinity. On its northern side are the interesting ruins of Inchiquin Castle, from time immemorial the property and long the residence of the O'Brien family, whose descendant, the Marquess of Thomond, derives his title of Earl of Inchiquin from this estate; they consist of a very ancient castle in a greatly dilapidated condition, and a mansion attached to it, and contribute much to the beautiful scenery of the lake. On the opposite shore is the mansion of the Burton family, and in the immediate vicinity of the lake are several other seats, of which that called Adelphi is an elegant cottage residence, adjoining which are the picturesque ruins of an old tower. An excellent road has been formed over the hill of Inchiquin, from Adelphi to Crossard. The lake is well stored with brown and white trout; and a regatta, recently established, is likely to become an annual amusement. The other seats in the parish are, Elmvale, that of J. O'Brien, Esq.; Poplar; Inchiquin Cottage; and Richmond. A manorial court is occasionally held at Curofin, and petty-sessions every alternate Wednesday.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, episcopally united in 1801 to the rectory and vicarage of Kilkeedy and the vicarages of Dysert, Rath, and Inchicronane, together forming the union of Kilneboy, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £78. 9. 9., and of the entire benefice £351. 18. The glebe-house is in Kilkeedy; the glebes comprise 28⅝ acres. The church situated at Curofin is a neat edifice, erected by aid of a loan of £400 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1826; there is also a church in the parish of Kilkeedy. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Curofin, comprising also the parish of Rath; the district has three chapels, situated respectively at Kilneboy, Curofin, and Rath.

There are some ruins of the old church of Kilneboy, which appears to have been built long before the Reformation; and near them is the base of an ancient round tower, now reduced to a height of only 12 feet, and without any aperture either for door or window. At a short distance to the north-west, and at the boundary of the lands formerly attached to the church, is a remarkable stone cross, fixed in a rock, and consisting of a shaft with two arms curving upwards, on each of which, near the top, is a head carved in relief, and in the centre two hands clasped; it is said to have been erected in memory of the reconciliation of two persons who had been long at violent enmity. The small village of Kilneboy is stated traditionally to have been formerly a large town, of much earlier origin than Curofin. Within a short distance from it are the ruins of a square fortress, with the remains of two angular towers, in which cannon used to be mounted; it is supposed to have been erected about the time of Elizabeth, is situated in low ground by the side of the river, and is said to have been at one time the residence of the deans of Kilfenora. About half a mile from the ruins of Kilneboy church are those of the church of Cood, apparently of great antiquity. Near this spot, and within the old race-course of Cood, part of the army of James II. encamped in 1689. To the east of Curofin is the cemetery of the church of Kilvedane, of which building, though existing within the memory of many persons living, no vestige can now be traced. In this cemetery was interred Hugh Mac Curtin, a celebrated Irish antiquary, scholar, and poet; he was author of the antiquities of Ireland, an Irish grammar and dictionary, and other works. At Glanquin was a church said to have been founded by St. Patrick; there is no vestige, except the cemetery, which is still used. A Moravian church was built at Crossard, in 1793, but the society was soon dissolved, and the building fell into dilapidation; it was afterwards used as a Roman Catholic chapel, and is now unoccupied. About two miles to the north of Kilneboy are the remains of the castle of Lemenagh, formerly the residence of the O'Brien family; and on the road side, a mile eastward from Curofin, are the beautiful and very perfect remains of the castle of Ballyportree. On the common of the parish is a large cromlech. There are two holy wells; one, situated near the Roman Catholic chapel, is surrounded with large trees, and not far from it are the remains of an ancient stone cross. Near Crossard is an extensive natural cavern; and at Thaiscogh, on a rocky eminence, is a remarkable spot, where seven springs have their source, and unite into one stream, which takes a subterraneous course for nearly a mile, and then emerges. Dr. Charles Lucas, a distinguished political writer on Irish affairs, is said to have been a native of this parish.

KILNEDDY, or KILNEADY, an ancient parish, in the union of WATERFORD, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Knocktopher, and near the road from Kilkenny to Waterford; containing about 38 inhabitants. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Knocktopher. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballyhale. At Ballytarsney is a chalybeate spring, from the sides of which, stalactites of iron-ore are taken; and iron-ore fit for smelting is said to exist in the parish.

KILNEGARRUFF, or KILNEGARIFF, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, partly in the barony of OWNEY and ARRA, county of TIPPERARY, and partly in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, but chiefly in the ancient county of the city of LIMERICK, in the province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Castle-Connell, and on the road from Limerick to Dublin; containing 2724 inhabitants. It comprises 4455 statute acres, including about 500 of valuable bog. The land is based on limestone; part of it is extremely rich and part sterile. Agriculture is improving rapidly, and the cultivation of green crops has been introduced. Towards the western termination of the parish are several flourishing plantations, which form part of the Earl of Clare's demesne of Mount Shannon: the seats here are Thornfield, Woodsdown, Mulcaher, and Rich Hill. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Castle-Connell: the tithe rent-charge is £203. 16. The church was destroyed in the war of 1641, and was rebuilt, but is now in ruins. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is also part of the union or district of Castle-Connell, and has a large new chapel at Ahane. There is a dispensary, connected with that of Castle-Connell.

KILNEHUE, or LAMOGUE, a parish, in the union and barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S.) from Gorey, on the high road to Carnew; containing 3596 inhabitants. This parish comprises 15,360 statute acres, of which nearly the whole is under tillage. The soil is in general light, with the exception of some heavy clay near Gorey; the system of agriculture has of late been much improved; but the want of lime, which is not to be obtained nearer than the county of Carlow, is a great obstacle to progress. Marl-pits occur in various parts of the parish, and at Slievebawn, near Moneyseed chapel, are some quarries of good slate. A constabulary police force is stationed in a commodious barrack at the village of Hollyfort. The living is a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Ferns, the rectory forming part of the union of Gorey and of the corps of the deanery of Ferns; the perpetual curacy, which was erected in 1828, and of which the stipend is £120, is in the patronage of the Dean. The tithe rent-charge is £349. 7. 6., with the exception of the townland of Buckstown, the tithes of which have from time immemorial been paid to the rector of Carnew. The curacy extends over 27 townlands, comprising the greater part of this parish, and also over two townlands in the parish of Kilkevan. A glebe of 6½ acres was to have been allotted to the curate, in exchange for the original glebe of 4½ acres, but the arrangement was not effected, and the old glebe is still annexed to the curacy; there is no glebe-house. A neat church, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £800, was built in 1813, at Hollyfort; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £141 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the union of Gorey, but chiefly in that of Camolin; there is a chapel at Moneyseed. The parochial school is partly supported by a grant of £7. 10. per annum from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and by a contribution from the curate; Lord Powerscourt allows the schoolmistress £10 per annum.

KILNEMANAGH, a parish, in the unions of GOREY and ENNISCORTHY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 1 mile (N. E.) from Oulart, on the old road to Gorey; containing 870 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Awen-Banna, comprises 2678 statute acres. Nearly the whole of the land is under tillage, with some small tracts of pasture; the soil is in general fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. Ballanahown and Ballanvach are two deserted mansions belonging to the Irvines, of Ownavarra. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £95. 4. The glebe-house, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1807, gave £100, is situated on a glebe of 27¼ acres of cultivated land. The church, towards which the same Board gave £600, in 1813, is a neat edifice, and has been repaired by a grant of £104 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Oulart, where the parochial chapel is situated. The parochial school, under the superintendence of the rector, is supported by subscription. Near Oulart, but within the limits of the parish, is a fever hospital, with a dispensary and a residence for a medical attendant.

KILNEMONA, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Ennis, on the road to Ennistymon; containing 1758 inhabitants. This parish, though only ¾ of a mile in breadth, extends nearly five miles in length: it comprises 5418¼ statute acres, about two-thirds of which are excellent arable and pasture land, and the remainder chiefly reclaimable bog; the state of agriculture is improving. In the eastern part is a quarry of limestone of superior quality, used for various purposes, and producing stones of considerable size which are easily detached, the strata being regularly disposed one above the other. Magowna, a seat, in the parish, is situated near the ruins of the castle of that name, formerly the residence of Bryan O'Brien. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe; the rectory forms part of the rectorial union, and the vicarage part of the vicarial union, of Dromcliffe. Of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £93. 15., three-fifths are payable to the rector and the remainder to the vicar: there is a glebe of about one acre. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Inagh, and has a chapel. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground; at Shallee are the ruins of the castle of that name, of which no particulars are extant; and there are several ancient forts or raths.

KILNENER.—See Killinor.

KILNERATH, or Newport (St. John's), a parish, in the union of Nenagh, barony of Owney and Arra, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2 miles (E.) from Newport, on the upper road to Nenagh; containing 2970 inhabitants. It comprises 10,450 statute acres: with the exception of an extensive tract of bog, affording excellent fuel, the land is in general of good quality and in an improved state of cultivation. The scenery is of interesting character; the banks of the river here are bold and rocky, presenting some very striking features, and masses of rock lying in its channel give an artificial rapidity to its course. The principal seats are, Castle Waller, that of the Waller family, pleasingly situated in a tastefully embellished demesne; Oakhampton, the property of Lord Bloomfield; and Rockvale. At Rockvale are considerable flour-mills. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, united by act of council to the rectories and vicarages of Kilcomenty and Kilvolane, together constituting the union of Kilnerath, or St. John's Newport, in the patronage of the Bishop: Killoscully formed part of this union until 1839, when, on the death of the then rector, the Rev. S. Pennefather, it was severed by act of council. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £225, and of the entire benefice £814. 9. 3.: there is a glebe-house in the parish of Kilvolane, and the glebes of the union comprise 8½ statute acres. The church of the union is at Newport. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of two districts; one called Newport, comprising also parts of the parishes of Kilvolane and Kilcomenty, in each of which is a chapel; and the other called Ballynahinch, comprising also Killoscully, in which parish is a chapel. The chapel at Ballynahinch, to which a national school-house is attached, was built on ground given by Lord Dunally. There are some remains of the old church, and also of the chapel of Kilpatrick; near which latter is a chalybeate spring, not much used.

KILNINOR.—See Killinor.

KILNOE, a parish, in the union of Scariff, barony of Lower Tulla, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 3½ miles (S. W.) from Scariff, on the road to Ennis; containing 3482 inhabitants. It comprises 10,512½ statute acres, of which 5913 consist of arable land of medium quality, and the remainder of mountain pasture and bog. The state of agriculture is likely to be much improved, in consequence of the new roads lately made in the vicinity of Lough O'Grady, a portion of which lake is within the limits of the parish. Fairs are held at Bodike on Jan. 1st, April 2nd, July 1st, and Oct. 5th; and a court for the manor of Doonass is occasionally held at Coolreath by the seneschal for the recovery of small debts. The seats are Coolreath, St. Catherine's, and Kilgorey. The parish is in the diocese of Killaloe: part of the rectory is appropriate to the prebend of Tomgraney, and the remainder forms part of the rectorial union of Omullod; the vicarage is part of the vicarial union of Kilseily. The tithe rent-charge is £170. 3., of which £24. 15. are payable to the prebendary of Tomgraney, £69. 4. 8. to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. The ruins of the church still remain. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tomgraney, and has a chapel at Bodike. Near the southern shore of Lough O'Grady are the ruins of the castle of Coolreath, and the ruins of another exist at Ballynahince.

KILPATRICK, a parish, in the union of Kinsale, partly in the barony of Kerrycurrihy, but chiefly in that of Kinnalea, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3 miles (S.) from Carrigaline, on the road to Roberts Cove; containing 1081 inhabitants. It comprises 2664 statute acres, chiefly under tillage; the soil is generally poor and badly cultivated. The strand of Ringabella bay furnishes sand for manure, in the conveyance of which about 10 boats belonging to this parish and Tracton are employed, and great quantities are landed at the bridge over the river Menane. The principal seats are Ballea Castle, Fountainstown, Gurtnagrenan, and Broomley. The parish is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union of Tracton; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Shannon, and the tithe rent-charge is £90. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilpatrick is part of the district of Tracton. The ruins of the church, which was dedicated to St. Patrick, are at the head of a glen.

KILPATRICK, an ancient parish, in the union of Edenderry, barony of Carbery, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster; containing 1080 inhabitants. It comprises 7076¼ statute acres.

KILPATRICK, county of Meath.—See Castletown-Kilpatrick.

KILPATRICK, a parish, in the union of Cashel, barony of Lower Kilnemanagh, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (N. N. E.) from Tipperary; containing 1734 inhabitants, and 2785 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, forming part of the union of Ballintemple; the tithe rent-charge is £108. 10.

KILPATRICK, or Dorsakile, a parish, in the barony of Demifore, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 5 miles (S. E.) from Castle-Pollard, on the road to Killucan; containing 447 inhabitants. It comprises 1892¼ statute acres; the soil is fertile and principally under tillage, and there is abundance of limestone. It is a curacy, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Rathgraff; the rectory is appropriate to the vicars-choral of Christ Church cathedral, Dublin, to whom the whole tithe rent-charge, amounting to £82. 10., is payable. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of St. Mary's. Here are the ruins of an old church, with the vestiges of a fortified building nearly adjacent; and part of another fort is on the lands of Tuitestown. There are also five large raths.

KILPATRICK, a parish, in the barony of Shelmalier, union and county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 3½ miles (N.) from Wexford, on the coach-road to Dublin; containing 879 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated partly on the river Slaney, and partly on its estuary, above Wexford bridge, comprises 2739¼ statute acres of good land in an excellent state of cultivation; the system of agriculture being superior to what generally prevails in this part of the country, and green crops having been cultivated for some years: there is neither bog nor waste land. The river is unsurpassed for the richness and beauty of the scenery on its banks, and the surrounding country is agreeably and strikingly diversified. Saunderscourt, the property and residence of the Earl of Arran, commands a fine view of the bridge and harbour of Wexford; and Kyle, another seat, is embosomed in woods of the richest foliage, and embellished with pleasure-grounds and gardens tastefully laid out and commanding extensive and varying views of the scenery of the Slaney. On a rocky eminence in Lower Kyle, overlooking the river, is a monumental obelisk, erected in 1786 by the Rev. C. Harvey, D.D., to commemorate the exertions and patriotism of General George Ogle and the independent volunteers of Ireland, the first corps of which was raised in this county. The "Kyle Model Gardens," established by C. G. Harvey, Esq. (who appropriated nearly eleven statute acres of his best land for that purpose), are intended to afford practical instruction to the labourer in garden husbandry, in order to the due improvement of allotments of land for the cultivation of flowers, fruits, vegetables, and bees, on the system of the "London Labourers'-Friend Society," and for the profitable employment of the labourer's spare time without interfering with his ordinary occupation. This garden, besides affording perfect specimens of cottage gardening on a minute scale, under the superintendence of an experienced gardener, who gives gratuitous instruction, contains a patch of land devoted solely to the support of a cow, in order to exhibit to the small holder a practical proof of what may be accomplished by good management on a very small allotment. Mr. Harvey liberally undertook to advance the funds requisite to render the institution fully available. Some handsome cottage residences have been erected on the Kyle estate, of which one is called Broomley, and another Kyle Cottage: Sion Hill, a residence, is also in the parish. On the Saunderscourt demesne is a quarry of conglomerate or pudding-stone, which is used for building, but not to any great extent. A brewery has been built at the village of Kyle; a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Enniscorthy and Wexford has been established; and there is also a constabulary police station.

This parish was formerly included in the union of Ardcolm, from which it was separated in 1829, and, with the parish of Tickillen, formed into a distinct benefice. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Arran. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £110. 4., of which £46. 0. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the union payable to the incumbent amounts to £109. 3. The old church, which was for some years the domestic chapel of Saunderscourt, has a handsome Norman doorway, removed from the ruins of the church of Ballynaslaney; under the altar are interred the remains of the first earl of Arran. Another church has been erected on a new site, at an expense of £867, of which £717 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £150 from private sources; it affords accommodation to 200 persons. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district called Crossabeg, comprising also the parishes of Artramont, Tickillen, and a portion of Kilmallog: the chapel near Crossabeg is a plain building, adjoining which is a house for the priest; there is also a chapel at Ballymourne. Two neat school-houses in the Swiss cottage style were built a few years since by Mr. Harvey, by whom the school for boys is wholly supported; the other, for girls, has recently been aided by a grant of £12 per annum from the National Board. An association of Ladies for the employment of the female poor in spinning and weaving, established in 1823, is supported by subscriptions of the resident gentry of this and the neighbouring parishes; and a branch of the Scryne and Ardcolm dispensary has been opened at Kyle. The Kyle Charitable Loan Fund, established in 1835, has been attended with the most beneficial results. Some fossil remains, consisting of a pair of antlers of the elk or moose-deer, of large dimensions, were lately found at Kyle.

KILPEACON, a parish, in the union of Limerick, partly in the barony of Pubblebrien, but chiefly in that of Small County, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (S.) from Limerick, on the road to Fedamore; containing 424 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1214 statute acres: the land is generally of good quality and very productive, though the system of agriculture is far from being in an improved state; the substratum is limestone. The fences, except around the demesnes, consist chiefly of loose stones; but in various parts the scenery is pleasingly varied, and in some few highly interesting. The manor was granted, in the reign of James I., to William King, Esq., who erected a very strong castle, which has been taken down: the park was extensive and well planted; part of it remains, and the oaks are some of the finest and most stately in the country. The late proprietor, on taking down the castle, erected a very handsome mansion on a more elevated site. Ballyclough and Leamonfield are also residences in the parish.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, united by act of council, in 1803, to the vicarage of Knocknegaul, together constituting the corps of the prebend of Kilpeacon in the cathedral of Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £69. 4. 8., and of the entire benefice (including the Hackneys, a detached portion of the parish in the barony of Costlea, and separately compounded for) £242. 6. The glebe-house was rebuilt in 1817, by a gift of £250 and a loan of £550 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe, which is situated in Knocknegaul, comprises 11 acres. The church, now a neat edifice with a square embattled tower, was in 1762 destroyed by the Whiteboys, and rebuilt the following year; in 1819 it was enlarged and repaired, for which purpose the Board granted a loan of £400: it contains a handsome monument to Sir William King. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Fedamore, and partly in that of Loughmore. The parochial school is built on an acre of land given by the late E. Villiers, Esq., and is supported by subscription, aided by an annual donation from the rector. There is a dispensary in the parish. In the neighbourhood is a place called Bawnachumtha, or the "Camp Field," in which are some raths and circular fortifications; and on the summit of Greenhill is a rath or doon, about 320 feet in circumference and 18 feet high. In the adjoining fields are several smaller forts, surrounded by a single vallum, and quite level within; near these forts a crown of gold, in the form of a shell, and weighing $5\frac{1}{4}$ ounces, was dug up by a peasant in 1821, and sold to a goldsmith in Dublin for £18. 18.

KILPEDDER, a village, in the parish of KILCOOLE, union of RATHDRUM, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Dublin to Wexford; containing 11 dwellings and about 72 inhabitants. Petty-sessions are held here once in three weeks.

KILPIPE, a parish, in the union of SHILLELAGH, partly in the barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, but chiefly in that of SOUTH BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 9 miles (S. W. by S.) from Rathdrum, on the road to Clonegal; containing 3400 inhabitants. It comprises 15,631 statute acres. The surface is varied, and part of the Croghan mountain is within its limits; the system of agriculture is greatly improved; there is an extensive bog near the river Derry, and some small turbaries near the mountain. The parish contains the residence of Wingfield, in the grounds of which is an ancient rath; and there are also several handsome and substantial farmhouses. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, episcopally united in 1782 to the vicarage of Killinor or Kilninor, and in the nominal patronage of Sir R. Steele, as representative of Mrs. Hatten, the last abbess of a nunnery in Carlow, and who possessed the right of appointing the minister; his title to the patronage is clear, but as it has not been exercised, it has lapsed to the bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £283. 17., of which £173. 1. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the entire benefice of the vicar is £152. 6. The glebe-house, situated in the parish of Killinor, is a neat residence, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £350 and a loan of £180, in 1819; the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church was built in 1765, chiefly by parochial assessment; it was repaired and enlarged by a loan of £100, in 1817, from the Board, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £183 for its further repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killavany. A school at Carraghlean is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, under the patronage of Earl Fitzwilliam, who lately endowed it with two acres of land, and built the school-house, a good stone building, at a cost of £150. There are some remains of the old church, the burial-ground of which is still used; and at Kilcashel are also the ruins of a church.

KILPOOLE, a parish, in the barony of ARKLOW, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the greater portion of the town of Wicklow, 2977 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the eastern coast, was anciently the extremity of the English pale, and formed part of the possessions of the priory of Kilmainham: it comprises 3028 statute acres. Off the coast is the sand-bank called the Horse-Shoe, which extends south-west for about a mile, with 5 feet of water on it at the north end, which is the shallowest part. Kilpoole is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough, forming part of the union of Wicklow; the rectory is impropriate in Earl Fitzwilliam, and the tithe rent-charge is £90, half payable to the impropriator and half to the vicar.

KILQUADE.—See KILCOOLE.

KILQUANE, or ST. PATRICK'S NORTH, a chapelry, in the union of LIMERICK, partly in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of LIMERICK, and partly in the city of LIMERICK, but chiefly in the barony of LOWER BUNRATTY, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N.) from Limerick, and on the north side of the river Shannon; containing 4132 inhabitants. It comprises 5409 statute acres, chiefly in tillage. The state of agriculture has of late years improved, from the proximity of the district to the city of Limerick, of which it includes a small portion of the north liberties; midway between Corbally mills and St. Thomas's Island is the boundary mark called the "Liberty stone." There is a considerable portion of bog; and limestone, containing fossil shells, is used for building and burnt for manure. On the river Blackwater, which runs into the Shannon, are two large flour-mills. Manorial courts for the recovery of small debts are occasionally held at Athlunkard and Parteen; and at Ardnacrusha is a station of the constabulary police. The seats are, Spring Hill; Quinsborough, formerly the residence of Lord George Quin; Whitehall; Fairy Hill; Thomas Island; and Cottage. Kilquane is a perpetual cure, and forms, with Singland, or St. Patrick's South, the rectory of St. Patrick, and part of the union of St. Patrick, and of the corps of the treasurership of Limerick cathedral. The tithe rent-charge, amounting to £138. 9. 3., is wholly payable to the rector; the curate has a stipend of £75, and £12 per annum from Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund. The church is a neat building with a tower and spire, towards which the late Board of First Fruits granted £700, in 1819. In the Roman Catholic divisions the chapelry forms part of the district of Parteen, or Kilquane, which also includes part of the parish of Killely or Meelick and contains the chapels of Ardnacrusha and Parteen; the former is a handsome edifice of hewn stone. The parochial school is chiefly supported by the rector, who allows £10 per annum and discharges the rent of the school-house; and at Parteen is a large national school, chiefly supported by a grant from the Board: the school-house, erected by Mr. Honan in 1833, consists of a centre and two projecting wings, and contains apartments for the master and mistress. The ruins of the old church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILQUANE, or Kilcoan, a parish, in the barony of Barrymore, union and county of Cork, and province of Munster, 7 miles (N. E.) from Cork, on the road to Tallow; containing 1802 inhabitants. It comprises 6047 statute acres. The land is generally fertile, though part of it is irreclaimable mountain, and the state of agriculture is improving: the mountain of Knockcumcreagh rises to a considerable elevation, and affords pasturage for cattle. There is a paper-mill at Knockra. The parish is a rectory in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the corps of the prebend of Killaspigmullane in St. Finbarr's cathedral: the tithe rent-charge is £198. 15. The church was rebuilt by a gift of £650 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1820. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Cahirlog, or Glauntane, and has a large chapel at Knockra. A school is endowed with a bequest of £10 per annum from the Rev. M. O'Keane.

KILQUANE, a parish, in the union of Ballinasloe, barony of Longford, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 3½ miles (W.) from Eyrecourt, on the road to Killimore; containing 1960 inhabitants. This parish comprises 6858¾ statute acres. It is a rectory, prebend, and vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is appropriate partly to the see, partly to the prebend of Kilquane in the cathedral of Clonfert, and partly to the vicarage, which forms part of the union of Dononaughta. The tithe rent-charge is £84. 9., of which £41. 11. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £5. 17. 9. to the dean, £5. 17. 9. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilquane is the head of a district, called Queenborough, comprising this parish and that of Fahey, in each of which is a chapel.

KILQUANE, a parish, in the union of Tralee, barony of Corkaguiney, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Dingle, and on the eastern side of Smerwick harbour, on the western coast; containing 1760 inhabitants. This parish comprises 9709 statute acres, of which about one-half consists of coarse mountain pasture, bog, and rocky cliffs. It includes the headland of Ballydavid, where there is a detachment of the coast-guard from the station at Ferriter's cove. Salmon is taken at the mouth of the Moorstown river, which runs into the harbour and partly bounds the parish on the south; and some of the inhabitants are occasionally employed in the fishery off the coast. The living, lately suppressed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £77. 1. 6. There is no glebe-house, but a glebe of 6*a.* 1*r.* 20*p.* In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Keel or Ferreter. Some remains of the church still exist, in the burial-ground.

KILQUANE, or Ballyshonboy, a parish, in the union of Kilmallock, partly in the barony of Fermoy, county of Cork, but chiefly in the barony of Costlea, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 2 miles (S.) from Kilmallock, on the road to Kilfinnan; containing 887 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2776 statute acres: the land in the lower part is tolerably good, and some of it under tillage; but nearly one-half of the parish is mountainous and uncultivated, and the greater portion of the remainder is in demesne and meadow. The mountains form the range of Jamestown, Ballyhough, Ballyshondebuie, and Ballylopin, extending to the boundary of the county of Cork; they every where afford good pasturage for sheep and young cattle, and comprise several hundred acres, much of which might be brought into cultivation. Among these mountains the unfortunate Earl of Desmond suffered many privations after his attainder in 1579; but the extensive woods and forests in which he took refuge, with the exception of those of Mount Coote and Riversfield, have wholly disappeared. The parish is a rectory, appropriate to the see of Limerick: the tithe rent-charge is £49. 12., and the glebe comprises 12 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilquane forms part of the district of Kilmallock. Near Ballyshoudehaigh is an ancient mansion, for many years the residence of the Hall family; not far from it are the remains of extensive fortifications. At the base of the mountain near Mount Russell, are the remains of the church, which tradition supposes to have belonged to an establishment of Knights Templars. Great numbers of human bones found in this parish, and supposed to be those of the followers of the Earl of Desmond, have been collected and interred in the grounds of Mount Coote.

KILRAGHTIS, a parish, in the union of Ennis, barony of Upper Bunratty, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Ennis, on the road to Gort; containing 1995 inhabitants. It comprises 5587 statute acres, and, though only one mile broad, is nearly six miles long. Barefield is a very picturesque lake. The parish is in the diocese of Kilfaloe; the rectory forms part of the rectorial union of Ogashin, and the vicarage part of the vicarial union of Dromcliffe. The tithe rent-charge is £73, of which £34. 12. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Dowry or Doora: there is a chapel at Barefield. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground.

KILRANE, a parish, in the barony of Forth, union and county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (S. E.) from Wexford; containing 720 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern coast, and partly on the bay of Rosslare, outside Wexford harbour; and comprises 2047¾ statute acres, under an improving system of cultivation, in which sea-weed is used as a manure: good building-stone is obtained at Ballyhire. The principal seats are Ballytrent, Ballycronigan, and Ballyhire. Some of the inhabitants are employed in the herring-fishery, and during the summer in the fishery off the Tuscar rock. On this rock, which lies in St. George's Channel, about 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Greenore Point, is a lighthouse 101 feet high, erected in 1815 by the Ballast Corporation: it has a revolving light of three faces, two of which are bright and the third deep red; and in foggy weather bells are rung by the same machinery that causes the lights to revolve. Greenore Point is in lat. 52° 14′ 20″ (N.), and lon. 6° 12′ (W.): near it are two small rocks. At Ballygeary is a coast-guard station, which is included in the Wexford district. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Kilscoran, or Tacumshane, and of the corps of the chancellorship of Ferns cathedral; the rectory till lately formed the corps of the prebend of Kilrane, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £133. 0. 9., of which £90 are paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar: there are two glebes, comprising nearly seven acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrane is in the district of Tagoat, and has a neat chapel. At Ballytrent is an ancient Danish rath with a double mound, lately converted into a garden and shrubbery.

KILRANELAGH, a parish, in the union of Baltinglass, barony of Upper Talbotstown, county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, 3½ miles (E.) from Baltinglass, on the road from Dublin to Hacketstown; containing 1800 inhabitants. It comprises 4470½ statute acres, of which 1053 are mountain land, including Cadeen, which is 2143 feet high, and Kilranelagh hill, which rises to the height of 1289 feet: the land is chiefly in pasture. In the demesne of Kilranelagh is found porcelain clay, consisting of decomposed felspar, equal in purity to the Cornish china clay; granite and slate are abundant, and large masses of hornblende and a sort of greenstone frequently occur. There is a constabulary police station near Fort Granite. The principal seats are, Kilranelagh, a well-planted demesne of 200 statute acres; Ballynrowan; Fort Granite; and Barraderry. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, forming part of the union of Kiltegan: the tithe rent-charge is £145. 7. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions it is part of the district of Rathvilly, and has a chapel at Talbotstown. In the demesne of Fort Granite is a handsome school-house, with apartments for a master and mistress, built and supported entirely by the proprietor and his family. A kistvaen was discovered some years since on the estate of Kilranelagh, in which was an urn containing bones, now in the museum of Trinity College, Dublin. At Talbotstown are the remains of a square fort with a fosse, which must formerly have been of consequence, as it gave name to the barony; and there is a large old burial-ground.

KILRAUGHTS, or Cilraghts, a parish, in the union of Ballymoney, barony of Upper Dunluce, county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, 4 miles (E.) from Ballymoney, and on the roads leading respectively from Coleraine to Belfast and from Ballymena to Bushmills; containing 1542 inhabitants. This parish comprises 5132½ statute acres, of which very little is waste; the system of agriculture is in an unimproved state. The land is of excellent quality, but is generally occupied by small farmers, who devote a portion of their time to weaving; consequently, the due cultivation of the soil is neglected. There is only a small portion of bog, not more than sufficient to afford a moderate supply of fuel. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Rasharkin in the cathedral of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £112. 10. The church is a ruin, situated on an eminence; attached to it is a burial-ground, which is still used. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Covenanters.

KILREA, or Kilree, a parish, in the union of Callan, barony of Kells, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 3 miles (N. W.) from Knocktopher, and near the road from Kilkenny to Waterford; containing 720 inhabitants. It comprises 1947¾ statute acres. The principal seats are Kilree House and Chapel Izod. Kilrea is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Kells: the tithe rent-charge is £97. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donemagan. Among the ruins of the church is a very handsome and perfect cross, formed of a single block of freestone about eight feet high, ornamented with interlaced rings. Tradition states it to have been erected to commemorate the death of Neill Callan, King of Ireland, who, it is supposed, was drowned while endeavouring to save the life of a nobleman who had fallen into a river. Here is also the tomb of Richard Comerford and his wife, dated 1622, and ornamented with hieroglyphics of the Crucifixion, &c. About 10 feet from the north-western angle of the church, is an ancient round tower, which at four feet above the ground is 50½ feet in circumference; it is about 93 feet high, and the door is five feet from the ground.

KILREA, a market and post town, and a parish, partly in the barony of Coleraine, but chiefly in that of Loughinsholin, county of Londonderry, and province of Ulster, 28 miles (S. E.) from Londonderry, and 110 (N.) from Dublin, on the roads leading respectively from Coleraine to Portglenone and Castle-Dawson, and from Garvagh to Ballymoney; containing 4227 inhabitants, of whom 1191 are in the town. This parish is situated on the western shore of the river Bann, over which is a substantial stone bridge of seven arches, forming a communication between Kilrea and the county of Antrim, with which there is a great intercourse. The town, which has a post-office in connexion with Coleraine, is near the river, in that part of the parish within the barony of Loughinsholin; and consists of a square, or diamond, and four principal streets, comprising 214 houses, of which about 12 are slated, and the remainder thatched. The inhabitants are now supplied with water from a pump lately placed in the middle of the Diamond by the Mercers' Company, the public fountain in the south-eastern angle of the square being no longer used. A spacious and commodious hotel, and a handsome residence for their agent, have also been erected by the company, who are proprietors of the town and surrounding district. Their estate, of which this town may be considered the head, comprehends 41 townlands;

9 in this parish, 9 in Desertoghill, 11 in Maghera, 5 in Tamlaght-O'Crilly, 4 in Aghadowy, and 3 in Killylagh; together comprising an area of 21,060 statute acres, of which nearly one-fourth part is bog and rocky ground. The spinning of yarn and weaving of linen are carried on generally throughout the parish; and the river is navigable for lighters from Belfast and Newry, through Lough Neagh, to Portna, about a quarter of a mile distant from the town. The market is on Wednesday; a flax and linen market is held every alternate market-day, and fairs for cattle and horses on the second Wednesday in every month. A large and handsome market-house has been built on the north side of the square, at the expense of the Mercers' Company, who have also built a barrack in Bridge-street for the constabulary police. Manorial courts are held occasionally, and petty sessions in the market-house on the first Monday in every month.

The parish extends along the banks of the river Bann more than six miles, and comprises 6314½ statute acres, of which 138½ are in the Bann. The soil, though varying in different parts, is generally light, resting upon a substratum of basalt, which in many places rises above the surface, and of which detached blocks of various sizes are scattered in the wildest confusion. A good black, or rather dark grey, stone is quarried for building purposes; the quarry is distant from the town about a mile and a quarter, on the Coleraine road. There is no limestone in the parish; nor is there any timber or plantation; but many of the leases having expired, the Mercers' Company have already commenced some extensive and valuable improvements. The land is principally under tillage, producing tolerably good crops; the system of agriculture, though better than formerly, is still capable of improvement: there is an extensive tract of bog, affording an abundant supply of fuel. The line of road between this place and the county of Antrim was lately changed, which greatly increased the facility of travelling.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £180. The glebe-house, situated near the church, on a glebe of three acres, was built in 1774, by the then incumbent, at a cost of £600; there is a glebe in the parish of Tamlaght-O'Crilly, comprising 351 acres. The church has been recently rebuilt, chiefly by the Mercers' Company; the cost was £6000, of which £500 were given by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: it is a very handsome edifice, with a spire 120 feet high, and is lighted by Palmer's patent lamps; between 600 and 700 persons are accommodated within it. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Desertoghill, called also Kilrea. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. A parochial school is supported by the rector; a second school by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, for which the Mercers' Company erected a stone building, in 1813, at an expense of £700; and two others by the same company. The company support altogether 22 schools on their estate, in which about 1000 children are gratuitously instructed and supplied with books. There are some picturesque remains of the ancient castle of Movanagher, 1½ mile to the north of the present town: during the parliamentary war it was garrisoned for the king, but shortly fell into the hands of the parliamentarians, by whom, after being repeatedly taken and retaken, it was finally dismantled in 1649. The ford at Portoneil, and the ferry across the Bann, were in the same war scenes of much slaughter; and in 1668 they were severely contested, and alternately in the possession of both persons.

KILRENNY, a parish, in the union of Edenderry, barony of Carbery, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (S. E.) from Kinnegad, and on the road from Edenderry to Clonard; containing 638 inhabitants, and comprising 2617 statute acres. The land is good, and almost equally divided between an improving system of tillage and pasture: there is but little bog, and no waste. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Loftus family, of Killyon, and the tithe rent-charge is £33. 15., two-thirds payable to the impropriator and one-third to the vicar. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballyna, or Johnstown.

KILRICKILL, a parish, in the union of Loughrea, barony of Leitrim, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Loughrea, on the road to Ballinasloe; containing 1737 inhabitants. A nunnery is said to have been founded by St. Patrick for his sister, St. Richella, at Kilbought, at which place the Whaley family subsequently founded a monastery for the third order of Franciscans. The parish comprises 5947¼ statute acres. Here are some good stone-quarries; one of them, at Dartfield, produces a black stone which takes a high polish: limestone is also procured; and there is a small quantity of bog, which has been much reduced by injudicious cutting. There is a constabulary police station in the village, and a manorial court is held once every three weeks. Kilrickill is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Loughrea; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery, and the prebends of Droghta and Ballynoulter in the cathedral of Clonfert. The tithe rent-charge is £76. 17. 6., of which £22. 10. are payable to the dean, £20. 12. 6. to the prebendary of Droghta, £18. 15. to the prebendary of Ballynoulter, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrickill is the head of a district, comprising this parish and Killalaghton, in each of which is a chapel. At Kilbought are the remains of an ancient chapel, said to have belonged to the Franciscan friary; the burial-ground has been inclosed, and planted with yew-trees. The castle of Wallscourt gave the title of Baron to the family of Blake.

KILROAN, Killowen, or Killowney, a parish, in the union of Kinsale, partly in the barony of Kinsale, but chiefly in the barony of Courceys, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 3¼ miles (S.) from Kinsale, and on the western side of the entrance to Kinsale harbour; containing 731 inhabitants. This parish, which is surrounded by the parish of Ringrone, except on the eastern side, where it is bounded by the sea, comprises 1140 statute acres, and contains several picturesque glens. The soil is good, but indifferently cultivated: the substratum is of schistose formation, changing into transition rocks traversed by numerous veins of quartz. Kilroan is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, entirely appropriate to the vicars-choral of Cork cathedral: the tithe rent-charge is £84. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Courceys.

On the cliff at Courtafuteen are the picturesque ruins of the church, built of unhewn stone and with loop-hole windows.

KILROE.—See KILMANLOE.

KILROGUE, a village, in the parish of LACCAGH, barony of CLARE, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Galway, on the road to Tuam; containing about 48 inhabitants. This small village, consisting only of a very few scattered dwellings, has, since the census of 1821, decreased to nearly one-fourth part of its population at that time.

KILRONAN, GALWAY.—See KILLARARAN.

KILRONAN, a parish, in the union and barony of BOYLE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 9 miles (N.) from Carrick-on-Shannon; containing, with the towns of Keadue and Ballyfarnon (which are separately described), 7085 inhabitants. This parish contains the iron and coal works of Arigna, which are described in the article on the county; and comprises 16,356¼ statute acres, of which 200 are woodland, 6000 arable, 4000 pasture, 2000 bog, and the remainder mountain and waste land. It is bounded on the east by Lough Allen: this beautiful sheet of water is 6½ miles in length by 2½ in average breadth, but is considerably narrower towards its southern extremity. On each side are steep and barren mountains, which render it liable to storms and gusts of wind; and within its limits are O'Reilly's Island, which has been lately planted, and the small island of Inse, which is described in the article on Innismagrath. Beneath the mountains on the south is Lough Meelagh, near which is some charming scenery; and here is also Lough Skean. The village of Lough-End consists of straggling houses, the inhabitants of which are principally engaged in the collieries, or the sandstone and limestone quarries. The principal seats are, Castle Tenison; Alderford, (anciently called Camagh,) of the Mac Dermott Roe family; Greyfield; Mount Allen; and Knockranny.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in W. Mulloy, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £195, which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £400, and a loan of £328, from the late Board of First Fruits in 1815; the glebe comprises 30 acres, subject to a rent of £10. The church is a neat building with a spire, towards the erection of which the same Board gave £500, in 1788. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a chapel at Keadue, and one at Arigna, which latter was erected by the Mining Company. At Keadue is also a dispensary. The ancient church is in ruins; the burial-ground is still much used, and contains the remains of Carolan, the last and one of the most celebrated of the Irish bards, who died at Camagh, the seat of the M'Dermot Roes, in 1738, and was buried in their vault. There is a circular-headed portal in the walls of the old church, ornamented with carved cylinders. Near the old church is a celebrated well, in the vicinity of which is a cromlech.

KILRONAN, a parish, in the union of CLONMEL, barony of GLENAHIRY, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Clonmel, on the new road to Dungarvan; containing 4772 inhabitants. It comprises 16,702 statute acres, including a considerable quantity of mountain land, much of which, however, is planted or under cultivation. Limestone is found in several places. Some of the scenery is extremely rich and varied, particularly where the river Suir, which forms the northern and western boundaries of the parish, separates Kilmanahan Castle from Knocklofty, in the county of Tipperary, the seat of the Earl of Donoughmore. There are constabulary police stations at Kilmanahan-Bridge and Four-Mile-Water: fairs are held at Windygap on June 21st and Aug. 21st. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £290. 15., of which £166. 3. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. There is no glebe-house or glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newcastle, or Four-Mile-Water, at which latter place is a neat chapel. There are some remains of the church, and of the fort of Castlereagh; also of Castle Conagh, a square building, occupying the summit of a limestone rock on the bank of the river Neir, a tributary of the Suir.

KILRONAN, or BUTLERSTOWN, a parish, in the barony of MIDDLETHIRD, union and county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 9½ miles (S. S. W.) from Waterford; containing 112 inhabitants, and 546 statute acres. Butlerstown Castle is stated to have been captured by Cromwell's forces, in retiring from the siege of Waterford, and to have been partially destroyed with gunpowder; it has been repaired, and is now a private residence. The parish is in the diocese of Waterford, and was a rectory, forming part of the union of Killure, now suppressed: the tithe rent-charge is £25. 5., and there is a glebe of 10 acres, adjacent to the site of the old church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Trinity Without, or Ballybricken, and contains a chapel.

KILROOT, or KILROI, a parish, in the union of LARNE, barony of LOWER BELFAST, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 2½ miles (E. N. E.) from Carrickfergus, on the road to Larne; containing 735 inhabitants. At Kilroot Point, the French general Thurot, with three ships and 600 men, landed in 1760, with a view to attack Carrickfergus, which being at the time unprovided with a regular garrison, was obliged to capitulate. He also threatened to lay siege to Belfast, but on the approach of the forces which were advancing to expel him, he re-embarked his troops at this place, and set sail for France. The parish, which is situated on the bay of Carrickfergus, comprises 2418 statute acres; the land is in general in a good state of cultivation, and the most improved system of husbandry prevails. Castle Dobbs and Bella Hill are the principal seats: there are some interesting ruins of the ancient mansion of Castle Dobbs. Basalt and limestone exist in great abundance: of the former, a regular quarry of the columnar formation has been opened; the tops of the columns which are of four, five, and six sides, are only a few inches below the surface. All the pillars dip to the northward, and are nearly as perfect as those of the Giants' Causeway, resembling in some degree the massive columns called the Giants' Organ; between them are thin layers of decomposed rock; the ends of the joints are in some almost flat, and in others concave and convex. There is an extensive bleach-green belonging to Michael Andrews, Esq., of Ardoyne; in which the elegant royal damasks from the Ardoyne manufactory are finished, to the number of more than 10,000 pieces annually, affording constant employment to a number of persons. A constabulary police force is stationed here.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, united by charter of James I. to the rectory of Ballynure and the vicarage of Templecorran, together forming the union and corps of the prebend of Kilroot in the cathedral of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Donegal. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £113. 10., of which £75. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire benefice produces to the incumbent a rent-charge of £420. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. The church has been in ruins for more than 200 years; the church of the union is at Ballynure. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Carrickfergus and Larne. A nitrous spring rises in a bed of marly clay in the parish; the water has an aperient quality. Dean Swift held the prebend of Kilroot, which was his first preferment.

KILROSS, or KILRASSE, a parish, in the barony of TIRAGHRILL, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2½ miles (E.) from Collooney, on the road to Dromahaire; containing 1633 inhabitants. The church of the Holy Trinity, or Athmoy, was built here for Præmonstratensian Canons brought from Lough Kee by Clarus Mac Moylin O'Moillchonry, archdeacon of Elphin, in the 13th century: the outer walls still remain, with a burial-place attached. The parish comprises 3932¾ statute acres, and contains abundance of limestone. Near Castle Dargan, a residence, are the ruins of an ancient castle. Kilross is a vicarage in the diocese of Elphin, formerly part of the union of Boyle; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Lorton, and the tithe rent-charge is £61. 18., of which nearly half is payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Sowey.

KILROSSANTY, a parish, in the union of DUNGANNON, barony of DECIES-without-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Kilmacthomas, and on the old road from Waterford to Dungarvan; containing 3615 inhabitants. This parish comprises 17,416 statute acres; the soil is generally of an inferior quality, and there are about 1000 acres of bog. It extends from the eastern base of the Cummeragh mountains, and includes the hamlets of Cummeragh and Glendaligan; the principal seats are Roxborough, Mount Kennedy, and Brook Lodge. Fairs are held at Ballycaroge on the 2nd and 21st of October. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the gift of the Bishop, who also presents to the rectory, which forms the corps of the prebend of Kilrossanty in the cathedral of Lismore: the tithe rent-charge is £450, of which £300 are payable to the prebendary, and £150 to the vicar. The glebe-house was erected in 1807, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £314 from the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 17 acres. The church was built in 1808, by a gift of £500 from the same Board, and has been repaired by a grant of £240 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrossanty is the head of a district, comprising this parish and Fews, in each of which is a chapel. There is a public school to which Colonel Palliser subscribes £40 annually, besides giving the school-house; and near the Roman Catholic chapel a commodious school-house has been erected by subscription, on a site given by Pierse G. Barron, Esq. In the bed of a stream is a detached fragment of rock split through, called Clough Lowris, or "the speaking stone." At Barnakile are some remains of a castle, and there was one at Ballycaroge belonging to the Walsh family.

KILRUANE, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, partly in the barony of LOWER ORMOND, but chiefly in that of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 2¼ miles (N. E.) from Nenagh, on the road to Parsonstown; containing 1444 inhabitants. It comprises 3911 statute acres, principally under tillage; the drill system of agriculture is general. There are some limestone-quarries, and a bog of about 50 acres. The principal seats are Rapla, Rathurlys, Ballinvira, and Claremont. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £149. 19. 8. There is now neither glebe-house nor glebe; 14a. 2r. 12p. of land about the old church, properly belonging to the benefice, are withheld by the present landlord of the estate on which they are situated. The church, a neat structure, was built by a gift of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1822. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Cloghjordan, and contains a chapel. In the demesne of Rathurlys are the remains of a circular castle, and of a Danish rath covering about two acres, in which are the picturesque ruins of the old parochial church; and not far distant are to be seen the remains of a Druidical altar.

KILRUSH, a sea-port, market, and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 21 miles (S. W.) from Ennis, and 130¼ (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 11,385 inhabitants, of whom 5071 are in the town. This town is pleasantly situated on the northern shore of the estuary of the Shannon, about 15 miles from its mouth, and on the creek to which it gives name, and to the convenience of which for export trade it owes its present importance. It is neatly built, and consists of a market-square intersected from east to west by a spacious street, from which smaller streets branch off; the total number of houses, in 1841, was 719. The principal streets are well paved and flagged; and the roads in the vicinity have been greatly improved within the last few years. The manufactures of the town and neighbourhood, chiefly for home consumption, are friezes, flannels, stockings, strong sheetings, and a serviceable kind of narrow linen called bandle-cloth; there are works for refining rock salt for domestic use, a tanyard, a soap manufactory, and a manufactory for nails. The chief trade is in corn, butter, cattle, pigs, and agricultural produce; and a considerable number of hides are sold in the market. About 20 small hookers belonging to the port are engaged in fishing and dredging for oysters off the coast, in which about 200 persons are employed.

K I L—R U

The port is free of dues, except a small charge for keeping the pier in repair. The pier, which is of solid construction, is protected by a sea-wall of great strength, and is very commodious both for commercial and agricultural uses; it affords every facility for landing passengers from the steam-vessels which regularly ply between this place and Limerick. During the bathing season at Kilkee these vessels ply daily, and at other times on alternate days; public cars are always in attendance to convey passengers to Kilkee. The pier extends from the shore towards Hog Island in the Shannon, and was erected partly at the expense of the Board of Customs, and subsequently extended 168 feet by the late Board of Fisheries and Mr. Vandeleur, at an expense of £1800. The custom-house, a neat building near the quay, erected in 1806, is under the control of the port-collector of Limerick. The harbour is about 9 miles below Tarbert; its peculiar advantage arises from its depth of water, which admits of the entrance of vessels of the largest size. Ships of war and Indiamen anchor in the roadstead, and there is a tide-harbour with piers and quays; also a patent-slip for repairs. Hence this is a good asylum harbour for vessels in distress; its proximity to the mouth of the Shannon renders it easy of access, and eligible for vessels to put to sea at any time of the tide; and therefore it must be considered one of the best positions for an American packet station. About one mile south from the shore, and between the island of Inniscattery and the main land, is Hog Island, comprising about 20 acres of land, and containing one family. A coast-guard station, forming part of the district of Miltown-Malbay, is established at Kilrush, and a revenue cutter is stationed off the shore. In the excise arrangements, Kilrush is within the district of Limerick.

A branch of the National Bank has been opened in the town. The market is on Saturday, and by patent may be held daily; the fairs are on May 10th and Oct. 12th, and there is also a fair at Ballyket on July 4th. The market-house, a handsome building in the centre of the market-square, was erected at the expense of the late Mr. Vandeleur, to whom the town owes much of its prosperity; there are also some meat-shambles and a public slaughter-house. Quarter-sessions are held here at Easter and Michaelmas; there are petty-sessions every Tuesday; and a court for the manor of Kilrush is held on the first Monday in every month by the seneschal of Crofton Moore Vandeleur, Esq., lord of the manor. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town. The court-house, a neat and commodious building, was erected in 1831, on a site given by Mr. Vandeleur; and a small bridewell was built in 1825, containing eight cells, two day-rooms, and two yards, and well adapted to the classification of prisoners.

The parish comprises 15,658¾ statute acres. The system of agriculture has latterly been much improved, and tillage very considerably extended; within the last few years the quantity of wheat grown has increased tenfold. This improvement is chiefly to be attributed to the facility of communication with Limerick, afforded by the Steam Navigation Company; the agricultural produce which passed through the market, in a recent year, including pigs, amounted in value to £50,000. Great quantities of turf are cut, and sent chiefly from Poolanishary harbour, on the western shore of the parish, to Limerick and its neighbourhood, by boats manned by three persons; each boat is calculated to earn about £200 annually in this trade. At Knockeragh is an excellent quarry of flags, the smaller of which are used for roofing; and flags of superior quality are also quarried at Moneypoint, on the shore of the Shannon, and sent to Cork, Tralee, and other places: gritstones, from four to eight feet in length, and from two to four feet wide, are procured at Crag and Tullagower, with sand of a good quality for building. There are also quarries of building-stone and slate; and in several parts of the parish are indications of lead and copper, but no mine of either has been yet opened. The principal seats are, Kilrush House, the residence of the Vandeleur family, a handsome and spacious mansion immediately adjoining the town, and commanding an extensive view of the Shannon, and the Clare and Kerry shores; Mount Pleasant; Cappa Lodge; and Oaklands.

Kilrush is in the diocese of Killaloe. The rectory is partly impropriate in John Scott, Esq., but chiefly appropriate to the prebend of Inniscattery in the cathedral of Killaloe; the vicarage forms part of the corps of the same prebend, to which were episcopally united, in 1777, the vicarages of Kilfieragh, Kilballyhone, and Moyarta, together constituting the union of Kilrush, in the gift of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £321. 18. 6., of which £27. 14. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the prebendary; the vicarial tithe of the three other parishes amounts to £274. 4. 8. The glebe-house, built in 1807, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, is a handsome residence near the church; the parochial glebe comprises about 3 acres, and that of the entire union 10 acres. The church, a large edifice with an embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, built in 1819, at an expense exceeding £1700, stands near the site of the ancient church, the ruins of which form an interesting and picturesque appendage: it contains a well-executed mural tablet to the late Mr. Vandeleur, and has been repaired by a grant of £121 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Killeymur: the parochial chapel is a spacious building, with a well-executed altar-piece; there is also a chapel at Knockeragh, erected in 1833. In the town is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, recently erected on ground presented by Mr. Vandeleur. A school is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, who allow the master £30 per annum; a parochial school is chiefly supported by the incumbent, and there is a large school under the superintendence of the Roman Catholic clergyman. The union workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £750, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6800, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers. About two miles from the town, on the road to Miltown, and also near the Ennis road, are chalybeate springs, both considered efficacious in the cure of bilious diseases. At Mullagha are the ruins of an ancient chapel, supposed to have been built by St. Senan, who is said to have been a native of that place; attached to it is a burial-ground still in use, and near it a holy well. There are several raths or ancient forts included within the limits of the parish.

KILRUSH, a parish, in the barony of West Ophaly, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 6 miles (S. W.) from Kilcullen, on the road to Athy; containing 577 inhabitants. An abbey for Augustinian canons was founded here at the commencement of the thirteenth century by William le Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke, and subsisted till the Reformation. In 1642, the Earl of Ormonde, returning from the relief of the royal fortresses in Kildare, was opposed on the high grounds of Kilrush and Bullhill, by Lord Mountgarrett and other Roman Catholic leaders, whom he entirely defeated on a neighbouring eminence since called Battlemount. This victory was considered so important that the English house of commons voted him £500 for the purchase of a jewel, and petitioned the king to create him a Knight of the Garter. The parish comprises 4076½ statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, forming part of the union of Ballysonan: the tithe rent-charge is £166. 3. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrush is part of the district of Sancroft.

KILRUSH, a parish, in the barony of Cranagh, union and county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 1 mile (W.) from Freshford, on the road to Johnstown; containing about 754 inhabitants. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Aghoure. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrush is part of the district of Urlingford. In civil arrangements it is reckoned part of the parish of Clomantagh.

KILRUSH, a parish, in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, union of Dungarvan, county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 2 miles (N. W.) from Dungarvan; containing 723 inhabitants. It comprises 1723 statute acres, and is nearly surrounded by the parish of Dungarvan. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, united to the rectories of Ballybacon and Kilmolash, together forming the union of Kilrush and the corps of the archdeaconry of Lismore, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £114. 4. 8., and of the whole union £634. There is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 20 acres, besides 30 acres belonging to the archdeaconry. Here are some interesting remains of the church, covered with ivy.

KILRUSH, a parish, in the union of Enniscorthy, barony of Scarawalsh, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster; adjoining the post-town of Newtownbarry, and containing 3158 inhabitants. This parish comprises 11,385¾ statute acres of land generally fertile; but with the exception of some pebble-limestone, manure is scarce, and limestone is brought from the county of Carlow. It is watered by the Slaney, over which are two stone bridges, one connecting it with Newtownbarry, and the other crossing the river at Clohamon. The principal seats are, Ballynapark; Clohamon Lodge; Ballyrankin House, a handsome mansion lately much improved, now the property of the Rev. N. Devereux; and Newlands; all pleasantly situated on the banks of the Slaney. Part of the demesne of Woodfield, the beautiful seat of Lord Farnham, is also in this parish. Clohamon is a neat and thriving village of recent origin, and the population is chiefly employed in large flour and cotton mills, from the latter of which are produced on an average about 200 pieces weekly. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming the corps of the prehend of Kilrush in Ferns cathedral, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £520. 12. 4. There is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The church is a small plain edifice, and has been repaired by a grant of £262 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilrush is the head of a district, including this parish and that part of Carnew which is in the county of Wexford, and containing chapels at Kilrush and Askamore; the former is a neat modern building, attached to which are a residence for the priest and a school. About 70 Protestant children are educated at the schools of Clohamon and Kilrush.

KILSALLAGHAN, a parish, in the union of Balrothery, barony of Nethercross, county of Dublin, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (N.) from Dublin, on the old mail-road to Drogheda; containing 548 inhabitants. This parish, anciently Kilsaughan, is bounded on the north by a small stream called the Fieldstown river, which falls into the sea a little to the north of the town of Swords. It comprises 2731 statute acres, of which 1134 are arable, and the remainder meadow and pasture: the system of agriculture is improving, and tillage increasing; and building-stone is found in the parish. There are several good houses: the principal are, a mansion on the grounds of which are the ruins of Kilsallaghan Castle, forming a conspicuous feature for many miles round; New Barn, where is a rath or moat; and Dunmicky, near which is a rath surrounded by a deep ditch. Fairs for horses, cattle, and pigs, are held on Ascension-day and Sept. 8th. The living is in the diocese of Dublin; the rectory appropriate to the incumbent for the time being, provided he be resident, at a reserved rent of £10. 7. to the crown; and the vicarage united to that of Chapelmidway, and in the patronage of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge, including Chapelmidway, is £125. The glebe-house was built in 1748, by a gift of £173 from the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 33 acres of well-cultivated land. The church, rebuilt in 1812, by a loan of £708 from the same Board, is a neat small edifice. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Rollestown.

KILSARAN, or Kilsorran, a parish, in the union and barony of Ardee, county of Louth, and province of Leinster, on the coach-road from Dublin to Belfast; containing, with the parish of Gernonstown and the post-town of Castle-Bellingham, 2098 inhabitants. A preceptory of Knights Templars was founded here in the 12th century by Matilda de Lacy, and was granted, in the reign of Edward II., to the Knights Hospitallers. In 1483, Keating, prior of Kilmainham, appointed Marmaduke Lomley preceptor, but some time after threw him into prison, where he died of a broken heart. The parish comprises 3393½ statute acres: the land is of superior quality, and chiefly under a good system of tillage; there is neither waste nor bog. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and embellished with several handsome seats, among which are Milestown, Greenmount, Maine, and Kilsaran. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, united by statute of the 9th of Anne, cap. 12, to the rectory of Gernonstown, and in the patronage of J. M'Clintock, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge of this parish is £240. 18. 7.; and the value of the whole union, including glebe, £385. 16. 10.

The glebe-house was built about 80 years since by Mrs. Spencer; the glebe comprises 19½ acres of profitable land. The church of the union is at Castle-Bellingham. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kilsaran, Gernonstown, and Stabannon, and containing chapels at Kilsaran and Stabannon, the former of which is a large building adjoining the ruins of the ancient church.

KILSCANLAN, a parish, in the union of New Ross, barony of Bantry, county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 5 miles (S. E.) from New Ross, near the road to Wexford; containing 404 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1154 statute acres, chiefly under tillage. It is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of St. Mary's, New Ross. The tithes, previously to the passing of the Rent-charge act, amounted to £43. 16. 11.; they were lately disappropriated from the see of Ferns, and the rent-charge is now paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who allow the impropriate curate 40*s.* late currency per annum for the discharge of the clerical duties. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Old Ross.

KILSCANNEL, a parish, in the union of Rathkeale, barony of Lower Connello, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 1½ mile (W. S. W.) from Rathkeale; containing 1049 inhabitants. It comprises 3203 statute acres; the soil is of superior quality, being based on a substratum of limestone. About one-half of the land is under an excellent system of tillage, producing abundant crops; and the remainder is rich meadow and grazing-land, affording plentiful pasture to numbers of milch-cows: there are several large dairy-farms, and great quantities of butter are sent hence to Cork and Limerick for exportation. In this parish is a colony of Palatines, or German settlers, all of whom are Protestants, and many of them poor industrious weavers. The principal gentlemen's seats are, Elm Hill, a handsome residence, and Kilscannel House: there are also several substantial and well-built houses occupied by highly respectable farmers. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, forming part of the corps of the chancellorship of the cathedral of Limerick: the tithe rent-charge is £157. 10., and the glebe comprises 12 acres of profitable land in two detached portions. The church, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £115, is a very neat edifice with a square embattled tower, erected in 1822, by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the unions of Ardagh and Rathkeale. There is a small place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. About 60 children are taught in the parochial school, for which a neat school-house, with a residence for the master and mistress, was built by subscription in 1825. Near the present church were some remains, lately removed, of the ancient structure. There were also remains of a very ancient church at Kilmurry, removed to make room for a house, about seven years since.

KILSCORAN, a parish, in the barony of Forth, union and county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, 1 mile (N.) from Broadway; containing 666 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of Greenore bay on the eastern coast, comprises 2151¾ statute acres principally under a gradually improving system of tillage; sea-weed, which is in abundance on the shore, is the principal manure. Building-stone of tolerable quality is found at Kishough Cross. In the bay, during moderate weather, or with westerly winds, a vessel may ride in safety on the south side in two or three fathoms of water. Hill Castle, a seat in the parish, occupies a commanding situation, and forms a conspicuous and interesting feature in the surrounding landscape. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, united from time immemorial to the rectories of Tacumshane, Ballymore, Killilane, and Rosslare, the vicarage of Kilrane, and the impropriate curacy of St. Margaret's, together forming the union of Kilscoran, also called Tacumshane, and the corps of the chancellorship of Ferns, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £170. 3. 6., and of the entire benefice £740. 13. The glebe-house is in Tacumshane parish. The church, a neat structure, was built in 1817, by a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits, and was recently repaired by a grant of £157 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tagoat. About 60 children are taught in the parochial school, which is supported by the rector; the school-house, a neat rustic building, was erected at the expense of the Rev. Dr. Elrington, the late incumbent of the union.

KILSEILY, a parish, in the union of Limerick, barony of Tulla Lower, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Killaloe, on the road to Ennis; containing 4469 inhabitants. It comprises 11,102¾ statute acres; about 7600 are arable land under an improving system of tillage, and the remainder mountain pasture and bog. Good building-stone of a gritty quality is found in the parish; and at Ardskegh, Hurlston, and Lyssane are quarries of slate, the produce of which is extensively used in Limerick and Ennis. The principal seats are Woodfield, Hurlston, and Violet Hill. Lake Doon near Broadford, abounds with pike and bream; and the neighbourhood affords a variety of game. A canal from Broadford to Bunratty, on the Shannon, might be constructed at a moderate expense, the line being nearly level, and mostly through a chain of lakes. Two fairs are held at Broadford, which see; and a manorial court for the recovery of small debts is also held there. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe; the rectory forming part of the union of Omullod; and the vicarage united to the vicarages of Killurane and Kilnoe, constituting the union of Kilseily, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £180, one-half payable to the rector and the other to the vicar; and the entire tithe of the vicarial benefice is £235. 8.: there is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The church, at Broadford, was built in 1810 by a loan of £800 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Broadford, comprising also the parish of Killokennedy; there are three chapels, situated respectively at Broadford, Glanomera, and Kilbane. The parochial school, at Broadford, is supported by the incumbent. There are some slight vestiges of Doon Castle, on the border of the lake; and near Broadford is a mineral spring, formerly in great repute.

KILSHALVEE, or KILLOWSHALWAY, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, barony of CORRAN, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Boyle, on the road to Ballina; containing 2411 inhabitants. It comprises $5505\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, principally under tillage: the land is generally good; there is but little bog. Limestone is abundant. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Killaraght; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Kingston, and the tithe rent-charge is £253. 17., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Buninaden, and has a chapel at Killarvin. There are some remains of the church.

KILSHANE, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAM, union and county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER; containing 615 inhabitants. It comprises 1424 statute acres, and contains limestone and brownstone, the latter of which is of good quality for building. Here is a small flour-mill. The principal seats are Spring House and Kilshane Cottage. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, entirely impropriate in the representatives of W. Moore, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £49. 10. per annum. Here are some ruins of the church, and of a castle; also several Danish raths. A well, called Lady's well, is much resorted to by the peasantry; and there are some chalybeate springs.

KILSHANIG, or KILSHANICK, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Mallow, on the road to Millstreet; containing 9348 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Glauntane, is situated on the southern side of the river Blackwater, and is partly bounded on the east by the Clydagh, and on the south-west by the Bogra moors. It comprises 27,595 statute acres; about two-fifths are under tillage, and the remainder, with the exception of about 1290 acres of common and 260 of woodland, is mountain pasture and bog. The system of agriculture is gradually improving; limestone is found on the lands of Newberry, but not in sufficient quantity for the supply of this extensive parish, the deficiency being made up from quarries near Mallow. The principal seats are, Dromore House, occupying a commanding situation in an extensive and richly wooded demesne, and forming a conspicuous feature in the landscape; Danesfort; Millfort; Woodfort, in the grounds of which is a thickly planted conical hill with a turret on its summit, commanding a fine view of the rivers Blackwater and Clydagh, the town of Mallow, and the numerous seats in the vicinity; Clydagh; Clydaghville; Lombardstown; Allworth; Upper Dromore; Bettesborough; and Newberry House. At Millfort, Lombardstown, and Gortroe, are some small flour-mills. A court for the manor of Newberry is occasionally held at Scarra, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40*s.* late currency; and there is a constabulary police station.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £553. 17., and the glebe comprises about $4\frac{1}{4}$ acres; there is no glebe-house. The church, built in 1719, is a plain neat edifice with a square tower, originally surmounted by a spire, which was taken down in 1815. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: the chapel of Glauntane was rebuilt in 1821, and is situated in a picturesque glen; there is also a chapel at Kilpadder. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Independents. About 300 children are taught in two scriptural schools and an infant school: one is endowed with four acres of land from the Misses Lombard, and is almost entirely supported by the rector, the Rev. John Lombard, and a grant from the Scriptural School Society; another was built by the late, and is aided by the present, Mr. Newman. The late Mrs. Newman bequeathed £200 late currency, the interest to be divided annually among ten poor men and ten widows, to enable them to provide a dinner on Christmas-day. Mr. Newman, also, bequeathed £100 for distribution annually among the poor. The extensive remains of the castle of Dromineen, the ancient residence of the O'Callaghans, occupy a bold and romantic situation on the southern bank of the river Blackwater, and command an extensive and pleasingly varied view of the surrounding country, in which Mount Hilary, recently planted by Samuel Townsend, Esq., and on which are the remains of an ancient building called Money's Castle, forms a conspicuous and interesting object.

KILSHANNY, a parish, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Ennistymon, on the road to Kilfenora; containing 2114 inhabitants. Here was formerly a cell to the abbey of Corcomroe, which at the Dissolution was, with its appurtenances, mills, and fisheries, granted to Robert Hickman. The parish comprises 5805 statute acres, chiefly under tillage; there is a considerable portion of bog. A court for the manor of Corcomroe is occasionally held by the seneschal at Kilshanny, for the recovery of small debts. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Kilfenora, partly appropriate to the deanery, but chiefly impropriate in R. M. G. Adams, Esq.: the tithe rent-charge is £118. 10., of which £112. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remaining £6, being the tithe of the townland of Ballymacrenan, to the dean. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is held separately, and gives name to a district; the chapel is at Kilshanny. At Smithstown, a seat of Viscount Powerscourt, are the ruins of an ancient castle.

KILSHARVAN, a parish, in the union of DROGHEDA, partly in the barony of UPPER DULEEK, but chiefly in the barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Drogheda, on the road to The Naul; containing 440 inhabitants, of whom about 160 are in the hamlet, which contains 30 houses. It comprises $2096\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, of which 40 are woodland and 100 waste; the land is of moderately good quality, and almost equally divided between pasture and tillage. Here is plenty of limestone; and on the Nanny water are extensive bleach-works, the property of Mr. Armstrong, contiguous to whose tastefully laid out grounds are the picturesque ruins of the old church, the burial-ground of which is still used. The other principal seats are Mount Hanover, Cooper Hill, and Annagor. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Colpe; the rectory is partly impropriate in G. Pepper, Esq., and partly appropriate to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge is £86. 5., of which £52. 17. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar:

there is a glebe of 3½ acres, valued at £12 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilsharvan forms part of the district of St. Mary's, Drogheda. A bequest of £10 per annum was made by the late H. Smith, Esq., to the poor of this parish and Colpe.

KILSHEELAN, a parish, in the union of CLONMEL, partly in the barony of UPPERTHIRD, county of WATERFORD, but chiefly in that of IFFA and OFFA EAST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Carrick-on-Suir, and on the road from Clonmel to Waterford; containing 1936 inhabitants, of whom 435 are in the village. The village consists of 74 houses, and is a constabulary police station: here is a bridge over the river Suir. The principal seats are Newtown Anner, Landscape, and Gurteen. Adjoining the magnificent woods of this last demesne, which contains a cromlech, is a large ravine composed of strata of red sandstone, white silicious sandstone, and soft slaty rock which decomposes into a pure yellow ochreous earth. Kilsheelan is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, united to the rectory of Kilmurry, and in the gift of the Marquess of Ormonde, in whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £285. 15., of which £187. 15. 6. are payable to the vicar, and the remainder to the impropriator; the tithe of the entire benefice of the incumbent is £566. 14. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilgrant or Riverstown, and contains a chapel. The late W. Power, Esq., of Ballydino, left 30 acres of land and £5000 for the establishment of an almshouse. Here are some remains of the ancient church, and of a castle; also a large moat.

KILSHINANE, or KILLISHANE, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Listowel, on the road to Castleisland; containing 2271 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 13,478 statute acres, is bounded on the south-east by the Knockfodery, or Lackfodery, mountains; and consists chiefly of mountain pasture and bog: coal exists, but has not been worked. It is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilflyn. The tithe rent-charge, amounting to £112. 6. 6., is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly included in the district of Listowel, but chiefly in that of Lixnaw. The ruins of the church still exist, in the burial-ground; near which is a holy well, resorted to by the peasantry for devotional purposes.

KILSHINE, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of MORGALLION, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Navan, and on the road from Dublin to Kingscourt; containing 609 inhabitants. This parish was the scene of a skirmish during the disturbances of 1798. It comprises 1543½ statute acres, three-fourths of which are under a good system of tillage; there is some bog. Petty-sessions are held at George's Cross every alternate Monday. Mountainstown House, the handsome residence of the Pollock family, is situated in a fine demesne of 300 plantation acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, united by act of council in 1809 to the rectory of Clongill, and in the patronage of the Crown and the Bishop, the former having one turn and the latter two. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £69, and the value of the entire benefice £228 per annum. The church, which is a very neat structure with a spire, was rebuilt by a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1815. The glebe-house is in Clongill, where there is a glebe of 21 acres, valued at £63 per annum, besides a glebe in this parish of ten acres, valued at £21 per annum. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is considered to form part of the district of Castletown-Kilpatrick.

KILSILLAGH, a parish, in the union of BANDON, barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Clonakilty; containing 188 inhabitants. This small parish, which is entirely surrounded by the parish of Lislee, comprises only 245 statute acres; the whole belongs to the see of Ross. The land is very fertile, and under good cultivation; the substratum is clay-slate, and the chief manure sea-weed and sand, which are obtained with facility in great abundance; there is neither waste land nor bog. Kilsillagh is a rectory, in the diocese of Ross, forming part of the union of Lislee: the tithe rent-charge is £32. 1. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Abbeymahon. There are some slight remains of the parish church, to which is attached a small burial-ground.

KILSKERRY, a parish, in the union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of OMAGH, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Enniskillen, on the road to Omagh; containing, with the market-town of Trillick, 9351 inhabitants. This place, during the war of 1641, was attacked by the Irish forces under Sir Phelim O'Nial, whom the inhabitants succeeded in driving back to the mountains; but they suffered severely in a second attack, in which the assailants were successful. Near Corkhill Lodge are the remains of a fortress which was garrisoned by the inhabitants, who resolutely defended the ford of the river, where a handsome bridge was subsequently erected. The army of James II. encamped twice in this parish during his contest with William III., and marched hence against Enniskillen. An interesting work was published by the Rev. Andrew Hamilton, rector of Kilskerry, descriptive of these two wars, in the latter of which he himself took an active and honourable part. The PARISH is six miles long and as many broad, and comprises 20,439 statute acres, of which the surface is boldly undulated, and the soil generally fertile. The system of agriculture is rapidly improving; more than 1000 acres of waste land have been already brought into cultivation, principally under the encouragement of the rector. The principal seats are, Trillick Lodge, the property of Colonel Archdall, near which are the remains of Castle Mervyn, built by a person of the name of Mervyn, from whom Colonel Archdall derives his title to his estate in this county; Relagh; Corkhill Lodge; and Corkhill. Two other seats, almost dilapidated, were formerly the residences of the Barton and Bryan families. There are several mountains in the parish, and several lakes, from which small streams descend to Lough Erne, between which and Lough Foyle it has been in contemplation to form a communication by a canal. There is a small establishment for milling blankets. A manorial court, petty-sessions, and fairs are held at Trillick, which see.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, constituting the corps of the prebend of Kilskerry in the cathedral of Clogher, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £506. 12. The glebe-house, a spacious and handsome residence surrounded by old plantations, was built in 1774 at an expense of £1300, of which £100 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe comprises 380 acres of profitable land, valued at £1 per acre; besides which there are 636¾ acres of mountain glebe, annually in process of being reclaimed, and rising in value. The church, an elegant structure in the early English style, with a square tower surmounted by an octagonal spire, was built in 1790, at an expense of £1060, defrayed by the Rev. Dr. Hastings; the original spire was taken down and the present one erected in 1830, at the expense of the parish. Divine service is also performed by the clergymen of the Establishment in the Wesleyan meeting-house at Trillick, monthly in winter, and once a fortnight in summer. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel, a spacious building, is at Magheralough. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists at Trillick. A parochial school is supported by the rector and the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and there is a school-house at Magheralough, built by the Rev. A. H. Irvine, curate, on land given by Colonel Perceval; there are several national and other schools, and a dispensary. Here was a monastery in the 7th century, of which no vestiges can be traced.

KILSKYRE, or KILSKEER, a parish, in the union of KELLS, barony of UPPER KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER; containing, with the post-town of Crossakeel, and several villages, 5014 inhabitants. An abbey was founded here at a very early period, which was destroyed by the Danes, but some of its ruins still exist. The parish comprises 11,724 statute acres, chiefly under tillage; there are about 800 acres of bog and waste land, and abundance of limestone. Near Bensfort, extensive operations for draining the lands are in progress. The principal seats are Newgrove; Miltown; Silvan Park; and Boltown, the property of the Battersby family. The village of Kilskyre comprises 29 neatly built houses, and 156 inhabitants. Petty-sessions and fairs are held at Crossakeel, which see. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £318. 15. The glebe-house was built in 1789, at a cost of about £810; the glebe consists of 22 acres. The church, a handsome edifice with a lofty spire, stands on an eminence, at Crossakeel; it was erected by subscription in 1818, and has been repaired by a grant of £137 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions this is the head of a district, comprising Kilskyre, Clonabreny, and Diamor, and containing chapels at Kilskyre and Ballinlough, the latter of which is a neat edifice. There is a school at Crossakeel on Erasmus Smith's foundation, to which W. Blayney Wade, Esq., contributes £6 per annum, besides granting two acres of land, on which the school-house was erected at an expense of £200, partly defrayed by Mr. Wade and partly by the trustees. Viscount Killeen lately gave a site for a school-house at Kilskyre, and another has been established at Ballinlough.

KILSUB, or BAWNBOY, a village, in the parish of TEMPLEPORT, union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of TULLAGHAGH, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Ballyconnell, on the road to Swanlinbar; containing 26 houses, and 96 inhabitants. It has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Ballyconnell; a fair is held on the first Monday, and petty-sessions on the second Monday, in every month. Near Bawnboy is a well-planted demesne; and there is a small boulting-mill.

KILTACAMOGUE.—See KILDECAMOGUE.

KILTALE, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of LOWER DEECE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 3¾ miles (W.) from Dunshaughlin, and on the road from Summerhill to Skryne; containing 419 inhabitants. The parish comprises 1018½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Knockmark; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Dunsany. The tithe rent-charge is £53. 9., payable to the impropriator, who allows a stipend for the discharge of the clerical duties. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kiltale is part of the district of Kilmore.

KILTALLA, or KILTALLAGH, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of TRUGHENACKMY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (N. by E.) from Milltown, on the road to Tralee; containing, with the town of Castlemaine (which is separately described), 1303 inhabitants. This parish extends from the river Maine, on the south, to the mountain of Slieve Meesh on the north, a portion of which mountain is within its limits: it comprises 4757 statute acres, having generally a fine alluvial soil on a substratum of limestone; there is some light bog on the mountain. The limestone is burnt for manure, and at Anna is a quarry of good brown-stone adapted for building. The seats are Laharun, Kiltalla Glebe, and Anna: at Ballycrispin, the estate of Lord Monteagle, was the residence of his maternal ancestors. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, united since 1682 to the rectory of Kilgarrilander and the rectory and vicarage of Currens, together constituting the union of Kiltallagh, in the gift of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £124. 14. 9., and of the entire union £365. 18. 6. The glebe-house was rebuilt in 1820, by aid of a gift of £400, and a loan of like amount, from the Board of First Fruits: there is a glebe in each parish; that of Kiltallagh comprises about six acres, and those of the entire union 19¾ acres. The church is a small plain edifice with a square tower, rebuilt in 1816, the late Board granting a loan of £600. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Castlemaine, which also comprises the parish of Kilgarrilander, and contains the chapels of Kiltallagh and Boulteens; the latter is in Kilgarrilander. The children of the parish generally attend Lady Godfrey's free school at Milltown, in the adjoining parish of Kilcoleman.

KILTARTAN, a parish, in the union of GORT, barony of KILTARTAN, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with part of the post-town of Gort, 2962 inhabitants. It comprises 5725 statute acres: here is a little bog, and some rocky waste land. Limestone is abundant, bears a high polish, and is obtained in very large square slabs; at Ballylee is a quarry of fine black marble. The principal seats are Coole, Ballymantane, Raheen, Ballylee Castle, Roseville, and Ballintown. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union and corps of the deanery of Kilmacduagh; the tithe rent-charge is £131. 10. 9. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a stone chapel built in 1837, for which R. Gregory, Esq., gave £60. There are the ruins of a large castle at Castletown, in good preservation. Kiltartan gives the title of Baron to Viscount Gort.

KILTEAL, or KILTEEL, a parish, in the union of ATHY, partly in the barony of STRADBALLY, but chiefly in the barony of MARYBOROUGH EAST, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 2¼ miles (N. W.) from Stradbally, on the road to Maryborough; containing 1067 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3553½ statute acres, including the great heath of Maryborough, 274½ acres in extent. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, forming part of the union of Dysartenos; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Carew, and the tithe rent-charge is £132. 3., of which £88. 2. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Maryborough.

KILTEEL, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of SOUTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (E. N. E.) from Naas, and on the road from Dublin to Ballymore-Eustace; containing 797 inhabitants, of whom 168 are in the village. The village comprises 33 houses, and is a constabulary police station; fairs are held in it on May 1st, June 24th, Sept. 29th, and Nov. 2nd. The parish comprises 3435¼ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Rathmore; the rectory is impropriate in Col. Luke Allen, and the tithe rent-charge is £74. 2., two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Blessington. Here are the ruins of a castle.

KILTEELY.—See LISTEELY.

KILTEEVAN, a parish, in the barony of BALLINTOBBER, union and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2 miles (S. E.) from Roscommon, on the road to Lanesborough; containing 2818 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8411 statute acres; is bounded by Lough Ree and the river Shannon on the east; and contains a great quantity of bog. The principal seats are Kilteevan House and Beechwood. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the ecclesiastical union of Roscommon; the rectory is impropriate in the representative of the late Viscount Kingsland, and the tithe rent-charge is £86. 18. 6., of which £48. 18. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Roscommon, and has a chapel.

KILTEEVOCK, or KILTEEVOGE, a parish, in the union of STRANORLAR, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (N. W.) from Stranorlar, and on the river Finn; containing 4864 inhabitants. This parish, which was formed by separating some townlands from Stranorlar, comprises 41,131¾ statute acres; 91 acres are water. The land is of middling quality, and principally in pasture; there is a considerable quantity of reclaimable bog, and some mountain land which is used for grazing. A lead-mine was opened in 1775, but was soon relinquished as unprofitable. Fairs are held at Cloghanbeg on Feb. 1st, May 19th, Aug. 25th, and Nov. 19th, for cattle, yarn, linen, and drugget. The principal seats are, Cloghan Lodge, the property of Sir T. C. Style, Bart.; and Glenmore. A manorial court formerly held here was discontinued in 1831. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Rector of Stranorlar, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £94. 10. The perpetual curate's income consists of £50 late currency from the rector of Stranorlar, £25 from Primate Boulter's fund, and the glebe, valued at £16 per annum. The glebe-house was built in 1799 by a gift of £150 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 30 acres. The church is a plain building. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called Glenfin, at which place is the chapel, a plain building erected in 1835 by subscription. Here is a dispensary.

KILTEGAN, a parish, in the union of BALTINGLASS, partly in the barony of RATHVILLY, county of CARLOW, and partly in the barony of SOUTH BALLINACOR, but chiefly in that of UPPER TALBOTSTOWN, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Hacketstown, on the road to Baltinglass; containing 3969 inhabitants. This parish comprises 15,950¾ statute acres, mostly under an improving system of agriculture; there is a large tract of bog and mountain land. Limestone-gravel is burnt for manure, and granite is abundant. High Park is the residence of the Westby family; the original mansion was burnt by the insurgents in 1798; the demesne, which comprises about 400 statute acres, contains some very fine old timber. Hume Wood, another seat, stands in a demesne of 289 acres. The village contains 36 houses; has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Baltinglass; and is a station of the constabulary police. A patent exists for eight fairs in the year, but none are held.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, episcopally united, in 1804, to the rectory and vicarage of Kilranelagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop by agreement with the crown; the rectory is impropriate in Sir R. Steele, Bart. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £387, of which £255 are payable to the impropriator, and £132 to the vicar; the tithe of the whole union of the incumbent is £277. 7. 8. Adjoining the church is the glebe-house, for the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits, in 1816, gave £400 and lent £370: the glebe comprises 22 acres, for which £2 per acre is paid. The church is a handsome edifice with an embattled tower and spire, erected by a gift of £500 and a loan of £320 from the same Board; it was enlarged in 1826 by a loan of £100 from the Board, and has been repaired by a grant of £191 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Hacketstown, and has a chapel at Kilmoat. In the village is a school supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity; the school-house was built at an expense of £300; about 80 children of both sexes are taught. There is also a national school for males and females; the school-house is in the old chapel-yard. At High Park and Kilmoat are raths; on opening one at the former place, about twelve years since, an urn of coarse pottery was discovered, which contained ashes and bones. There are ancient burial-places on the townlands of Kiltegan and Drim.

KILTENNEL, a parish, in the barony of IDRONE EAST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (N. E. by N.) from Borris, on the road to Enniscorthy; containing 3544 inhabitants. The parish comprises 11,170 statute acres, and is situated in a mountainous district bordering on Mount Leinster, which rises 2610 feet above the level of the sea. The gentlemen's seats are, Mount Leinster, the beautiful and romantic residence of Henry Newton, Esq., a house in the Elizabethan style; and Kilcoltrim, the seat of Edmund Hegarty, Esq. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Cloncurry. The tithe rent-charge is £288. 15., of which £187. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and £101. 5. to the vicar. The church, which is in the village of Killedmond, is a neat building erected in 1840, at a cost of £824, whereof £689 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £135 subscriptions from the landed proprietors and the incumbent; it affords accommodation to 200 persons. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kiltennel forms part of the union of Borris: the chapel is situated at Rahanna. A very handsome parochial school-house has been built by private subscription, on a site presented by Lord Downes; about 120 children are educated in the school. Attached to the chapel are national schools. The ruins of the old church at Kiltennel are covered with ivy; there are also remains of a chapel at its eastern end, which was built in 1789, by Captain E. Byrne. In the parish are likewise the fragments of a granite cross; and a cairn.

KILTENNEL, or COURTOWN, a parish, in the union of GOREY, barony of BALLAGHKEEN, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Gorey, and on the sea-side road from Wexford to Dublin; containing 1279 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Kilbride, is situated on the Irish Channel, and bounded on the south by the Awen-o-varra river; it comprises 4125¾ statute acres, the greater portion under tillage and the remainder good pasture and meadow land. The soil is generally fertile, and the system of agriculture improving. On Tara Hill, of which nearly half is in this parish, are some quarries of building-stone which supply the neighbourhood. Courtown, the elegant seat of the Earl of Courtown, is situated in a retired spot on the banks of the Awen-o-varra, which winds through the richly-wooded demesne; the grounds are tastefully laid out, and from the house is obtained a glance of the sea through a vista in the surrounding plantations. Seafield, held by John Glascott, Esq., from the earl, is situated about a mile and a half to the north of Courtown.

There are several boats belonging to this parish, employed in the Courtown fishery, and great quantities of cod are taken off the coast; but from the uncertainty of the voyage to Dublin, by which the cargo is frequently spoiled before it reaches the market, the value of the fishery is much diminished. To obviate this evil an act was obtained, in 1824, for the construction of a harbour at or near the mouth of the Awen-o-varra river, to be called the Courtown harbour. This work, originally planned and begun by the late A. Nimmo, Esq., was for a time much retarded in its progress, from the shifting nature of the sands off the coast, and from other unforeseen impediments; but these obstacles have been surmounted, and the works, which have been for the last few years under the direction of Francis Giles, Esq., engineer, who has greatly improved the original plan, are now considerably advanced. A lock, 14 feet deep, and capable of admitting vessels of upwards of 100 tons, has been constructed of hewn granite; through which, by a diversion of its course, the river has been brought, supplying a body of water which may be employed in scouring the channel, where there is constantly a depth of eight feet of water. The entrance is between two parallel piers, with flood-gates leading into the basin, which is capable of receiving about 60 vessels of 100 tons, and is also the receptacle of the small Chapel river. The harbour is entered at Lloyd's, and when completed it is intended to introduce well-boats, by which the fish may be kept alive during the voyage. Several good slated houses and other buildings have been erected along the quay, and there is a constabulary police station.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, and in the patronage of the Earl of Courtown; the tithe rent charge is £119. The glebe-house was built at the joint expense of the Earl of Courtown and the late incumbent, the Rev. F. Owen, the latter of whom obtained a charge for his share of the expenditure on his successor; there is a glebe of 26 acres. The church, a small edifice in the later English style, with a square embattled tower, is situated on a well-wooded eminence, and is a conspicuous and interesting feature in the landscape. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Ballygarret. Schools for children of both sexes, with apartments for a master and mistress, who have also an acre of land rent-free, were erected by the Earl of Courtown, and are supported chiefly by his lordship; the schools are under the Church Education Society. The Hon. T. Stopford, D.D., successively rector of this parish, dean of Ferns, and bishop of Cork, bequeathed £300; and Lady Anne Hore, wife of the Rev. T. Hore, of Ham Common, county of Middlesex, bequeathed £100; to the poor of this parish. At Courtown is a chalybeate spring. In a burial-ground called "Prospect," near Seafield, are the vaults of the Courtown and Hore families, with monuments to Mary, Countess of James George, third earl of Courtown, who died April 14th, 1823; and Anne, wife of W. Hore, Esq., who died April 4th, 1808. In the demesne of Courtown is a small and very ancient burial-ground.

KILTERNAN, a parish, in the union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 6¾ miles (S. by E.) from Dublin, on the road to Enniskerry; containing 1019 inhabitants. This parish, which joins the county of Wicklow at the remarkable pass called the Scalp, comprises 3165½ statute acres: the land is rocky and mountainous, abounding with heath, and there is a considerable quantity of waste; but the system of agriculture is improving. There is some good bog. The parish abounds with remarkably fine granite, which is quarried for building, flagging, and other uses; great numbers of persons are employed in cutting the stone, which is sent to Dublin. The principal seats are, Springfield, a modern mansion, commanding a view of the two Sugar-Loaf mountains and the adjacent country; Glancullen, finely situated in a handsome demesne, surrounded with interesting scenery; Kingston Lodge, a villa with an Ionic portico, in tastefully disposed grounds; Kilternan House, formerly belonging to the monks of St. Mary's Abbey, Dublin, embracing a prospect of the Hill of Howth and Killiney bay; Kilternan Lodge; Kingston House; Jamestown; and Fountain Hill. Part of the Three Rocks mountain is in this parish, presenting boldly diversified scenery. The mountains at Glancullen abound with grouse. On the road to Enniskerry, and within two miles of that beautiful village, is the Scalp, a deep natural chasm in the mountains, forming a narrow defile with lofty and shelving ramparts on each side, from which large masses of granite of many tons' weight have fallen; masses of detached rock are heaped together above the road in the wildest confusion, apparently arrested in their descent, and threatening every moment to crush the traveller by their fall. On entering the ravine from Dublin, the Great Sugar Loaf mountain appears to close up the egress; but on advancing, the view expands and becomes exceedingly beautiful, embracing the two mountains of that name, Bray Head, and the fine country in the neighbourhood. There are a cotton and a paper-mill, each employing about 40 persons; and a receiving-house for letters has been established at the small village of Golden-Ball, which is partly within the parish.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, united to that of Kilgobbin, and in the patronage of the Archbishop and the Archdeacon, the former having one and the latter two presentations; the rectory is impropriate in Sir Compton Domville, Bart., C. Fitz-Simon, Esq., and Mrs. Anderson. The tithe rent-charge of the vicarial benefice is £140. 18. 10. The glebe-house was built in 1815, by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 14 acres of profitable land. The church, a handsome edifice in the later English style, was erected in 1826, at an expense of £1900, of which £900 were a gift from the Board of First Fruits, £500 from Richard, Viscount Powerscourt, and £500 raised by assessment; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £181 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Sandyford and Glancullen, at which latter place is a neat chapel, with a monastery founded in 1835 on a piece of ground given by Mr. Fitz-Simon. About 150 children are taught in two public schools; one, at Glancullen, is supported by the National Board, and the other, at the Scalp, by subscription. Some remains exist of the ancient parish church, a picturesque ruin of the earliest age; there are several raths, and in the demesne of Kilternan House is a cromlech. The Rev. Father O'Leary composed part of his works while on a visit with the Fitz-Simon family, at Glancullen, in this parish.

KILTESKILL, a parish, partly in the barony of Loughrea, but chiefly in that of Leitrim, union of Loughrea, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 2 miles (S. E.) from Loughrea, on the road to Woodford; containing 802 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south by the Slievebaughta mountains, and comprises 4695¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Loughrea; the rectory is partly appropriate to the bishopric, and partly to the corps of the prebend of Kilteskill in the cathedral of Clonfert. The tithe rent-charge is £66. 1., of which £15. 7. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £7. 14. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killeenadeema, and contains a chapel.

KILTESKIN, or Titeskin, a parish, in the union of Midleton, barony of Imokilly, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 2¾ miles (S. by W.) from Cloyne, and near Cork harbour; containing 703 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 1145 statute acres, formed part of the union of Aghada, which was held in commendam by the bishops of Cloyne till the death of Bishop Brinkley, in 1835, when Kilteskin became a separate rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the gift of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £151. 6., and there is a glebe of 9 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Cloyne. Near the ruins of the church is a holy well, much frequented on the 15th of August; adjoining which, is a stone with a rude representation of the Crucifixion.

KILTEYNAN, or Kiltinan, a parish, in the union of Cashel, barony of Middlethird, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2¼ miles (S. E.) from Fethard, on the road to Clonmel; containing 1296 inhabitants. It comprises 5102 statute acres. Kiltinan Castle consists of an ancient circular tower, the walls of which are seven feet thick, and of a residence erected on the old site by the late E. Cooke, Esq.; it stands on a nearly perpendicular limestone rock, 90 feet high, and commands a view of the Waterford mountains. There is a very fine well in the castle, covered by a circular tower, and approached by 90 steps. The river Clashanly runs close to the castle, and at the extremity of the demesne joins the Anner: within the demesne is a copious spring, constantly flowing from a cavern in a limestone rock; also the ruins of the parochial church. The parish is in the diocese of Cashel: the rectory is sequestrated, and vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who pay a stipend to the curate of Fethard for performing the occasional duties; the tithe rent-charge is £240. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Fethard, and has a chapel at Killusty.

KILTHOMAS, a parish, in the union of Gort, partly in the barony of Kiltartan, but chiefly in that of Loughrea, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 6 miles (N. W.) from Gort, on the road to Loughrea; containing 3278 inhabitants. This parish comprises 11,710 statute acres: the seats are Lime Park and Copard. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh, forming part of the union of Killinane; the rectory is appropriate to the see, and to the prebend of Kinvarra in the cathedral of Kilmacduagh. The tithe rent-charge is £114. 7. 6., of which £25. 17. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £13. 10. to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish, which is also called Peterswell, from a holy well which is much visited, is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has a handsome chapel, built in 1836 at an expense of £700, on a site given by Blake Foster, Esq., and towards the erection of which R. Gregory, Esq., gave £30. The old chapel is now used as a school-house.

KILTIGAN, a parish, in the union of CLONMEL, barony of IFFA and OFFA EAST, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, ¾ of a mile (N.W.) from Clonmel, on the road to Cahir; containing 283 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1069 statute acres: the lands, which are principally arable, are generally in the occupation of experienced farmers, and consequently under an improved system of cultivation. Limestone is quarried, chiefly for burning; and there are indications of coal, in sinking for which some wavelite was discovered, of which beautiful specimens were procured. The principal seats are Heywood, Glenconnor, Summerville, and Summer-Hill. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Donoughmore in the cathedral of Lismore; the tithe rent-charge is £70. 5. 6. The church is an ancient structure in a very dilapidated state.

KILTOGEGAN.—See GAULSKILL.

KILTOGHART, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony and county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing, with part of the post-town of Carrick-on-Shannon, and the villages of Drumshambo, Leitrim, and Jamestown (which are separately described), 17,581 inhabitants, of whom 484 are in the village of Kiltoghart. It comprises 30,494¾ statute acres: the land is chiefly under tillage, and there is much bog and mountain, with quarries of freestone and limestone. Part of the mountain Slieve-an-irin, and several small lakes, are in this parish; in which likewise rise the hills of Sheemore, said to contain caves of considerable depth. The principal seats are Jamestown Lodge, Port, Lismore Lodge, Caldra Lodge, Castlecarrow, Newbrook, and Keon Brook. At Drumhearny, extensive plantations have been laid out by P. Latouche, Esq. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh; and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £450. 15. The glebe-house was erected by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1050 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1819, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £174 for its repair: the glebe comprises 279 acres. There is a church at Carrick-on-Shannon, and one at Drumshambo. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms two districts; one called Kiltoghart and Gowel, which has chapels at Carrick-on-Shannon, Jamestown, and Gowel; the other called Kiltoghart-Murhane, which has a chapel at Murhane. There are a Primitive and a Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house at Carrick-on-Shannon, and a Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house at Drumshambo. To one of the numerous schools Mr. Latouche allows a house and three acres of land, besides subscribing £15 annually; and to another the Earl of Besborough subscribes £5. 5. At Port are the remains of a monastery, which was converted into a castle to command the ford across the Shannon.

KILTONANLEA, or DOONASS, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, barony of LOWER TULLA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Killaloe; on the road to Limerick, and on the river Shannon; containing 4016 inhabitants. It comprises 7627½ statute acres, mostly in tillage. Limestone, in which marine shells are found imbedded, is quarried near Clonlara, and chiefly burnt for manure. there is some bog. A branch of the Shannon navigation, about four miles in length, passes through this parish, to avoid the falls of Doonass between Limerick and Killaloe, and affords a daily communication by steam and other boats with those places. At Doonass are extensive bleaching establishments; at Clonlara are a public dispensary, and a station of the constabulary police. Petty-sessions are held weekly on Friday at the latter place, where, also, a manorial court is occasionally held for the recovery of small debts; and efforts have been recently made to re-establish the fairs usually held on March 17th, June 11th, and Sept. 21st and 29th, each continuing for two days. The seats are, Doonass House, the residence of Sir Hugh Dillon Massy, Bart., beautifully situated on the Shannon; Summer Hill; Water Park; Erina House; Erina; Rosehill; Elm Hill; Bellisle; Landscape; Springfield; Parkview; Newtown; Mount Catherine; Runnard; and Doonass glebe.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, episcopally united from time immemorial to the vicarage of Killokennedy, together forming the union of Kiltonanlea, or Doonass, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £256. 3., and the entire tithe of the benefice £333. 19. The glebe-house was erected in 1804, when £597 were lent and £200 given by the late Board of First Fruits for that purpose; the glebe comprises 6 acres. The church, at Clonlara, is a neat building, erected in 1782, with a square tower surmounted by pinnacles; for the erection of the tower and gallery the same Board granted £300, in 1829. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Doonass, which also comprises parts of the parishes of Killaloe and Killokennedy: the parochial chapel at Clonlara, erected in 1815, is a large and well-built structure; and there is a chapel at Trogh, in the parish of Killaloe. Within the limits of the parish are the ruined castles of Rhinnuagh, Newtown, and Coolistigue; and several ancient raths or forts. The "Falls of Doonass," on the Shannon, as seen from Doonass demesne, have a striking and highly picturesque effect: the river, which above the falls is 300 yards wide and 40 feet deep, here pours its vast volume of water over large masses of rock extending upwards of a quarter of a mile along its course, and producing a succession of falls forming a grand and interesting spectacle.

KILTOOM, or KILTOMB, a parish, in the union and barony of ATHLONE, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (N. W.) from Athlone, on the road to Roscommon; containing 4150 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on Lough Ree, comprises 13,246 statute acres: the soil is light but fertile, and the lands are generally in a profitable state of cultivation; the system of agriculture is improved, and there is a moderate portion of bog. The scenery is pleasingly diversified. The principal seats are, Hodson's-Bay, situated on the shore of Lough Ree, in tastefully disposed grounds commanding a fine view of the lake and the river Shannon; Grove; New Park, a handsome residence pleasantly situated; and Rockhill. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, united by act of council, in 1784, to the vicarage of Camma, together forming the union of Kiltoom, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Incorporated Society. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £116. 5., of which £48. 15. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar; the gross tithe of the benefice of the vicar is £150. The glebe-house, built in 1790, by the then incumbent, is situated about a mile from the church; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The old church was built in 1785, by a gift of £390 from the Board of First Fruits; a new church has lately been erected, the funds for which were chiefly supplied by Sir Frederick Trench. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; a spacious chapel has been built.

KILTOOMY, or KILTORNEY, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 9½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Listowel, and on the river Brick; containing 2043 inhabitants. It comprises 5866 statute acres, of which about one-half consists of arable land, and the remainder of marshy land and bog. Limestone-gravel is found near Kiltoomy, and used for manure. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Cork, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilflyn: the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £90, is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kiltoomy forms part of the district of Lixnaw. The ruins of the church still exist: it was the cemetery of the Fitzmaurices prior to the erection of the mausoleum near Lixnaw on the death of John, the third earl of Kerry. Near Shanavally is a chalybeate spring.

KILTORA, or KILTURRAGH, a parish, in the union of BOYLE, partly in the barony of COSTELLO, county of MAYO, but chiefly in that of CORRAN, county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Ballymote, on the road to Castlebar; containing 2613 inhabitants. This parish comprises 6883 statute acres: the land is principally under a gradually improving system of tillage. A large quantity of waste land has been brought into cultivation, but there is still a considerable extent of bog. Doo Castle occupies the site of an ancient fortress, of which there are still some remains near the present house. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Emlyfadd; the rectory is impropriate in Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart., and the tithe rent-charge is £172. 5., of which £82. 1. are payable to the lessee of the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Buninaden. There are numerous Danish raths in the parish; and about three miles westward from Colloony are the remains of Meemlough Castle, built by T. B. O'Hara; the walls are still entire, and are perforated by flights of steps.

KILTORAGHT, a parish, in the union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (W.) from Curofin, and on the road from Kilfenora to Ennis; containing 1074 inhabitants. In the civil divisions it is not known as a parish, having merged into that of Kilfenora: it comprises 3091¾ statute acres, a large portion of which consists of mountain pasture and bog. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilfenora: the rectory forms part of the union and corps of the deanery; the vicarage was episcopally united, in 1795, to that of Clouney, together constituting the union of Kiltoraght, in the gift of the Bishop. Of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £67. 10., two-thirds are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar, who receives £40 from Clouney, and whose income has been augmented by a grant of £63 from Primate Boulter's fund. The church, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £800 in 1813, having been injured during the late disturbances, is now in a dilapidated state; divine service is performed at the glebe-house, for the erection of which the same Board gave £450, and lent £62, in 1814. The glebe of the union consists of nine acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilfenora: a chapel has been erected at Inchioveagh, on the new line of road to Ennistymon. There are some remains of a castle at Inchioveagh.—See CLOUNEY.

KILTORKIN, an ancient parish, in the barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER; containing about 176 inhabitants. This parish comprises 1012 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, forming part of the union of Knocktopher; the tithe rent-charge is £33. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballyhale.

KILTORMER, a parish, in the union of BALLINASLOE, barony of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3¼ miles (N. W.) from Eyrecourt, on the road to Loughrea; containing 2089 inhabitants. It comprises 6898 statute acres; a considerable quantity is reclaimable bog. Here are a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Ballinasloe, and a constabulary police station. The principal seats are, Eyreville, an elegant mansion in the Italian style of architecture; Bellevue; Mount Pleasant; Skycur; Ballydonagh; and Chilhame. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, episcopally united in 1813 to the rectories and vicarages of Killoran and Abbeygormagan, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is appropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £76. 3., of which £31. 3. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £20. 15. 6. to the dean, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the entire benefice of the vicar is £150. 14. The glebe-house was erected in 1817 by a gift of £400 and a loan of £200 from the late Board of First Fruits; there is a glebe of two acres in the parish of Killoran, and one of 12 acres in Kiltormer, on which is the glebe-house. The church, in the village of Kiltormer-Kelly, was built in 1814 on a site given by T. Stratford Eyre, Esq., by a gift of £600 and a loan of £200 from the Board, and has been repaired by a grant of £109 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; it is a neat edifice with a square tower, inclosed in a planted area. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also part of Clonfert, and has a chapel at Kiltormer-Kelly. The parochial school, in which 50 children are educated, is aided by a donation of £6 annually from the incumbent; and there is a national school, for which J. Prendergast, Esq., gave the site and £50 towards its erection. At Ballydough, on the south side of the road, are the foundations of a large castle. A holy well is much resorted to on the last Sunday in July.

KILTORMER-KELLY, a village, in the parish of KILTORMER, union of BALLINASLOE, barony of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Ballinasloe; containing 245 inhabitants. This is a rising village, in a well cultivated district, within 5 miles of the Grand Canal; and has cattle-fairs on the 17th of Feb., May, Aug., and November. A fine quarry of black marble has been discovered in the vicinity. Here are the parish church, Roman Catholic chapel, and national school. It is or was the estate of Charles Kelly, a friar, whose ancestors founded Kilconnell Abbey and some others in this county.

KILTORNEY.—See KILTOOMY.

KILTRELLIG, a village, in the parish of KILBALLYOWEN, union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing 304 inhabitants.

KILTRISK, a parish, in the union of GOREY, partly in the barony of BALLAGHKEEN, but chiefly in the barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 6½ miles (S.) from Gorey; on the river Awen-o-varra, and two miles from the eastern coast; containing 757 inhabitants. This parish comprises 3284¾ statute acres, chiefly under tillage. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Leskinfere and of the corps of the treasurership of Ferns cathedral: the tithe rent-charge is £94. 10., out of which £20 are paid to the perpetual curate of Donaghmore. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ballygarret.

KILTRUSTAN, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 2¾ miles (N. N. W.) from Strokestown, on the road to Elphin; containing 3938 inhabitants. It comprises 6339 statute acres, principally under an improving system of tillage. There is a large quantity of bog, with quarries of excellent limestone; also limestone-gravel and marl, and on the lands of Tubberpatrick some very fine potters'-earth. Lead-ore has been found, but is not worked. The principal seats are Tubberpatrick, Clooeen, and Cretta Cottage. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Elphin, forming part of the union of Bumlin; the rectory forms part of the corps of the prebend of Kilgoghlin. The tithe rent-charge is £234. 7. 6., of which £156. 5. are payable to the vicar, and the remainder to the prebendary. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Strokestown, and has a chapel. Here are the remains of a monastery, the burial-ground of which is still much used; also of a castle which belonged to O'Connor Roe; and a well, dedicated to St. Patrick.

KILTUBRID, a parish, in the union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony and county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 miles (N. E.) from Carrick-on-Shannon, on the road to Ballinamore; containing 7228 inhabitants. It comprises 15,603 statute acres, including 60 of woodland and 2429 of bog and mountain: the land is chiefly under spade husbandry. On the northern side of Slieve-an-irin, which rises 1922 feet above the sea, iron-ore is found in the beds of streams, and limestone on their banks; and on the south and west sides are indications of rich beds of that metal. Thick strata of it are also visible in the beds of Barnameena and the neighbouring cataracts. Under the south and west brow of Slieve-an-irin is a stratum of coal; and large and deep beds of pipe-clay and yellow ochre are found in the channels of several of the mountain streams, particularly about Aughacashel, intermingled with flinty gravel or silicious sand. Near the top of the mountain at Aughacashel is a large mass of heavy, smooth, pea-green viscous earth, intermixed with sparkling yellow sand; there is likewise a great quantity about two miles north-westward. Freestone is abundant; and here are some sulphureous springs. Remains of disused furnaces are visible near the mountain, and under its brow is a deep cavity, in which the waters disappear, emerging about a mile to the west of its base. The parish contains several lakes; one is much resorted to from a belief that the water will cure the erysipelas. The principal seats are Loughscur, Annadale, Drincy, Laheen, and Aughacashel, near which last coal is partially worked by the peasantry.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ardagh, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £186. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £250, and a loan of £530, from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1825: the glebe comprises 470 acres, about one-fourth of which is unprofitable land. The church is a plain building, erected by aid of a gift of £440 from the same Board in 1788, and recently repaired by a grant of £168 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic parish is coextensive with that of the Established Church, and is sometimes called Cashcarrigan; there is a chapel on the townland of Rosgarbon. On an island in Lough Scur are the remains of Castle John, which was built by John Reynolds in the reign of Elizabeth, and frequently attacked by the O'Rourkes; on another island are the ruins of a square fortress which was used for a prison by the Reynolds family. In Loughscur demesne is a cromlech called by the peasantry Leaba Dearmud i Graine, or "Darby and Graine's Bed or Altar." There are some remains of an old church, with a burial-ground attached.

KILTULLAGH, a parish, in the union of LOUGHREA, partly in the barony of KILCONNELL, but chiefly in that of ATHENRY, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Athenry, on the road to Loughrea; containing 3244 inhabitants. A cell of the third order of Franciscans was founded here prior to the year 1441. The parish comprises 8948 statute acres, and is moderately well cultivated. Kiltullagh House is the seat of J. D'Arcy, Esq., in whose demesne is a fine chalybeate spring. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Kilconickny; the rectory is appropriate to the bishopric, deanery, and archdeaconry of Clonfert, and to the vicarage. The tithe rent-charge is £153. 8., of which £17. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £3. 9. to the dean, £24. 4. 8. to the archdeacon, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kiltullagh is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kiltullagh and Killimordaly, in each of which is a chapel. There is a Dominican convent at Esker, consisting of seven friars; it is pleasantly situated, and the chapel has a handsome spire. Connected with it is a school of about 600 children, 50 of whom are clothed, and many of them fed.

KILTULLAGH, a parish, in the union and barony of CASTLEREA, county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5¼ miles (W. by S.) from Castlerea; on the road to Tuam; containing 7664 inhabitants. A monastery for Franciscan friars of the order de Pœnitentiâ was erected here soon after the year 1441. The parish comprises 24,713 statute acres: about one-quarter is bog; the remainder is arable and pasture land, with about 30 acres of plantation, principally at Coshla. There is much limestone and sandstone; and the valleys abound with iron-ore, which was formerly smelted, as is evident from the existence of an old furnace. Here is an excellent chalybeate spring. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, united by act of parliament, in 1711, to the rectories and vicarages of Aghavower, Annagh, Becan, Knock, and Templetogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £170. 10., and of the whole benefice £581. 11. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 3*a.* 26*p.* The church is a neat building, erected about 1826 by a loan of £700 from the Board of First Fruits. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has chapels at Garraulahan and Cloonfad. There are two public schools, to one of which the rector subscribes £5, and W. R. Wills, Esq., £4, annually; the latter gentleman has erected an excellent school with rooms for the master and mistress, and also gives £10 annually for clothing the children. Mrs. Wills subscribes £4 to the other school. An extensive loan fund, which issues about £70 weekly, has been established by the rector.

KILTURK, a parish, in the barony of BARGY, union and county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 9 miles (S. by W.) from Wexford, on the road to Kilmore; containing 912 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the western extremity of the lake of Tacumshane, and extends to the sea, by which it is bounded on the south. It comprises 2206¾ statute acres, chiefly under tillage: the system of agriculture is in that improved state which generally prevails in this part of the country; sea-weed, which is found in abundance, is the principal manure. The chief seats are Ballyhealy, Woodville, and Sweetbriar Lodge. The lake is frequented by numbers of wild-ducks and other wild-fowl. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ferns, forming part of the union of Tomhaggard; the rectory is impropriate in Lord Robert Tottenham, and the tithe rent-charge is £141. 11., of which £81. 1. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a neat edifice, built in 1806 by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; it had originally a tower, which fell down soon after its erection. The glebe consists of 15¾ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilturk is part of the district of Kilmore. There are some remains of a castle originally of considerable extent, now consisting only of portions of two of the towers; the mound by which it was surrounded was levelled about 40 years since, and is now under cultivation.

KILTURRAGH.—See KILTORA.

KILTYCLOGHER, or SARAHVILLE, a village, in the parish of CLONCLARE, union of MANOR-HAMILTON, barony of DROMAHAIRE, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing 244 inhabitants. This village, which consists of about 70 houses, was recently built by C. H. Tottenham, Esq., under the north-eastern range of the Glenfarne mountains. A market is held every Friday, in a good market-house, and is well attended, there being no other within seven miles: fairs are held on the 14th of every month. Here are a constabulary police station, and a Roman Catholic chapel lately erected.

KILVARNET, a parish, in the barony of LENEY, union and county of SLIGO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Ballymote, and on the mountain road from Sligo to Ballina; containing 2352 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Owenmore, comprises 6696 statute acres. The surface is mountainous, and agriculture is in a backward state, but a considerable tract of mountain is gradually being reclaimed; there is a moderate quantity of bog, but little more than what is requisite for fuel. Limestone is quarried both for building and agricultural purposes. The principal seats are, Temple House, that of the Perceval family, a modern mansion, on the border of a fine lake, and in an extensive and well-planted demesne, in which the ruins of the ancient house of Knights Templars from which it takes its name form an interesting object on the margin of the lake; Annachmore, a handsome residence, delightfully situated in an ample demesne enlivened by the windings of the river Owenmore (over which is a bridge) and commanding, from the summit of Cloyn Hill, a view of the course of the river, the distant hills of Knocknaree and Benbulben, the Ox mountains, and the picturesque hills of Knocknashee and Knockmuckleta, with much of the country in the neighbourhood; and Summerton. The linen manufacture is carried on by individuals to a small extent, and there is a bleach-green at Ballinacarrow, where fairs are held on May 19th, June 16th, Oct. 14th, and Dec. 14th, for cattle, pigs, and yarn; fairs are also held at Temple-house. Petty-sessions are held at Coolany, where a sub-post has been established. Kilvarnet is a vicarage, in the diocese of Achonry, forming part of the union of Killoran; the rectory is appropriate to the deanery, and the tithe rent-charge is £57. 9., of which £26. 6. are payable to the dean of Achonry, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Collooney; the chapel is at Ballinacarrow. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The preceptory for Knights Templars, anciently called Druimabradh and subsequently Teachtemple, was founded in the reign of Henry III., and on the suppression of that order was given by Edward II. to the Knights Hospitallers. There are some ruins of the churches of Killoran and Kilvarnet.

KILVECONTY.—See KILBEACONTY.

KILVEMNON, or KILMANANIFF, a parish, in the union of CALLAN, barony of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Callan, on the road to Fethard; containing 4983 inhabitants. It comprises 10,551 statute acres, of which about 1600 are bog; and includes within its limits part of the lofty mountain of Slieve-na-Man. About four-fifths of the land not bog are arable, the remainder pasture; it is moderately productive, but in many parts is low and wet: the surface is ornamented with some plantations and hedgerows. The river Anner has a subterraneous course here for about a quarter of a mile, and works the Compsey Mill. The principal seats are, Killaghy Castle, which was the residence of Baron Tobin, and was taken by Cromwell, who gave it to a Colonel Green, from whom it has descended to its present proprietor; Gurteen; and Ballylanigan. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the gift of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £506. 10. The glebe-house was built in 1781, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of six acres. The former church was a plain structure, erected by parochial assessment in 1772; a new church has been erected at a cost of £446, of which £396 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is called Mullinahone, where there is a chapel.

KILVINE, a parish, in the union of Ballinrobe, barony of Clanmorris, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Dunmore, on the road to Ballinrobe; containing 2236 inhabitants, of whom 260 are in the village. The parish comprises 5426 statute acres, principally under tillage, and contains a great quantity of bog and some waste land. The seats are Cartown, Killan, Rockfort, and Oldtown Cottage. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £87. 4. 7., now payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballindangan.

KILVOLANE, a parish, in the union of Nenagh, barony of Owney and Arra, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, on the road from Thurles to Limerick; containing, with the post-town of Newport (which is separately described), 4254 inhabitants. It comprises 8679 statute acres. There were formerly large tracts of waste land, which, from the facility of procuring lime, have been partly reclaimed and are rapidly coming into cultivation. The system of agriculture is improved; there are tracts of valuable bog, and several quarries of excellent limestone, which is burnt for manure. Gritstone of good quality for building is also extensively quarried; and copper-mines of good ore were formerly worked with success; they were discontinued for a time, but have been again worked for some years past by Lord Stradbroke. The scenery is finely diversified; the river Clare intersects the parish, affording advantageous sites for mills, and on the south-eastern side forms a boundary between the counties of Tipperary and Limerick. Clare Glen, which is beautifully picturesque, has been planted. The principal seats are, Barna and Mount Philips, the demesnes of which are richly embellished with stately oaks; Ballymakeogh; Mount Rivers; Bloomfield; Fox Hall; Clonsingle; Derryleagh; and Prospect. A corn-mill and a tuck-mill have been erected on the river Clare, near Newport. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, forming part of the union of Kilnerath, or St. John's Newport; the tithe rent-charge is £346. 3. The church, towards the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £530, is a neat edifice, situated at Newport. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Newport, in which town is the chapel. The parochial school is endowed with 20 acres of land, and is aided by subscriptions; there are two national and four private schools. Some remains exist of the ancient parochial church, at Ballymakeogh; the cemetery around it is still used as a burial-ground.

KILWATERMOY, a parish, in the union of Lismore, barony of Coshbride, county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 2 miles (S. E.) from Tallow, and on the river Blackwater; containing 2400 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6557 statute acres; the surface is in general mountainous. The principal seats are Moor Hill, Sapperton, and Headborough; these are handsome seats surrounded by plantations and ornamented with the river Bride, over which is a wooden bridge. Here is also Janeville. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Tallow; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire, and the tithe rent-charge is £199. 8., two-thirds payable to the impropriator and one-third to the vicar. A handsome church was erected about 1831, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Knockamore, and contains a chapel. Near the site of the old church is a natural cavern.

KILWAUGHTER, a parish, in the union of Larne, barony of Upper Glenarm, county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, 1 mile (W. S. W.) from Larne, on the road to Ballymena; containing 2164 inhabitants. This parish comprises 9803½ statute acres, of which 11½ are under water; about one-third is arable, and a very large portion mountain and waste land, particularly Agnew Hill, which has an elevation of 1558 feet above the level of the sea. The lands near Kilwaughter Castle are in a high state of cultivation; there is some bog, and limestone and basalt are abundant. The castle, the elegant mansion of the Agnew family, proprietors of nine-tenths of the parish, is situated within a beautiful and extensive demesne: in the plantation above the house is a place called Dhu Hole, a fissure in the limestone rock, into which falls a river that is no where seen again till it enters Lough Larne. There are extensive cotton and spinning mills in the parish, that employ nearly 1000 persons; linen-cloth is woven in some parts. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, forming part of the union and corps of the prebend of Carncastle in the cathedral of Connor. A perpetual curacy was lately instituted, called the curacy of Carncastle and Kilwaughter, which is endowed with a portion of the tithe rent-charge of the latter parish, amounting to £45. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommend, that on the next avoidance the united parishes and rectories of Kilwaughter and Carncastle become a distinct benefice, the perpetual curacy to be absorbed therein. The church is at Carncastle; the glebe (in this parish), as also the glebe-house, was purchased by the late Board of First Fruits, in 1813. There is a small Roman Catholic chapel at Craiganorn. £50 Irish were bequeathed to the poor of the parish by Mr. H. Crawford, and are now under charge of the Board of Charitable Bequests. Some slight remains exist of the old church, in the castle demesne.

KILWEILAGH, or Killoulagh, also called Killeveilagh, a parish, in the union of Mullingar, barony of Delvin, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 2 miles (S. W.) from Castletown-Delvin, on the road to Mullingar; containing 1229 inhabitants. This parish comprises 8145¼ statute acres, principally in pasture; and contains abundance of limestone and limestone-gravel. It is watered by the river Deel, with which several small lakes are connected on its northern side; and on the eastern is a large tract of bog. Contiguous to this is Bracklyn Castle, a fine seat and demesne. Here are also the seats of Rockview, Dysart, and Gigginstown. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Kilcumney; the rectory is impropriate in N. Ogle, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £114. 4. 8., of which £86. 10. 9. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kilwellagh is part of the district of Castletown-Delvin, and contains a chapel. There are many raths, containing very large human bones.

KILWHELAN, or KILPHELAN, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (S.) from Mitchelstown, near the road to Kilworth; containing 201 inhabitants, and comprising 524 statute acres. For all ecclesiastical purposes it has merged into the parish of Brigown. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, entirely impropriate in William Norcott, Esq. In the Roman Catholic divisions it forms part of the district of Mitchelstown.

KILWORTH, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 20 miles (N. N. E.) from Cork, and 106 (S. W.) from Dublin, on the coach-road from Cork to Dublin; containing 3246 inhabitants, of whom 1772 are in the town. This place was the scene of some battles in the war of 1641 and during the usurpation of Cromwell, by whom the manor was given to Fleetwood, whose name it still bears. In July, 1642, the castle of Cloghlea, near the town, said to have been built by the family of the Condons, and at that time the property of Sir Richard Fleetwood, was taken by Lord Barrymore and the custody of it entrusted to Sir Arthur Hyde, from whom it was afterwards taken by a descendant of the original founder, who surprised the garrison and either put them to death or detained them prisoners. The TOWN is situated on the Funcheon, over which is a neat stone bridge of six arches, about a mile above its confluence with the Blackwater: it consists principally of one long irregular street, containing 284 houses, several of which are well built and of handsome appearance; and is sheltered by a low mountain ridge, which rises immediately behind it. There are several mills on the river, the principal of which are the Maryville flour-mills, generally employing from 20 to 30 men, and producing annually about 12,000 barrels of flour; there is a flax-mill belonging to Dr. Collet, and adjoining the town is a mill for oatmeal. The market is on Friday, but since the rise of the town of Fermoy, only 2 miles distant, it has been gradually declining; the fairs are on Jan. 25th, Easter-Tuesday, Corpus Christi day, Sept. 11th, Nov. 21st, and Dec. 10th. The market-house is a neat building near the church; there is a constabulary police station, and a manorial court is held every three weeks for the recovery of debts under 40*s.* late currency, with jurisdiction over this parish and parts of the parishes of Kilcrumper and Macrony.

The parish comprises 6521 statute acres: the soil is generally good; about one-half of the land is under tillage, and the remainder in pasture. The system of agriculture has been much improved, and is still advancing; there is little waste land except reclaimable mountain. There is no bog; consequently fuel is scarce. Limestone of good quality abounds, and is quarried chiefly for agricultural purposes. Moore Park, the seat of the Earl of Mountcashel, is a noble and spacious mansion, on the right bank of the Funcheon, which flows through a richly wooded demesne of 800 acres, comprehending much beautiful and interesting scenery. Within the grounds is Cloghlea Castle, a lofty square tower rounded at the angles, and situated on the highest ground on the bank of the river, commanding one of its most important passes. The other seats are, Maryville, a handsome mansion of recent erection and finely situated on the Funcheon; Woodview, a neat modern residence; and Rushmount.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, episcopally united to the vicarages of Kilcrumper, Macrony, and Leitrim, by act of council, in 1692, together constituting the union of Kilworth, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in W. Charters, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £255, one-half payable to the impropriator and the other to the vicar; the vicarial tithe of the whole union is £63*7*. 10. The glebe-house, situated in the parish of Kilcrumper, was erected in 1821, by the incumbent, assisted by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1300 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1820; attached to it are 34 acres of glebe, and there are 10 more acres in the union. The church, an old structure, has been thoroughly repaired by a grant of £371 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which, with the exception of part of the parish of Kilcrumper, attached to the district of Fermoy, is co-extensive with the union of the Established Church: the parochial chapel, at Kilworth, is a neat and spacious edifice; and there is a chapel at Coolmahon, in the parish of Macrony. The parochial school is supported by the interest of a bequest of £500 by the Rev. Dr. Moore, a late incumbent, and an annual donation from the vicar: the school-house, a neat building, has 2 acres of land rent-free attached to it. Another school is chiefly supported by Lady Mountcashel, who also patronises a Sunday school; and there is a large national school-house, erected in the Roman Catholic chapel-yard in 1833. A dispensary and fever hospital have been opened for the poor. In that part of the demesne of Moore Park called the Castle field, numerous copper and silver coins, and some human skeletons, have been found. There are several ancient raths in the parish, under some of which appear to be chambers. Kilworth gives the inferior title of Baron to the family of Moore, earls of Mountcashel.

KINATEVDILLA, an island, in the parish of KILGAVOWER, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT. It is situated in Clew bay, and comprises 6½ statute acres.

KINAWLEY, a parish, in the union of ENNISKILLEN, partly in the barony of TULLAGHAGH, county of CAVAN, partly in that of GLENAWLEY, but chiefly in that of KNOCKNINNY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Ballyconnell, on the road to Enniskillen; containing, with the post-town of Swalinbar, which is separately described, 16,855 inhabitants. It comprises 51,004 statute acres, of which 15,346½ are in the county of Cavan, and, including islands, 35,657½ in the county of Fermanagh; of the latter number, 2895 acres are in Upper Lough Erne, and 645¼ in small loughs. Agriculture is in a good state; there is a considerable quantity of bog, and limestone and freestone are abundant. Cuilcagh mountain, which is 2188 feet high, is in the Cavan part of the parish. The river Shannon rises at the base of this mountain, from a deep circular gulph, 20 feet in diameter; and there is another deep gulph about three-quarters of a mile from this, in which the flowing of water may be heard. The elevation of the source of the Shannon above Lough Allen is 115 feet, and above the sea 275 feet. Petty-sessions are held every fortnight at Derrilin, where, also, fairs are held on May 27th and Oct. 27th. The principal seats are Mount Prospect, Dresternan, Prospect Hill, and Cloghan. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £276. 18. 6. The glebe-house was erected in 1824, by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises 302 acres. There is a church at Derrilin, and one at Swalinbar, which latter is in a ruinous state. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms two districts; Kinawley, in which are chapels at Kinawley and Swalinbar; and Knockninny, in which are chapels at Knockninny, Glassmullen, and Drumderrig.

KINCON, a village, in the parish of KILFYAN, union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT; containing 23 houses, and 125 inhabitants.

KINEAGH, a parish, in the union of BALTINGLASS, partly in the barony of RATHVILLY, county of CARLOW, but chiefly in that of KILKEA and MOONE, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Baltinglass, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford; containing 1580 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6298¼ statute acres. Agriculture is improving; and there is fine granite for building. The principal seats are Bettyfield, Rickettstown, and Philipstown. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, and in the patronage of the Vicars-Choral of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin; the rectory is partly appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the vicars-choral of St. Patrick's, and partly impropriate in the Duke of Leinster, H. Cumming, Esq., and J. D. Duckett, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £250. 11. 6., of which £86. 1. are payable to the vicar; there is a glebe-house, and the glebe comprises 18*a.* 3*r.* 24*p.* A neat church was built in 1832, by a grant of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is partly in the district of Castledermot, in the diocese of Dublin, and partly in that of Rathvilly, in the diocese of Kildare and Leighlin. Here are the ruins of the old church, and of an abbey.

KING'S COUNTY, an inland county of the province of LEINSTER, bounded on the east by the county of Kildare; on the north by that of Westmeath, and a small portion of Meath; on the west by those of Tipperary, Galway, and Roscommon, from the two latter of which it is separated by the Shannon; and on the south by the Queen's county and Tipperary. It extends from 52° 48′ to 53° 24′ (N. Lat.), and from 7° 0′ to 8° 0′ (W. Lon.); comprising an area of 493,985 statute acres, whereof 337,256 are arable land, 145,836 uncultivated, 8258 plantation, 902 under towns and villages, and 1733 under water. The population, in 1821, amounted to 131,088; in 1831, to 144,225; and in 1841, to 146,857.

This part of the island, owing to its inland situation, is not noticed by Ptolemy; recourse must therefore be had to the early native writers as the only source whence to ascertain its former state. From these it has been concluded that, at a very remote period, the county formed part of the territory denominated Hy Falgia, which comprised also Meath, Westmeath, Dublin, and Kildare. It was likewise included, together with the Queen's county, Dublin, and Kildare, under the denomination of Hy Laoighois, the chieftain of which resided at Dunamase, in the Queen's county. Afterwards, the county, or, as some say, the southern part of it only, was included in the district of Eile, or Hy Leigh, comprehending also the western part of the Queen's county, and the northern part of Tipperary. That district was subsequently divided into three principalities, each under its own chieftain; one of which, forming the southern portion of the King's county, and lying westward of the Slieve-Bloom mountains, obtained the name of Eile in Chearbhuil, or "the plain near the rock," afterwards corrupted into Ely O'Carroll. The chiefs of Ely O'Carroll were called O'Carroll; and under them was a subordinate dynast named O'Delany, who ruled over a district in the south, denominated Dal-leagh-nui, or "the district of the flat country." These two districts, with the more northern parts of the present King's county, occupied by the Mac Coghlans, O'Molloys, and O'Conors, were afterwards united into one kingdom, under the title of the ancient kingdom of Hy Falgia, or Offallia; which comprehended also a part of the county of Kildare, and the lands of the O'Dempsies and O'Duins, in the Queen's county. It retained this title for several centuries after the landing of the English, and included a smaller territory called Hy Bressail.

So early as 1170, the ENGLISH power was extended into this part of Ireland, though not with permanent vigour. Thus, the lands of Cryngidubh were deemed in all matters of English jurisdiction to form part of Meath; the manor of Geashill, held by the Fitzgeralds, was esteemed part of the county of Kildare; and from the Black Book of the Exchequer, and divers pipe-rolls, it appears that the whole of Offallia was charged with twelve knights' fees to the king as part of the county of Kildare. But as the English power declined, its laws and customs were disregarded; and under the name of West Clonmalugra or Glenmalire, this district was for successive centuries one of the most turbulent and hostile to the Anglo-Irish government. Eastern Glenmalire or Glenmaleiry, and Leix, were the names then given to the Queen's county; the Barrow river being the boundary between the two districts. The O'Conors were the commanding sept in Offallia: in the reign of Edward VI., uniting with the O'Mores, of Leix, they spread disorder through the province of Leinster; but the lord-deputy, Sir Anthony St. Leger, aided by a force sent from England under William Bellingham, dispersed them with little difficulty, ravaged their lands, drove their inhabitants into their fastnesses in the bogs and woods, where they were reduced to the last extremities by famine, and secured their subjection by building six castles in their territory. The chiefs themselves submitted, and attended St. Leger into England, where they were thrown into confinement; and their lands, being declared forfeited, were shared among English officers and settlers. The O'Carrolls, occupying the remotest situation, appear to have been the least affected by these disastrous events. The new arrangements were completed in 1548, and procured for Bellingham the honour of knighthood and the government of Ireland. But the old Irish families did not patiently relinquish their claims and possessions; they were indefatigable in their efforts to resist what they deemed an unjust usurpation. Numbers were consequently cut off in the field, or executed by martial law; and the whole race would have been extirpated in the reign of Mary, had not the Earls of Kildare and Ormonde interceded with the queen, and become sureties for the peaceable behaviour of the survivors. By an Irish statute in 1557, Lord Sussex was empowered to grant estates or leases in the districts recovered from the Irish inhabitants. Another, reciting their forfeiture to the crown by rebellion, erected certain lands into the King's and Queen's counties, so named in honour of Philip and Mary; the former comprised Ophaly, and such part of Glenmalire as lay east of the Barrow, and had for its capital the fort of Dingen, formerly the chief seat of the O'Conors, and henceforward called Philipstown. In this division was included a small portion of the county of Kildare, containing the parishes of Harristown and Kilbracken, which until lately, though completely inclosed by Kildare, continued to form part of the King's county. During the entire reign of Elizabeth, the desultory attempts of the natives against the English forces were continued; and the most unscrupulous measures were, on the other hand, exercised against them. In 1599, the Lord-Lieutenant entered the county with a force of 2500 men, and totally defeated the O'Conors; but in the following year they became as troublesome as before: at length, Sir Oliver Lambert was sent thither at the head of 1000 foot and 100 horse, and after raising the siege of Philipstown, which had been closely pressed by the insurgents, he dispersed them so completely that no resistance of any importance was afterwards attempted.

The county extends into each of the two ecclesiastical provinces, being partly in the diocese of Clonfert, partly in that of Ossory, partly in that of Killaloe, but chiefly in those of Meath and Kildare. For purposes of CIVIL jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Ballyboy, Ballybritt, Ballycowen, Clonlisk, Coolestown, Eglish, Garrycastle, Geashill, Kilcoursey, Lower Philipstown, Upper Philipstown, and Warrenstown. It contains part of the borough and market-town of Portarlington; the market and assize town of Tullamore; the ancient corporate towns of Philipstown and Banagher; the market and post towns of Parsonstown, (formerly Birr,) Clara, Edenderry, and Frankford; and the post-towns of Farbane, Shinrone, Moneygall, Geashill, Cloghan, and Kinnitty. Amongst the largest villages are Ballycumber, Ballingarry (each of which has a sub-post), Shannon-Bridge, Ballyboy, and Shannon-Harbour. The county sent six members to the Irish parliament; two for the county at large, and two for each of the boroughs of Philipstown and Banagher; but since the Union its representation has been confined to the two members for the county at large. The constituency, as registered in 1841, was 1078, of whom 961 were freeholders, and 117 leaseholders: the election takes place at Tullamore. The county is included in the Home Circuit. The assize and general quarter-sessions of the peace are held in Tullamore; quarter-sessions are also held at Birr and Philipstown. The county gaol and court-house are at Tullamore, and there are court-houses and bridewells at Birr and Philipstown: the former bridewell is a modern and well-constructed building; the latter is the old county gaol. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 13 deputy-lieutenants, and 81 other magistrates, besides the usual county officers, including two coroners. There are 45 constabulary police stations, having a force of a county inspector, 5 sub-inspectors, 6 head-constables, 47 constables, and 249 sub-constables, with seven horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £12,504. The county infirmary is at Tullamore; and there are fever hospitals at Shinrone and Parsonstown, and dispensaries at Banagher, Clara, Edenderry, Farbane, Frankford, Geashill, Kinnitty, Leap, Moneygall, Parsonstown, Philipstown, and Shinrone, supported equally by private contributions and grand jury presentments. The lunatic asylum for the county is at Maryborough, in Queen's county. The grand jury presentments for 1844 were £24,324. In the military arrangements the county is included in the Athlone district, and has barracks for infantry at Banagher, Parsonstown, and Shannon-Harbour, and for cavalry at Tullamore and Philipstown; affording, in the whole, accommodation for 68 officers and 1412 men.

The form of the county is very irregular; and until lately it had three isolated portions, which, though considered to be parts of Upper Philipstown, were by situation wholly included within the barony of Ophaly, in the county of Kildare. Its SURFACE is, for the most part, an uninterrupted flat, except where it rises at its south-western extremity into the Slieve-Bloom mountains, which range in a direction from north-east to south-west for twenty miles, forming the boundary between the King's and Queen's counties. Their highest point is called The Height of Ireland; there is but one passage through them, called the Gap of Glandine, which is very difficult of approach, steep and craggy, and but five feet wide. The only other elevations which merit notice are, Crogan Hill, to the north of Philipstown, rising about five hundred feet above the surrounding country, and beautifully clothed with verdure to its summit; and the great Hill of Cloghan, which is the most commanding eminence between the Brosna river and the Slieve-Bloom mountains, and abounds on all sides with numerous and never-failing springs. Lough Pallas, between Tullamore and Ballyboy, is the most remarkable lake in the county; it is of inconsiderable extent, but has the finest tench in Ireland. Lough Annagh partly belongs to this county, as the divisional line between it and the Queen's county is drawn through its centre. It contains about 315 acres, and the greater part is from five to eight feet deep in summer; its bottom is chiefly composed of bog, interspersed with roots of trees, with a bank of gravel and stones in the centre: several small streams flow into it, and its waters are discharged into the Silver river, which flows into the Brosna. Deroin Lough, in the barony of Eglish, comprises about 200 acres.

Lough Boura contains 175 acres, but is so shallow that a man may wade through every part of it in the summer time; its bottom is composed of fine black bog and gravel. Couragh is a small lough in the bog between Frankford and Parsonstown. Although a great part of the county is covered with bog, the climate is said to be as wholesome as in any other part of Ireland.

The general SOIL, in its natural state, is not fertile, and is only rendered so by manures and by attention to a proper course of crops. The quality is, generally, either a deep moor or a gravelly loam; the former very productive in dry summers, the latter most benefited by a moist season. Limestone is the common substratum, yet as a manure it is not used so extensively as it should be. Limestone-gravel, here called corn-gravel, is also abundant, and is in general use as manure, as, without burning or any other preparation, it produces heavy crops. The pastures, though not luxuriant, are excellent for sheep-walks, the flocks producing wool in abundance, and of very fine quality. The unreclaimed moor is highly nutritious to young cattle; but it is observed that where bogs have been reclaimed, although the vegetation is rapid and rather earlier than in the upland, corn crops are generally two or three weeks later in ripening. The best land in the county is on the western side of the Slieve-Bloom mountains, extending from the boundary of the Queen's county through Ballybritt to Parsonstown; but the barony of Clonlisk, in general, is decidedly the most fertile. That of Warrenstown has been much improved by the efforts and example of two enterprising Scotch farmers of the name of Rait: the land in it, though naturally good, requires great attention to draw forth all its capabilities. The beneficial change has been brought about at considerable expense and labour, and the barony is now nearly as productive as the fertile barony of Clonlisk. A part of the Bog of Allen lies within this county, forming, in detached portions, the most remarkable feature of its surface. The mountains have a great variety of soils and substrata, but the larger part of them merely affords a coarse pasture to young cattle in dry seasons; the only portion worthy of especial notice is a tract of fertile land, part of which is grazed all the year by numerous flocks of sheep and young cattle, while part, having a limestone soil, with a stiff clay at the basis of the heights, yields abundant crops of corn.

The farms were formerly very large. It was not uncommon for one person to hold a thousand or fifteen hundred acres; but their size is now much reduced, averaging not more than from 12 to 17 acres; few are so large as 200 acres. Considerable tracts of mountain and bog are reclaimed every year by young men after marriage, who locate themselves in cabins, generally near the bog for the advantage of fuel. Many of the little elevated patches in the Bog of Allen, here called Islands, have been thus brought into cultivation. The chief CROPS are wheat and potatoes, except near the bogs and mountains, where oats are principally grown. Barley and rape are also extensively raised; the latter is found to flourish on the most boggy soil, if properly drained. Turnips, mangel-wurzel, vetches, and clover are every where grown by the gentry and large farmers; but the generality of the small farmers do not venture on the green-crop system, except in the barony of Warrenstown, where a regular rotation crop is general. Red and white clover are found on most farms; the former, with rye-grass, answers on bog-land extremely well, and throughout every part of the country it affords a remarkably early herbage, ripens a month earlier than the natural grasses, and is made into hay with much less trouble. Flax is grown for domestic use in small quantities, in patches or in the corner of a field. On the banks of the rivers are extensive marshy meadows, called callows, which are mostly inundated in winter, but afford a valuable pasture in summer. In the district between Birr and Roscrea they are very extensive, and yield great quantities of hay of very superior quality; the hay from the callows on the Shannon is not so good. Dairies are not so frequent here as in some of the neighbouring counties; nor is the same attention paid to the breeding of milch-cows, although near Parsonstown and on the borders of Meath the dairy-cows are very good. Butter is the chief produce; cheese is seldom made, and what is made is of inferior quality.

Much has been done to improve the breed of horned CATTLE: that mostly preferred by the farmer is the old native stock crossed by the Durham. A very serviceable breed has been introduced by a cross between the Meath and Devon; the cattle are exceedingly pretty, and thrive well on favoured soils. In the barony of Ballybritt is a very heavy and powerful breed of bullocks, being a cross between the Limerick and Durham, excellent for field work, of large size, and rapidly and economically fattened: they are principally sent to the Dublin market. The breed of sheep has also been much improved. A cross between the new Leicester and the native sheep of the valley gives excellent wool, and draws higher prices than any other. On the hills, the sheep appear to have been crossed till it would be difficult to give the breed a name; the best appear to combine the old Ayrshire with the Kerry. The horses are well bred, light, and active, and when properly trained, excellent for the saddle; they are bred in great numbers: it is no unusual thing to see herds of young horses, mostly bays, in the mountains or bogs of Eglish and Ballyboy. There is a greater number of jennets here than in any other part of Ireland. Pigs are found every where, but very little attention has been paid to their improvement. Asses are mostly kept by the poor people, and mules are common with the small farmers. Goats are by no means numerous.

The county is generally well fenced, mostly with whitethorn planted on the breast of the ditch; but from the time of planting, the hedges appear to be neglected, except towards the south-western parts, where the country much resembles some of the midland districts of England. Draining and irrigation appear to be unknown; yet the country is highly favourable for both, for although chiefly a plain, and interspersed with large tracts of bog, it is so much elevated as to afford opportunities every where for carrying off the redundant water into some river. The general manure is limestone-gravel, of which the best kind is found in hillocks, or at the foot of hills, and has a strong smell when turned up: the burning of this gravel in heaps, with the parings of the moors, furnishes a manure producing extraordinary crops. Bog-stuff by itself, or worked up into a compost with dung, is much used: in high grounds, with a deep limestone bottom, this latter is found to be the best manure. The old plough is still in use. Oxen are employed in tillage, and for the harnessing of them a singular kind of yoke is in use in the neighbourhood of Leap: it consists of a flat light piece of wood which lies on the forehead and is strapped to the horns, so that the force of the draught is brought to the neck, in which the animal's strength is supposed chiefly to exist; the oxen rather pushing than pulling. Another mode has been introduced when four oxen are employed: they are coupled together, and a long beam is laid across their necks, embracing the throat by an iron bow which pierces the beam and is keyed at the top; from the centre of the beam the long chain is suspended. This kind of yoke is considered to be very easy to the cattle. The Scotch plough and the angular harrow are every where used, except in the mountain districts and by the poorer farmers. The slide car and that with solid wheels, are both exploded, and a light car with iron-bound spoke-wheels has taken their place; it is formed of framework, consisting of the shafts and a few transverse bars for the body, on which rests a large wicker-work basket, here called a kish: by removing the basket the frame serves to carry bulky articles, such as sacks of grain or hay. This car is very light, not weighing more, when well made, than 1½ cwt. The Scotch cart is seldom seen but with the gentry.

Evident marks exist at the present day, to prove that the whole surface of the county was once an uninterrupted forest: the alder is indigenous, and a small patch of the ancient forest still remains in the demesne of Droughtville. The borders of the county near Tipperary are well wooded, and have a beautiful appearance; but the principal woods are those of Killeigh, Charleville, and Castle-Bernard: there are likewise very extensive plantations and much ornamental timber around Woodville, Droughtville, Mountpleasant, Leap, Goldengrove, Doone, Moystown, Geashill, Newtown, and Clara. The timber is large and excellent: the ash from this part bears the highest price in Dublin; oak, birch, and lime also thrive well. Much planting has been effected on the borders of the bogs, and on the islands and derries interspersed through them, some of which are ancient stands of timber. Trees are also found growing within a few feet of the ancient timber, which is now several feet under the surface. The bogs, which cover so large a portion of the land, supply a never-failing quantity of fuel: their elevation renders them easily reclaimable, and the quantities of limestone and gravel found in the escars and derries with which they are interspersed afford great facilities for bringing them into a state of tillage.

The level portions of the county form part of the great field of floetz limestone. Its structure varies from the perfectly compact to the conjointly compact and foliated, and even granularly foliated. Beds of the last kind are quarried for various purposes near Tullamore; the stone is of a greyish white, and of a large granular texture. The Slieve-Bloom mountains consist of a nucleus of clay-slate surrounded by sandstone; the sandstone appears to sweep round the clay-stone nucleus, following the sinuosities and curvatures formed by its surface, with a dip that conforms to the declivity. Quarries are formed all round the mountains: in some the strata are from one to three feet in thickness; while in others excellent flags are raised, from an inch to four or five inches thick, and seven and eight feet square. The sandstone of these mountains is commonly yellowish-white or grey, sometimes exhibiting small porous interstices filled with iron ochre. Croghan Hill is a protruding mass of basalt, supporting on its north-western and south-western sides the floetz limestone. The gravel-hills or escars form a very singular feature in this county. They appear in the borders of Westmeath, and proceed by Philipstown in a south-western direction to Roscrea; they are entirely composed of gravel and sand, those in the northern part being of silicious formation, and in the southern argillaceous. In no other part of Ireland do escars present so great a variety of structure, or exhibit a more bold and marked appearance. Neither coal nor any other of the more valuable metallic ores has been found; those discovered being manganese and iron in very small quantities, with some ochre and potters'-clay.

The woollen manufacture is very limited: the women spin worsted, which they dispose of to the manufacturers. Friezes, stuffs, and serges are made in the county, but entirely for home consumption. The linen manufacture was formerly carried on with much spirit in some parts, particularly in the baronies of Garrycastle and Kilcoursey. The women are peculiarly industrious; they are all spinners, and their auxiliary exertions for the subsistence of the family are so proverbial, that it is common for an industrious young man to take a journey into this county in quest of a wife. There are extensive flour-mills, distilleries, and breweries at Parsonstown and in some other parts of the county, but the people are mostly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

The Brosna, formerly called Brosmog, rises in the county of Westmeath, and running westward by Ballycumber and Farbane, discharges itself into the Shannon, which forms the entire western boundary of the county, separating it from Connaught. The county is bounded for a short distance on the north-east by the river Boyne; the Barrow separates it from the Queen's county, in the neighbourhood of Portarlington; the Feagile separates it from Kildare, a little above Monastereven. The Lesser Brosna, which joins the Shannon below Banagher, is the boundary between this county and Tipperary for a distance of seven miles, and has been rendered navigable from the Shannon to about two miles above Riverstown bridge, for small turf boats. This interesting little river, from Riverstown bridge down to the Shannon, is also the boundary between the provinces of Leinster and Munster, so that at the mouth of the Lesser Brosna is the junction of three provinces and three counties. Through numerous glens in the hilly district descend rapid mountain streams, which only flow in wet weather; the fall of their waters is generally as sudden as their rise. Many of them are discharged into Knockarley river, which sometimes appears but an inconsiderable stream, but when swelled by the mountain floods becomes of great magnitude, occasionally rising several feet and carrying away every thing on its banks: its bed has been completely changed in consequence of the violence of these floods, which baffle all the art and labour expended in endeavouring to confine the river to its original channel. The Grand Canal enters the county near Edenderry, and continues its course through its entire length, in a western direction, by Philipstown and Tullamore, till it joins the Shannon, at Shannon-Harbour, near Banagher, opening a direct communication with Dublin on the one side, and with Ballinasloe and the Shannon on the other: this is the chief line of trade for the county. It has been proposed to make a navigation from the Shannon up the Lesser Brosna to Parsonstown. The roads are numerous in every part, and have been greatly improved within the last few years; several new lines have been opened through the bogs. But notwithstanding the central situation and great extent of this county, it is a singular fact, that there is not a mail-coach to or from any town in it; the only mail-coach road touching the county is that from Dublin to Limerick, and this but for a very short distance south of Roscrea. The roads are all maintained by grand jury presentments.

The most ancient relic of ANTIQUITY is a ruin called the White Obelisk, or Temple of the Sun, in the Slieve-Bloom mountains, being a large pyramid of white stones. Danish raths are common: a chain of fortified moats commanding toghers or bog-passes extends through the county. Ballykillen Fort was a famous rath, in the centre of which was a vault where some curious relics were found. The number of religious establishments in the county appears to have been very great in proportion to its extent. Of the existing remains the most remarkable are the ruins at Clonmacnois. Of the other religious establishments, there are still vestiges of those of Clonfertmulloe, Drumcullin, Kilcolman, Killegally, Rathbeg, and Reynagh, which have been converted into parish churches. At Killeigh, now a small village, were three religious houses. Durrow was the site of a sumptuous abbey founded by St. Columb; the abbey of Monasteroris was founded by one of the Birmingham family, in a district then called Thotmoy; Seirkyran Abbey was founded by St. Kieran, near Ballybritt. The abbeys of Clonemore, Glinn, Kilbian, Kilcomin, Kilhualleach, Killiadhuin, Liethmore, Lynally, Mugoa, Rathlibthen, and Tuilim, are known only by name. The ruins of ancient castles are numerous; most of the baronies take their names from some one of them. Several are still kept up as the mansions of the proprietors; but the greater number are in ruins. Those deserving special notice, together with the modern mansions of the nobility and gentry, are described under the heads of their respective parishes.

Though there are some good farmsteads, but little attention is in general paid to the arrangement of their offices or their internal convenience or neatness, except in those belonging to gentlemen of fortune. The houses of the small farmers are very mean, and the peasants' cabins are throughout miserably poor, in few instances weather-proof, and mostly thatched with straw; on the borders of the bogs they are still worse constructed, being covered only with sods pared off the surface and called scraws, or with rushes. Yet the people are said to prefer the shelter thus afforded to that of stone and slated houses, partly from custom, partly, too, on account of the warmth retained by the smoke and closeness of the earthen buildings. The food is potatoes, milk, and oatmeal. In the neighbourhood of Philipstown, bacon forms an occasional addition to the family fare, and beer is in much demand. In Kilcoursey, most cottier families consume a bacon pig annually. Though illiterate, the people are very anxious to have their children instructed, as is evident from the number of small schools in all parts. They speak English every where; if a person is heard speaking Irish, they invariably call him a Connaught man. Their clothing is of the coarsest materials, manufactured at home. The women prepare the yarn for the manufacturer, and execute many of the details of agricultural industry. The use of cotton in lieu of linen and woollen has become very general, particularly for female dress.

Chalybeate mineral waters are frequent: some wells at Shinrone throw up a strong ferruginous scum, and their waters leave a lasting mark on linen. In Garrycastle barony chalybeate springs are particularly numerous; there is also one at Escar, in Coolestown, another at Kilduff, in Philipstown, and another near Aghancon church, in Ballybritt. In Ballycowan barony is a well which exhibits a combination of sulphur with iron. Yet none of these springs are much noted for their medicinal effects. At Ballincar, near Whigshorough, is a spa resembling that of Castle-Connell, in Limerick; its waters are of a yellowish hue, and it is much esteemed for its efficacy in healing bad sores and scorbutic ulcers. Besides these, may be mentioned a spring on the glebe land of Geashill, the waters of which never throw off any sediment, but, though preserved for many years in bottle, continue perfectly pure, and undistinguishable in taste and colour from that drawn fresh from the spring.

KINGSCOURT, a market and post town, in the union of BAILIEBOROUGH, parish of ENNISKEEN, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (W.) from Carrickmacross, and $50\frac{1}{2}$ (N.W.) from Dublin, on the road from Carrickmacross to Bailieborough; containing 1614 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the confines of the counties of Louth, Meath, and Monaghan, was founded near the site of the old village of Cabra, by Mervyn Pratt, Esq., towards the close of the last century, and was completed by his brother, the Rev. Joseph Pratt. From the facility afforded by its situation for procuring materials for building, from the advantageous conditions of the leases granted by its proprietor, the construction of good roads, and the establishment of a market, it has rapidly risen into importance, and is now a thriving and prosperous place. It consists of one spacious street, containing 307 houses, which are well built of stone and roofed with slate; has a neat and commodious market-house, and a daily post; and is the head station for the Kingscourt district of the Irish Society for promoting the education of the native Irish, through the medium of their own language.

Near the town is CABRA CASTLE, the seat of the proprietor, Colonel Pratt, a superb baronial castellated mansion in the Norman style of architecture, with suitable offices, situated in an extensive and beautiful demesne comprising 1700 statute acres, and embellished with luxuriant woods and richly varied scenery. In a very spacious meadow to the west, which is interspersed with stately trees of ancient growth, is an aboriginal wood covering several hundred acres, and reaching to the summit of a lofty eminence crowned with the ruins of a castle and with a rotundo of more modern date, commanding a rich view over several counties, terminating in the Carlingford mountains to the east, and in the bay of Dundalk, which is visible in clear weather. On a rising ground at a short distance towards the south are the tower of Kingscourt church and part of the town; and to the south-east, on a high hill, the church of Ardagh. At the western extremity of the demesne is the thickly wooded glen of Cabra, of great depth, and nearly a mile in length, watered by a rapid mountain torrent, which, taking a winding course over beds of rock, forms several picturesque cascades. A romantic bridge is thrown across the glen, the abutments of which are hewn in the solid rock; the arch, raised to a very great height, is covered with ivy, and ornamented with trees of large growth, whose stems are also entwined with ivy, giving to the bridge a splendid and imposing appearance. Near this spot, on a slight eminence, is Cabra Lodge, where the present proprietor has erected some vertical saw-mills of great power. It is traditionally recorded that one of the northern tribes, in its passage to the west of Ireland, was met in this glen by the enemy, and totally routed and cut to pieces; old inhabitants recollect the discovery of human bones here, which, the place being unconsecrated ground, must have been those of bodies interred before the Christian era. This conflict is alluded to in Ossian's poems, a fact which would, in the opinion of antiquaries, confirm the authenticity of at least a part of that work. Contiguous to Cabra is Mullintra, the grounds of which, together with those of Cormee, the site of the present castle, now form part of the demesne, the whole having been united by the present proprietor.

The market of Kingscourt is on Tuesday; and there are fairs on April 1st, May 23rd, June 18th, Aug. 1st, Sept. 19th, Nov. 8th, and Dec. 4th and 24th. A chief constabulary force is stationed here; and petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays. The parish church is situated in the town, in which are also a handsome Roman Catholic chapel, and a dispensary. In the neighbourhood are several planted raths, one of which commands a very extensive and magnificent prospect.

KINGSTOWN, formerly DUNLEARY, a sea-port and market-town, in the parish of MONKSTOWN, union and barony of RATHDOWN, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (E. S. E.) from Dublin; containing 7229 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the southern shore of the bay of Dublin, derived its former name Dunleary, signifying "the Fort of Leary," from Laeghaire or Leary, son of "Nial of the Nine Hostages," monarch of Ireland, who reigned from the year 429 to 458, and had his residence at this place. Its present appellation, Kingstown, was given to it by permission of His Majesty George IV., on his embarkation at this port for England after his visit to Ireland, in 1821; in commemoration of which, a handsome obelisk of granite, with an appropriate inscription, and surmounted by a crown of the same material, was erected. Previously to the construction of the present magnificent harbour, Dunleary was merely a village inhabited by a few fishermen; but since the completion of that important undertaking it has become an extensive and flourishing place of fashionable resort, and the immediate neighbourhood is now thickly studded with elegant villas and handsome residences of the wealthy citizens of Dublin.

The bay of Dublin had, from time immemorial, been regarded as extremely dangerous for shipping, from a bar of moveable sand which obstructed the entrance into the harbour and rendered the western passage to the port impracticable during certain periods of the tide; and from the vast rocks that project along the eastern shore to the small town of Dunleary. The frequent wrecks that occurred, and the great loss of life and property, had powerfully shown the want of an asylum harbour for the protection of vessels during adverse winds; and application from the Dublin merchants had been made to Captain Toucher, a gentleman of considerable nautical skill and experience, who resided among them, to select a proper station for that purpose. The loss of His Majesty's packet, The Prince of Wales, and of the Rochdale transport, between Dublin and Dunleary, on the 17th Nov., 1807, when 380 persons perished, prompted fresh efforts to obtain this desirable object; and the merchants of Dublin and the Rathdown Association again applied to Captain Toucher, who selected the port of Dunleary as the fittest for the purpose, from its commanding a sufficient depth of water, soundness of bottom, and other requisites for the anchorage of large vessels. But nothing further was done at that time. A petition, however, signed by all the magistrates and gentry on the southern shore of the bay, was, in 1809, presented to the Duke of Richmond, then lord-lieutenant; and a small pier, 500 feet in length, was constructed to the east of the Chicken rocks, which, though accessible only at particular periods of the tide, contributed much to the preservation of life and property. The great want still felt of accommodation for the port of Dublin and the channel trade, induced the citizens to make further efforts to obtain the sanction of the legislature for the construction of an ASYLUM HARBOUR more adequate to the safety of vessels frequenting the Irish Channel, and bound to other ports; and in 1815 an act was passed for "the erection of an asylum harbour and place of refuge at Dunleary." Commissioners were appointed to carry the provisions of this act into effect, in which they were greatly assisted by the exertions of Captain Toucher; surveys were made, and the works were commenced in 1816, under the direction and after the design of the late Mr. Rennie.

The first stone of the eastern pier was laid by Earl Whitworth, lord-lieutenant, and the work was successfully prosecuted under the superintendence of Mr. Rennie, till his decease in 1817: the pier is 3500 feet in length. Though at first this was thought to be of itself sufficient to afford the requisite security, it was found necessary, for the protection of vessels from the north-west winds, to construct a western pier, which was commenced in 1820, and has been extended to a length of 4950 feet from the shore. The piers, by an angular deviation from a right line, incline towards each other, leaving at the mouth of the harbour a distance of 850 feet; and inclose an area of 251 statute acres, affording anchorage in a depth of water varying from 27 to 15 feet at low spring tides. They are 310 feet broad at the base, and 53 feet on the summit; towards the harbour they are faced with a perpendicular wall of heavy rubble-stone, and towards the sea with huge blocks of granite sloping towards the top in an angle of 10 or 12 degrees. A quay, 40 feet wide, is continued along the piers, protected on the sea-side by a strong parapet nine feet high. The extreme points of the piers, which had been left unfinished for the decision of the Lords of the Admiralty with respect to the breadth of the entrance, are now cased with circular walls of cut stone, brought up vertically from the bottom with the diving-bell. A spacious wharf, 500 feet in length, has been erected along the breast of the harbour, opposite the entrance; where merchant vessels of any burthen may deliver or receive their cargoes at all times of the tide. At the extremity of the eastern pier is a revolving light, which becomes eclipsed every two minutes. The old pier, which is now inclosed within the present harbour, affords good shelter for small vessels. More than half a million sterling has been already expended upon the construction of this noble harbour, and it is calculated that, to render it complete, about £200,000 more will be requisite. The materials for the piers, wharf, and quays, are granite of remarkably compact texture, brought from the quarries of Dalkey hill, about two miles distant, by means of tramroads laid down for the purpose; the number of men daily employed was about 600 on the average.

The Royal Harbour of Kingstown is now exclusively the station for the Holyhead and Liverpool mail packets; and from the great accommodation it affords to steam-vessels of every class, and the protection and security to all vessels navigating the Irish Channel, it has fully realized all the benefits contemplated in its construction. The number of vessels that entered, during the year 1835, was 2000, of the aggregate burthen of 244,282 tons; exclusively of 57 men-of-war and cruisers, and of the regular post-office steam-packets from Holyhead and Liverpool, of which there are eight employed daily in conveying the mails and passengers. In 1845 the number of vessels that entered was very much larger. About 20 yawls belong to the port, the chief trade of which is the exportation of cattle, corn, granite, and lead-ore, and the importation of coal, timber, and iron. The intercourse with the metropolis is greatly facilitated by the Dublin and Kingstown Railway, which was lately extended, by the Board of Works, from the old harbour of Dunleary to the new wharf, which is very large and commodious. The original line was opened to the public on the 17th December, 1834, and the number of passengers has since been on the average 5000 daily; the number from Dublin to Kingstown, during the races subsequent to the opening, was, on the first day, 8900, and on the second, 9700. The line was completed to the old harbour at an expense of more than £200,000, of which £74,000 were advanced on loan by the Board of Works; and during its progress it employed from 1500 to 1800 men daily. It commences at Westland-row, Dublin, where the company erected a handsome and spacious building for passengers; and is carried over several streets, and across the dock of the Grand Canal, by substantial arches of granite. At Merrion, about two miles from the city, it passes through the sea on an elevated embaukment to Blackrock. Thence it proceeds through extensive excavations, and intersecting the demesnes of Lord Cloncurry and Sir Harcourt Lees, passes under a tunnel about 70 feet in length, and extends along the sea-shore to the martello tower at Seapoint, continuing along the base of the Monkstown cliffs to Salthill, and thence to the old harbour of Dunleary, where commences the line to the new packet-wharf. The terminus at the wharf is a very handsome building. Nine locomotive engines of the most approved construction are employed on the road; and there are three classes of carriages for passengers, the fares of which are respectively sixpence, eightpence, and a shilling. The carriages start every half hour, from both stations, from six in the morning till half-past eleven o'clock at night, performing the journey in less than twenty-five minutes; the whole line is well lighted with gas. The recent extension to Dalkey is noticed in the article on that place.

The TOWN consists principally of one spacious street, about half a mile in length, and of several smaller streets and avenues branching from it in various directions; there are also several squares and ranges of handsome buildings, inhabited chiefly by the opulent citizens of Dublin. Gresham's Terrace, consisting of nine elegant houses, with a spacious hotel, was erected by Mr. Gresham, at an expense of £35,000, together forming one side of Victoria-square, so named at the request of the Queen, then Princess Victoria; the ground in front of the terrace is tastefully laid out, and from the flat roofs of the houses, which are secured from the risk of accidents by iron railings, is a fine view of the bay, the Hill of Howth, the Killiney hills, and the Dublin and Wicklow mountains. Haddington Terrace, consisting of twelve houses in the Elizabethan style, was built in 1835; and there are many detached residences. The town, towards the improvement of which Mr. Gresham has contributed greatly at his own expense, is partly paved, and lighted with gas by the Dublin Gas Company. From the purity of the air, the beauty of its situation, and convenience for sea-bathing, the place has become a favourite summer residence, and is much resorted to by visiters, for whose accommodation, besides the Gresham hotel, there is the Anglesey Arms on the quay; also several private lodging-houses on the western side of the harbour. The Railway Company have erected some spacious baths, and there are others on the eastern side of the harbour, all embracing extensive views of the sea. Races were held annually, but have been discontinued for some years; regattas annually take place in the harbour. The Royal Yacht Club includes some thousands of members. In the neighbourhood are numerous handsome seats, most of them commanding fine views of the bay of Dublin, and of the richly diversified scenery on its shores. The vicinity is remarkable for its quarries of granite, from which was raised the principal material for the bridge over the Menai straits, and for the harbours of Howth and Kingstown.

A savings' bank has been opened, and a market-place and court-house erected. Kingstown is the head of a coast-guard district, comprising the stations of Dalkey, Bray, Graystones, Five-mile Point, and Wicklow Head, and including a force of 5 officers and 38 men, under an inspecting commander resident here. There is also a constabulary police force, under a resident sub-inspector. Petty-sessions are held every Monday; a court at which the Commissioners of Public Works preside, or a deputed magistrate, is held on Tuesday, to try harbour offences; and the seneschal of the Glasnevin and Grange-gorman manorial court sits on alternate Fridays, for the recovery of debts to any amount within this district. An Episcopal chapel was built by subscription in 1836, in pursuance of a donation of £1000 late currency for its endowment. This is a noble structure as to size, being capable of accommodating 1600 persons: it contains free sittings for seamen and their families, as well as for the poor; and is called the "Protestant Episcopal Mariners' Church at Kingstown Harbour." The incumbency is in the patronage of trustees, as is also that of the Bethel Protestant Free Church. In the Roman Catholic divisions the town is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Dalkey, Killiney, Old Connaught, Rathmichael, Tully, and the greater part of Monkstown and Kill. The principal chapel is a handsome edifice, completed in 1835, at an expense of £4000; over the altar is a painting of the Crucifixion, presented by Mr. Gresham. There are chapels also at Cabinteely and Crinken. In the town are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and Wesleyan Methodists; the former erected at an expense of £2000, and the latter of £1000: there is also a large lecture-room. A convent of the order of St. Clare, to which is attached a small chapel, was established here about 20 years since; but the community, having been much reduced in number, has been distributed among other religious houses, and the convent purchased by the nuns of Loretto House, Rathfarnham, who conduct a respectable boarding-school. A convent of the order of Mercy was established in 1835, consisting of a superior and seven sisters from Baggot-street, Dublin, who have built a commodious schoolroom, in which 300 girls are gratuitously instructed; they also visit the sick in the neighbourhood, whom they supply with necessaries and religious instruction. There are two schools in connexion with the Mariners' church, one of them under the Church Education Society; and about 120 children are taught in an infants' school, and a school under the Board of Education. A dispensary and fever hospital were established in 1825.

KING-WILLIAM'S-TOWN, a village, recently erected by government, in the parish of NOHOVAL-DALY, union of KANTURK, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 9½ miles (S. E.) from Castleisland; on the river Blackwater, and on the new government road from Castleisland to Roskeen Bridge: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated nearly in the centre of the crown lands of Pobble O'Keefe, comprising about 9000 statute acres, which formed part of an extensive territory forfeited by the O'Keefes in 1641, and have since remained in the occupation of the lessees of the crown. On the expiration of the last lease, granted about a century since to the Cronin family, it was determined by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, on the recommendation of their surveyor, Mr. Weale, to retain the estate in their own hands; to commence a series of experimental improvements in draining, planting, building, &c.; and by the construction of new roads to render accessible this hitherto wild, neglected, and uncultivated district. For these purposes the commissioners were empowered, by an act passed in 1832, to appropriate £17,000 from the revenues of the crown; to which the grand juries of Cork and Kerry added presentments amounting to £7937. The works were accordingly commenced in Sept. 1832, under the superintendence of Mr. Griffith, the government engineer; and after considerable progress had been made in the intersection of this mountain district by two important lines of road (noticed in the article on the county of Cork), the erection of the village was commenced on the eastern bank of the Blackwater, on the road to Castleisland, which here crosses the river over a handsome stone bridge of two elliptic arches.

It chiefly consists of a row of neat houses with shops, and of dwellings for workmen, situated on the northern side of the road. At the western extremity near the bridge is a commodious dwelling-house with suitable out-offices, at present occupied by the sub-engineer, but intended for an inn on the completion of the model farmhouse now in course of erection near the village, which will be his future residence. Immediately opposite are a neat garden and nursery, extending to the river; which, though formed in the centre of a deep bog, have produced flowers, vegetables, and seedlings of a superior description, and from which nearly 50 acres of mountain land have already been planted. To the east of the garden, a school-house in the Elizabethan style has been erected; it is surmounted by a cupola, and its front ornamented by a clock. The village is well supplied with water from a well on the Kerry side of the river. Three substantial farmhouses have been erected in the vicinity for tenants of the estate, in lieu of the miserable mud cabins which they previously occupied; and as the land is gradually reclaimed, others will be erected on different parts of the estate. Nearly 100 acres have already been brought into cultivation on an improved system, and made to produce excellent crops of grain and potatoes; while about 60 acres of mountain land have been drained for meadow and pasture. A vein of culm has been discovered, and worked to a considerable extent for burning limestone, of which a large supply is obtained from the quarries at Carrigdulkeen and Taur, in the adjoining parishes of Kilcummin and Clonfert. A branch road to Mount-Infant completes the direct communication with the former quarry, and with the roads to Killarney and Millstreet; a road to Newmarket has been completed; and it has been suggested that a cross road should be made from King-William's-Town, to open a direct communication with the limestone-quarries at Taur, and to form a junction with the new road between Abbeyfeale and Newmarket.

KINKORA.—See KILLALOE.

KINLOUGH, a village, in the union of BALLYSHANNON, parish of ROSSINVER, half-barony of ROSSCLOGHER, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Ballyshannon, on the road to Manor-Hamilton; containing 277 inhabitants. The village consists of 52 houses; it is a chief constabulary police station, and has fairs on the 6th of each month. Petty-sessions are held every third Monday, and here are a dispensary, the parish church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a school. At the north-eastern extremity of Lough Melvyn is Kinlough House, a beautiful villa, in a very fine demesne. Near the village is a chalybeate spa which was formerly much frequented.

KINNARD, a parish, in the union of TRALEE, barony of CORKAGUINEY, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Dingle, and on the northern side of Dingle bay; containing 1283 inhabitants. It is intersected by the Lispole river, which runs into the bay; and comprises 5002 statute acres. About one-half consists of mountain pasture interspersed with bog, and the remainder is chiefly under tillage: an abundant supply of sea-weed and sand is obtained in the bay and used for manure, and the state of agriculture is gradually improving. The boats employed in bringing the manure are also occasionally engaged in the fishery of the bay. The living, lately suppressed, was a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in J. Hickson, Esq., of Dingle. The tithe rent-charge is £105. 9. 3., of which £42. 3., being the tithe of that part of the parish lying north of the river Lispole, is payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The occasional duties are discharged by the curate of Ballynacourty. There is a glebe of about three acres near the churchyard. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Dingle: the chapel for this portion of the district is on the border of the adjoining parish of Minard. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground, near the shore; it has long been the burial-place of the Hussey family.

KINNEAGH.—See TINTERN.

KINNEGAD, a post-town and district parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of FARBILL, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 8¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Mullingar, and 30 (W. by N.) from Dublin, on the road to Athlone; the population of the district is returned with Killucan. The town contains 715 persons; it comprises 119 houses, and is a great thoroughfare, though now rather a decaying place. There is a patent for three fairs and a market; but only one fair is held, on the 9th of May. Here are a constabulary police station, and a dispensary. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Meath, separated from the parish of Killucan upwards of 60 years since, and in the patronage of the Incumbent of Killucan: the curate's income proceeds from £46. 3. from the rector of Killucan, £17. 16. from Primate Boulter's fund, and 42 acres of land at £41. 1. per annum, with the glebe-house and offices. The church is an oblong building with pointed windows and a steeple, for the erection of which the Board of First Fruits, in 1822, granted a loan of £1050. There is a glebe of 30 acres, subject to a rent of £20. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kinnegad is the head of a district, called also Corralstown, comprising this parish and part of Clonard, and containing chapels at Kinnegad, Corralstown, and Clonard. The former market-house, in the centre of the town, has been converted into a school; and there is another school, which cost £169, raised by subscription and a grant from the lord-lieutenant's school fund.

KINNEIGH, a parish, in the union of BANDON, western division of the barony of EAST CARBERY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 8 miles (N. W.) from Bandon, on the mail-car road to Dunmanway; containing 6093 inhabitants. This parish, which is said to have been anciently the head of a bishopric founded by St. Mocolmoge, is bounded on the south by the river Bandon, and comprises 15,097 statute acres. About 10,000 are arable, 1300 pasture, 150 woodland, and the remainder waste and bog: the land, except towards the south, is cold, wet, and stony; and the system of agriculture, except on the farms of resident proprietors, is in a very unimproved state. The waste land is chiefly mountainous, but under a better system of husbandry a great portion of it might be reclaimed and brought into profitable cultivation. The substratum is of the schistus formation, passing abruptly in the northern parts into every variety of transition rock; and towards the south, is found slate of good colour and very durable: near the village of Inniskeen are two quarries, in which more than 30 men are constantly employed. The principal seats are, Palace Anne, a stately mansion beautifully situated in the midst of extensive improvements, and near the junction of a romantic glen and the vale of Bandon; Fort Robert, a handsome residence on an eminence above the vale of Bandon, at the eastern extremity of the parish; Gardeville, Killynear, and Connorville or Carrigmore. Here is a constabulary police station; and fairs are held in the villages of Inniskeen and Castletown, which see.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is partly appropriate to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and partly forms a portion of the union of Carrigrohane and the corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of Cork. The tithe rent-charge is £675, one-fourth payable to the commissioners, one-fourth to the precentor, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house is an old building; the glebe comprises 47¼ acres. The church, a small handsome edifice with a low tower and spire, was erected in 1791, by a gift of £500 from the Board of First Fruits; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £274 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is united to one-half of the parish of Ballymoney; there are two chapels, situated respectively at Inniskeen and Castletown. Of the three parochial schools within the parish, one, at Castletown, was built by Lord Bandon, who endowed it with eight acres of land; another, at Inniskeen, has a house and garden given by the Duke of Devonshire; and the third is built on ground given by Wilmot Chetwood, Esq. On an isolated rock of clay-slate, a few yards to the south-west of the church, is an ancient round tower, 75 feet high, and 65 in circumference at the base, from which, for about 16 feet, its form is hexagonal, and thence to the summit circular: it was damaged by lightning a few years since, and towards the south is a fissure from which several stones have fallen. About half a mile south of the church is an ancient fort, in the centre of which is a large flagstone erect; and there are several of smaller size scattered over the parish.

KINNITTY, a post-town and parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of BALLYBRITT, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 14 miles (W.) from Tullamore, and 64 (S. W.) from Dublin, on the road to Parsonstown; containing 2562 inhabitants, of whom 621 are in the town. This place was the site of a monastery founded in 557 by St. Finian (who became its first abbot), and which continued to flourish till 839, when it was destroyed by the Danes. It appears to have been soon restored, for the Annals of Mac Geoghegan notice the abbot Colga M'Conaghan as dying here in 871; he was considered the most elegant poet and learned historian of that period. The town contains 101 houses neatly built: it has a sub-post office in connexion with Parsonstown and Frankfort; and fairs on Feb. 9th, Ascension-day, June 23rd, Aug. 15th, and Oct. 2nd. A constabulary police force is stationed here, and petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays. The parish comprises 13,894½ statute acres: it contains some good land, which is principally under tillage, and an extensive tract of bog; the surrounding district is noted for corn, and there are quarries of fine gritstone. Castle Bernard, the seat of the Bernard family, is a handsome mansion, situated in a picturesque demesne bordering on the Slieve-Bloom mountains, and commanding some agreeable views. The other seats in the parish are Letty-Brook, Glenview, and Cadamstown House.

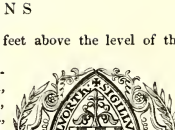
The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe; of the rectory, one moiety is impropriate in the representatives of Henry Jackson, Esq., and the other, with the vicarage, was united by act of council in 1796 to the rectory and vicarage of Litterluna, and the vicarage of Roscomroe, and is in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £128. 1. 6., of which £38. 1. 6. are payable to the impropriators, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the entire benefice of the incumbent is £173. 1. 6. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1810; the glebe comprises 41*a.* 1*r.* 11*p.* The church was rebuilt on an enlarged scale, in 1813, by a loan of £500 from the same Board, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £176 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Litterluna and Roscomroe; there is a chapel in each. Of several schools, one is supported under the patronage of Col. Bernard, and an infants' and sewing-school by Lady Catherine Bernard; there is also a Sunday school, to which is attached a clothing fund, supported by the rector and Lady Bernard; and in the town is a dispensary. The O'Carrolls had a castle here previously to the forfeitures in the war of 1641; and near Castle Bernard is a Danish fort, from which some curious stone figures and valuable coins have been taken.

KINNURE, a parish, in the union of KINSALE, barony of KINNALEA, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Kinsale; containing 1121 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the southern coast, occupying a peninsulated tract of land projecting boldly into the Atlantic and terminating in Kinnure Point. It is bounded on the west by Oyster haven, and on the east by the creek of Donbogue; and comprises 1988 statute acres. The land is generally good, and chiefly under tillage, but the system of agriculture is in a very unimproved state: the chief manure is seasand; lime is not to be obtained within less than nine miles' distance, and is consequently beyond the means of the ordinary farmer. Off Kinnure (or Keroda) Point is a shoal above high-water mark, nearly half a cable's length from the west side. At Pallis is a coast-guard station belonging to the district of Kinsale. The parish is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union of Tracton; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Shannon, and the tithe rent-charge is £64. 17., wholly payable to the impropriator. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Tracton. There are some remains of the church, near the shore of Oyster haven; and at the point is a small peninsula of about two acres, called Doong, which is joined to the main land by an exceedingly narrow isthmus, the sides of which rise perpendicularly to more than 100 feet above the level of the sea.



Seal.

KINSALE, or KINGSALE, a sea-port, borough, and market-town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of KINSALE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 14 miles (S.) from Cork, and 140 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 6182 inhabitants, of whom 6142 are in the town, which extends into the parish of Rincurran, and contains altogether 6918 inhabitants. This place, of which, from its very great antiquity, the origin is but imperfectly known, is supposed to have derived its name from the Irish Cean Taile, signifying "the headland in the sea," in allusion to the promontory called the Old Head; or from Ciun Saila, a "smooth sea or basin." It is also in some ancient Irish manuscripts called Fan-na-Tuabrid, or "the fall of the springs." On the Old Head, about 6 miles from the town, was an encampment, supposed, but on doubtful authority, to have been the residence of some of the ancient kings of Ireland, and of which the site is now occupied by the ruins of a castle built in the 12th century by the celebrated DE COURCY, who, having married into the family of the De Cogans, the first English grantees, became possessed of a large tract of country now forming the barony of Courcy, adjoining that of Kinsale on the south-west. The place appears from a very early period to have been a borough by prescription, as the charter of incorporation granted to the inhabitants by Edward III., in the 7th of his reign, states in its preamble that the town "was surrounded by Irish enemies and English rebels, and that the burgesses had always obeyed the king's orders in repelling the same, who had often by sea and land assailed the town, the walls of which had become ruinous and the burgesses unable to repair them." Power was therefore granted to choose a "sovereign;" to collect certain customs for repairing the walls; and to treat separately with, or make war upon, the Irish enemies. John de Courcy having become lord of Kinsale and also of the adjoining castle of Ringrone, was succeeded in his estates here by his grandson Milo, who near the latter place defeated Florence M'Carty More and a large party of his followers, and drove them into the river Bandon, where many of them were drowned.

In 1380, the French and Spanish fleets were pursued by the English into this haven, where an engagement took place in which the former were defeated with great loss, many of their ships taken, and 20 English vessels which they had made prizes recaptured. In the following year the inhabitants received a charter from Richard II., granting to the "Provost" and Commonalty, in consideration of the insult they had received from the Spanish and Irish enemies and the English rebels, the small customs of the port, at a yearly rent of ten marks, the surplus to be laid out in completing the walls of the town. Edward IV., in 1482, confirmed the charter; appointed the sovereign admiral of the port, with jurisdiction extending from the Bulman rock to Innishannon; and granted the corporation all such rights and privileges as were enjoyed by the citizens of Cork. The inhabitants having countenanced the pretensions of Lambert Simnel, Sir Richard Edgecumbe arrived here on the 27th of June, 1488, with five ships and 500 men, to exact new oaths of allegiance from the Irish leaders; and on the day following, the townsmen, having sworn fealty to Henry VII. in the church of St. Multosia, and entered into recognizances, received a pardon; but they were compelled by the Earl of Kildare to renew their oaths in 1498. The town was partly consumed in 1594 by a fire which destroyed Cork-street.

In 1601, a Spanish fleet bringing assistance to the Irish insurgents entered the harbour, and landed its troops, on the 23rd of September. Immediately after the departure of the fleet, these forces, under the command of Don Juan D'Aquila, took possession of the town, which on their landing had been abandoned by the garrison, consisting at that time of only one company. The English army advanced on the 17th of October to the hill of Knock-Robbin, within a mile of the town, and commenced that memorable siege which has rendered this place so celebrated in the Irish annals. The castle of Rincurran, situated on the river, having been seized by the enemy as an advantageous post for annoying the English shipping, after sustaining for some days a severe cannonade, surrendered to the Lord-Deputy Mountjoy. The forces of the English were every day advancing, when, on intelligence that the northern army under O'Nial was in full march to join the Spaniards, it was resolved to divide the royal army, leaving one part under Lord Mountjoy to continue the siege of Kinsale, while the other, under Sir George Carew, Lord President of Munster, marched against O'Nial. Sir George, after a harassing and fruitless expedition, was compelled to return to Kinsale. In the mean time, the English received a reinforcement of 1000 men from England under the Earl of Thomond; 2000 infantry, with some cavalry, were also landed at Waterford, and 2000 infantry with a supply of military stores at Cork. Castle-ni-park, a fortress on the opposite side of the river, was attacked by the English, and compelled to surrender; but on summoning the town they were answered that "it was held for Christ and the King of Spain, and should be maintained against all their enemies." The northern army under O'Nial had now encamped within six miles of the town, cutting off all communication with Cork; and was approaching the English lines, when the Lord-Deputy, leaving Sir G. Carew to carry on the siege, marched against the insurgents with 1200 infantry and 400 horse, and routed them with great slaughter. All the Spaniards that had joined the insurgents from Castlehaven were either killed on the spot or taken prisoners; the enemy had on this occasion 1200 killed and 800 wounded, while, on the part of the English, one cornet only and a few privates were wounded. The Spanish commander, Don Juan, mistaking the vollies fired by the royal army in honour of their victory, for signals of the approach of the Irish forces, sallied out from the town to meet them; but perceiving his error, immediately retired, and on the arrival of the English before the gates, entered into terms of capitulation and surrendered the town, just at the time when the King of Spain was preparing to send large reinforcements, and to carry on the war with increased vigour. During the siege and the sickness that followed it, the royal army lost no less than 6000 men; but the fall of Kinsale, and the consequent destruction of the Spanish power in Ireland, at this critical juncture, were the means of saving the country. On the first landing of the Spaniards, the burgesses had delivered to Sir George Carew their charter, seal, mace, and royal standard, to preserve for them in safety; and on their subsequent application to him for their restoration, they were told that he considered them as forfeited, but that he would write to the queen in their favour. He was soon afterwards ordered to restore them to the corporation, on condition that they should, at their own expense, repair the town walls and find labourers to complete the new fortress of Castle-ni-Park, which they undertook to perform.

During the war of 1641, the Irish inhabitants were expelled from the town. In 1649, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice entered the bay with a fleet, in order to make preparations for the landing of Charles II., but finding themselves blocked up by Blake and Dean, the parliamentarian admirals, they made their escape with four frigates to Lisbon; and on Cromwell's approach in the latter part of the same year, the town declared for the parliament. About the year 1677, the Duke of Ormonde erected for the defence of the town and harbour a new citadel, called Charles Fort. James II. landed here on the 12th of March, 1689, and after being entertained by Donough, Earl of Clancarty, proceeded to Cork. On the 14th, an army of 5000 French landed under the command of Count Lauzun and the Marquess de Lary, to join whom, James sent as many of the Irish under Major-General M'Carty. On the 14th of April, Admiral Herbert appeared off the harbour with his fleet, upon which the governor of Kinsale, Mac Elligot, mistaking it for the French fleet expected at that time, prepared to withdraw his forces that the French might take possession of the town; but on discovering his error, he returned for its defence. On the surrender of Cork in the following year, Brigadier-General Villiers was sent to take Kinsale, which was immediately abandoned as untenable by the enemy, who dispersed their troops in the adjacent forts. Major-General Tettan and Colonel Fitzpatrick, therefore, with about 800 men, crossed the river on the 2nd of October and marched to the old fort of Castle-ni-Park, which they assaulted and took by storm: the garrison retired into the castle of Ringroan, but on their entrance, three barrels of their gunpowder took fire at the gate, which was blown up, and about 40 of them destroyed; and Colonel Driscoll and about 200 of the garrison being killed by the artillery, the rest surrendered upon quarter. Charles Fort was then summoned, and the trenches of the besiegers were opened on the 5th of October; a breach was made, and a mine sprung; but just when the assault was about to take place, Sir Edward Scott surrendered upon honourable terms, and the troops were allowed to march out with their arms and baggage to Limerick. Brigadier-General Churchhill, brother to the Earl of Marlborough, was made governor of Charles Fort, and the town became the winter quarters of part of the English army; the walls on the land side were on this occasion destroyed by order of government. In 1691, the English and Dutch Smyrna fleets lay in the port, while the grand fleets of both nations guarded the mouth of the harbour. The importance of the haven was soon after manifested by its affording a secure asylum to the Virginia and Barbadoes fleets, till an opportunity was found of convoying them in safety to their respective ports. On various subsequent occasions, also, especially during the last war, this port was a rendezvous for large squadrons of the British navy and for homeward and outward bound East and West India fleets.

The TOWN is pleasantly and advantageously situated near the mouth of the river Bandon, anciently called the Glaslin or Glasson, which here forms a capacious and secure harbour. The streets rise in a singular and irregular manner on the acclivity of an eminence called Compass Hill, the houses ranging tier above tier, most of them on sites excavated in the solid rock, or placed on the level of some projecting crag; the descent is dangerously steep, and the streets are inaccessible to carriages except from the summit of the hill, or from the main street, which takes an irregular course along the shore of the harbour. The total number of houses, many of which are well built and of handsome appearance, was, in 1831, 1266; and in 1841, 1707. The town is paved, and amply supplied with good water from numerous springs. It is much frequented during the season for sea-bathing, and several villas and cottages have been built in the village of Scilly and in the Cove, for the accommodation of visitors. It was lately in contemplation to build a bridge across the ferry on the river, from the town to Courcy's territory; and a new line of road to Bandon has been completed. The environs embrace some fine views of the sea, the harbour, and the estuaries which indent the adjacent country: the banks of the river are embellished with thriving plantations, and with several gentlemen's seats; and around the summit of Compass Hill is a pleasant walk, commanding a splendid view of the harbour and the windings of the Bandon. On the east of the town is Charles Fort, commanded by a governor and fort-major, and containing barracks for 16 officers and 332 non-commissioned officers and privates. There are two small libraries, supported by proprietaries of £5 shareholders and annual subscribers; a regatta was formerly held in July or August, and boat-races take place occasionally. A handsome suite of assembly-rooms has been built, and on the ground floor of the same building is a reading and news room.

The trade of the PORT, from its proximity to that of Cork, is but inconsiderable in proportion to its local advantages: it consists chiefly in the export of agricultural produce, and cattle, sheep, and pigs, the estimated value of which, in a recent year, was £13,479; and the import of timber from British America, and coal, iron, and salt from England and Wales, the estimated value of which, in the same year, was £18,262. The number of vessels that entered inwards from foreign parts, during the year 1835, was five, of the aggregate burthen of 1062 tons, and one cleared outwards with passengers; in the coasting-trade, during the same year, 62 vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 12,753 tons, entered inwards, and 34, of the aggregate burthen of 5201 tons, cleared outwards. The staple trade of the town is the fishery, in which 87 small vessels or large boats, called hookers, of the aggregate burthen of 1300 tons, are constantly employed, exclusively of several smaller boats. Sprats and herrings are taken in seins within the harbour and bay, as far as the Old Head; haddock, mackerel, turbot, gurnet, cod, ling, hake, and larger fish, in the open sea; and salmon, in almost every part of the river. The value of the fishery is estimated, on an average, at £30,000 per annum. The Kinsale fishermen have long been noted for the goodness of their boats and their excellent seamanship: their services in supplying the markets of Cork and other neighbouring towns, and their skill as pilots, procured for them exemption from impressment during the last war.

The HARBOUR consists of the circling reach of the river, and a broad inlet which separates the town from the village of Scilly; and, though much less extensive than that of Cork, is deep, secure, and compact, being completely land-locked by lofty hills. It is defended by Charles Fort, nearly abreast of which is a bar having only 12 feet of water at low spring tides. The entrance is marked by two lofty lights; one in Charles Fort for the use of the harbour, a small fixed light, elevated 98 feet above high-water mark and visible at the distance of six nautical miles; and the other on the Old Head, consisting of 27 lamps having an elevation of 294 feet above the level of the sea at high water, and displaying a bright fixed light visible at a distance of 23 nautical miles. Vessels arriving at low water, and drawing more than 11 feet, must wait the rising of the tide before they can proceed across the bar. The usual anchorage is off the village of Cove, about a cable's length from the shore; but there is water enough for the largest ships any where in the channel of the river, which lies close along the eastern shore up to the town. The river is navigable for vessels of 200 tons to Colliers' quay, 12 miles above the town. At Old Head is a coast-guard station, which is the head of the district of Kinsale, including those of Upper Cove, Oyster Haven, Old Head, How's Strand, Court-M'Sherry, Barry's Cove, Dunny Cove, and Dirk Cove; the whole comprising a force of 8 officers and 63 men, under the superintendence of a resident inspecting commander. The inhabitants, in expectation of assistance from government, lately subscribed £4000 towards the erection of a bridge over the Bandon, the expense of which was estimated at £9000; but their application was not successful. The erection of a bridge at this place would open in a direct line the whole of the western coast as far as Baltimore, comprehending 180,000 acres of a rich agricultural district, and would greatly promote the trade of the port and the prosperity of the town, which suffered greatly by the removal of the dock-yard and other public establishments. In the town is a large ale-brewery and malting establishment; and in the neighbourhood are several flour-mills. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on May 4th, Sept. 4th, and Nov. 21st, for horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, farming utensils, friezes, coarse flannels, and other articles. Two mails from Cork and one from Bandon pass daily through Kinsale. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town.

The charter of INCORPORATION granted by Edward III. was confirmed and extended by subsequent sovereigns to the time of Elizabeth, who by patent dated May 10th, in the 31st year of her reign, confirmed all former privileges and possessions; extended the limits of the corporate jurisdiction; gave the sovereign and commons the authority of admiral, searcher, and gauger, from the Old Head to the Durseys; constituted the sovereign, recorder, and two of the ancient burgesses, justices of the peace and of gaol delivery; and granted markets on Wednesday and Friday, and a fair on St. Bartholomew's-day and for three days after. This charter, upon which the corporation acted and regulated its proceedings until the passing of the act 3d and 4th of Victoria, cap. 108, was, together with all preceding charters, ratified by James I., who, in 1609, confirmed to the sovereign and commons all their rights, liberties, and possessions, excepting only the sovereign's appointment of admiral, which he transferred to the constable of the fortress of Castle-ni-Park; and on account of their sufferings from the Spanish invasion, the king granted them an annual rent of £20 for 21 years, which was in part subsequently continued. In the 19th of that reign a charter was bestowed incorporating a mayor, two constables, and merchants of the staple, with the same privileges as had been granted to Youghal. All subsequent grants were merely fairs or pecuniary aids, with the exception of a new charter by James II., in 1688, which did not continue in force. The corporation, down to 1840, consisted of a sovereign and an indefinite number of burgesses and freemen, assisted by a common-speaker, recorder, town-clerk (who was also clerk of the crown and peace), chamberlain, two serjeants-at-mace, a water-bailiff, and other officers. The sovereign and all other officers of the corporation were elected by the court of d'oyer hundred, consisting of the members of the corporation generally; and the burgesses and freemen were chosen solely by the council, which consisted of the sovereign, common-speaker, and burgesses. The sovereign, who was a justice of the peace for the borough and for the county, and also coroner for the borough, was chosen annually on the 29th of June (and sworn into office on the 29th of September); and the other officers, as vacancies occurred, on the first Monday after Michaelmas-day. In 1840, the inhabitants adopted the 9th of George IV., cap. 82, for cleansing and lighting.

It is not known exactly at what time the borough first exercised the elective franchise, but it returned two members to parliament long prior to 1652, and continued to do so without interruption till the Union, since which time it has returned only one to the Imperial parliament. The right of election, previously vested in the corporation, was, by the act of the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, extended to the £10 householders; the total number of registered electors in 1841 was 300, of whom 277 were £10 householders, and 23 freemen. The old municipal borough and liberties comprised an area of 11,000 acres, within the jurisdiction of the borough magistrates; a new parliamentary boundary was in 1832 drawn close round the town, including the village of Scilly, and comprising an area of 273 acres. By the act of the 59th of George III., cap. 84, the borough and liberties, for the purposes of county taxation, were constituted a distinct barony. The corporation used to hold a court of record (before the sovereign and recorder, or either of them) for the determination of pleas to any amount within the town and liberties, which latter extended up the Bandon river above Innishannon, eastward to Oyster haven, and westward to every harbour, bay, and creek, as far as Dursey Island. Sessions were held twice in the year before the sovereign, recorder, and two associate justices selected from the elder burgesses, with exclusive jurisdiction in all cases not capital; and a court of conscience is still held every Wednesday, for the recovery of debts under 40*s.* late currency. The town-hall is a spacious and neat building, commodiously adapted to the public business and for holding courts. The borough gaol is also commodious, and well adapted to the classification of the prisoners.

The late municipal borough comprised the whole of the parish of Kinsale or St. Multose, and a small portion of the parish of Rincurran. The former contains only 379 statute acres, principally in demesnes; the scenery is highly interesting, and strikingly diversified. The chief seats are Garretstown, Ballymartle, Ballintober, Rathmore, Knockduffe, Snugmore, Heathfield, Fort Arthur, Knockrobbin, and Pallastown. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in T. C. Kearney, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £24. 17., half payable to the impropriator, and half to the vicar, whose income is augmented by an assessment for minister's money, at present amounting to £87. The glebe-house, which is near the church, was built in 1811, by a gift of £400 and a loan of £360 from the Board of First Fruits. The glebe is situated on the western side of the town, and comprises 3 acres. The church, dedicated to St. Multosia, by whom it is said to have been erected in the 14th century as the conventual church of a monastery she had founded, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, for the repair and enlargement of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £1361. It contains two handsome monuments of Italian marble; one of them to various members of the Southwell family, settled here in the reign of Charles I.; the other, which is beautifully executed, to the memory of Catharine, relict of Sir John Perceval, Bart., and of the same family: there is also a monument of white marble to Captain T. Lawrence and his lady, erected in 1724, with their armorial bearings. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a union comprising also the parishes of Rincurran, Dunderrow, and Teighsasson or Taxax. The principal chapel is a spacious edifice, erected in 1834 by subscription, and has an altar-piece embellished with paintings of the principal events in the life of Christ. There is a small chapel belonging to the Carmelite friary, and a handsome Carmelite chapel of greater size is now in course of erection; the cost of this building, which stands north-west of the town, will exceed £2000: there is also a chapel at Ballinamona. The parish contains places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists. Of the various schools, the grammar school has an endowment partly by the corporation, and partly by the family of De Clifford, of King's-Weston, in the county of Gloucester, producing a salary of £50 for the master, who has also a large house, play-ground, and garden, given by the Southwell family. A fever hospital and a dispensary have been established. An institution called the Gift House, in which eight widows of decayed Protestant tradesmen receive a weekly allowance of two shillings, is supported by the Southwell family; and there is an ancient parochial almshouse, containing 16 rooms for superannuated poor, each of whom receives a portion of the weekly contributions at the church. The union workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £100 subject to a rent of £16. 10. per annum, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £5900, and is constructed to receive 500 paupers.

There were formerly an abbey of Canons Regular, of which Colgan says St. Gobban, disciple of St. Ailbe, was abbot in the 7th century; and an abbey of Carmelite friars, founded, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, by Robert Fitz-Richard Balrain, in 1334; but there are no remains of either. On the promontory on the opposite side of the river, are extensive remains of the old fortress of Castle-ni-Park; it was of hexagonal form, with bastions at the angles: the towers, intrenchments, and fosse are nearly entire. Of the town walls, which were destroyed in 1690, three of the gates were remaining till near the close of the last century; Nicholas-gate was removed in 1794, Friars-gate in 1796, and Cork-gate in 1805: a small portion of the last may still be seen, on the north side of Cork-street; and in Newman-place may be traced the only portion of the walls now remaining. Near the village of Scilly, and near Charles Fort, are valuable chalybeate springs, formerly much resorted to, and still generally regarded as an excellent tonic. This town gives the very ancient title of Baron Kingsale to the family of De Courcy, originally created in 1181. His lordship is premier baron of Ireland; he has the privilege (granted by King John to De Courcy, Earl of Ulster,) of wearing his hat in the royal presence, which was asserted by the late John, Baron Kingsale, at Dublin Castle, before his late Majesty George IV., on his visit to Ireland in August, 1821. He has also the privilege of having a cover laid for him at the royal table at coronations, and on all other state occasions.

KINSALEBEG, a parish, in the union of Dungarvan, barony of Decies-within-Drum, county of Waterford, and province of Munster, separated from the town of Youghal by the river Blackwater; containing 3250 inhabitants. The parish comprises 5789 statute acres. The soil is fertile; and there is a ferry to Youghal: at Piltown is a large flour-mill. The principal seats are D'Laughtane House, Monatrea, Mayfield, Woodbine Hill, Springfield, Bayview, Rock Lodge, Harbour View, and Ring. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, united to that of Lisgenan, and in the gift of the Duke of Devonshire, in whom the rectory is impropriate: the tithe rent-charge of Kinsalebeg is £607. 11., two-thirds payable to the impropriator and one-third to the vicar; and the tithe of the entire vicarial benefice is £352. 10. The glebe of the union comprises 12 acres. The church is a neat structure, erected by a gift of £600 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1821. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clashmore, and has a chapel at Piltown. Near D'Laughtane House was formerly a castle, called Ballyheny: Piltown was the residence of Judge Walsh, the supposed author of the commission to the insurgents in the reign of Charles I. There is a large rath in the parish.

KINSEALY, a parish, in the union of Balrothery, barony of Coolock, county of Dublin, and province of Leinster, 1½ mile (S.) from Malahide; containing 718 inhabitants. It comprises 2129 statute acres, and is well cultivated: Feltrim Hill, on which are the remains of an encampment, command magnificent sea and mountain views. Under this hill is a limestone-quarry, in which fossils are frequently found, and near it is a holy well. Abbeville, a spacious mansion, was erected by the late Right Hon. J. C. Beresford; in the gardens is a green-house more than 400 feet long. The other seats are Greenwood, Feltrim, Auburne, Clairville, and Kinsealy House. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, forming part of the union of Swords; the rectory is appropriate to the economy estate of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, and the tithe rent-charge is £168. 12., one-third payable to the lessee of the economy estate, and two-thirds to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kinsealy forms part of the district of Baldoyle and Howth; a small neat chapel with a spire was erected here by subscription in 1834. The church, which was dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a picturesque ruin covered with ivy.

KINVARRA, a market, post, and sea-port town, and a parish, in the union of Gort, barony of Kiltartan, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 7 miles (N. W.) from Gort, and on the bay of Kinvarra, which is within the bay of Galway; containing 6586 inhabitants, of whom 959 are in the town. About the reign of Henry VIII., Rory More Darag O'Shaughnessy took the castle of Doon, here, from Flan Killikelly; totally demolished it; and erected one near its site, which he named Doongorey. In 1642 this became the property of Thomas Taylor, who encircled it with a strong bawn or wall; and it is now in a good state of preservation. On the 1st of November, 1755, the day of the earthquake at Lisbon, a castle on the western boundary of the parish, which had formerly belonged to the O'Heynes, was destroyed to its foundation, and a portion of it swallowed up; and at the same time, the chimneys and battlements of Cahirglissane rocked, and then fell into a chasm formed by rending the rock to the depth of several fathoms. The parish, with that of Duras, comprises 11,289½ statute acres, and is moderately well cultivated, producing excellent wheat; sea-weed is used as a manure, and limestone is abundant. Fresh water is scarce, but attempts are being made to obtain a larger supply. The town, in 1841, contained 160 houses; it has a sub-post office to Ardrahan, and is a constabulary police station. The market is on Wednesdays and Fridays, and great quantities of corn are sold; fairs are held on May 18th and Oct. 17th, principally for the sale of sheep. A quay, about 50 yards long, was built here in 1773 by J. Ffrench, Esq., great-grandfather of the present Baron de Basterot; it was lengthened and raised in 1807, and such an addition was made to it in 1808 as converted it into a kind of dock. At high tide there are 12 feet of water at the pier, which is then accessible to vessels of 150 tons' burthen. Sea-weed to the value of £20,000 is landed here during the spring, from boats, of which from 60 to 100 sometimes arrive in one tide. It has been proposed to establish a steam-vessel, to ply regularly between this place and Galway; and a canal hence to the river Fergus would greatly benefit the intervening country, by facilitating the importation of sea-weed, sea-sand, and turf, and the exportation of corn. The principal seats are Thorn Hill, Northampton, and Sea Mount.

The parish is a prebend, rectory, and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh: the rectory is appropriate to the see, and the prebend partly to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin, and the benefice of Ardrahan; the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilcolgan. The tithe rent-charge is £196. 10., of which £39. 7. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £18 to the prebendary, £26. 5. to the vicars-choral, £70. 17. 6. to the incumbent of Ardrahan, and the remainder to the vicar. There is a glebe of 3½ acres. The gross yearly revenue of the prebend, arising from portions of tithe of various parishes, is about £56. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising the parishes of Kinvarra, Duras, and Killina, and has a large chapel, erected in 1816 at an expense of £2000, on land given by the Baron de Basterot, with a neatly planted burial-ground; there is also a chapel at Duras Park, erected at the expense of P. M. Lynch, Esq. This is the benefice and residence of the Roman Catholic bishop of Kilmacduagh and Kilfenora. There are some remains of the church, which was for ages the burial-place of the O'Haynes and Magraths, no others being allowed to be interred within its walls. Near the shore are two extensive subterraneous caverns. A castle stood near the pier, but its materials have been used in building.

KIPPOGUE.—See Cappog.

KIRCUBBIN, a market and post town, in the parish of Innishargy, union of Newtown-Ardes, barony of Ardes, county of Down, and province of Ulster, 8¾ miles (S. E.) from Newtown-Ardes, and 96¼ (N. by E.) from Dublin, on the road from Belfast to Portaferry; containing 623 inhabitants. This town, which is situated on the shore of Strangford lough, is of very recent origin, having been built since the year 1790, previously to which time there were not more than five houses in the place. The present town contains 136 houses, for the greater part neatly built; and the inhabitants carry on a small but prosperous trade. The manufacture of straw hats and bonnets, of which great numbers are sent every year into the interior, affords employment to most of the industrious female population of the town and adjoining parishes; large quantities of kelp are burned and sent annually to Liverpool, and corn and potatoes are shipped hence for the Liverpool and Glasgow markets to a considerable extent. The situation of the town, close to which is an excellent landing-place, affords every facility of conveyance by land and water. A sub-post office here is in connexion with Newtown-Ardes. The market is held every third Wednesday, and is well supplied with provisions of every kind and with brown linens; fairs are held on the 28th of April, May, August, and November. A market-house, with a brown-linen hall in the rear of it, was erected by the late Hon. Robert Ward; the same family more recently expended a considerable sum in the erection of quays for the greater convenience of shipping the produce of the neighbourhood. A court leet and baron is held every three weeks by the seneschal of the manor, in which pleas are entertained to the amount of £20, with jurisdiction over all the parishes of the union; and the magistrates hold a petty-session here every alternate Monday. The district forms a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Down, and patronage of Trustees.

KIRKDONNELL.—See Dundonald.

KIRKINRIOLA, or Kirconriola, a parish, in the union of Ballymena, barony of Lower Toome, county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, on the road from Belfast to Londonderry; containing, with the post-town of Ballymena (which is separately described), 8843 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Kilconriola and Ballymena, comprises 6390 statute acres, in a very indifferent state of cultivation. The soil is light and sandy, in some parts intermixed with stones, and consequently unproductive without great labour and expense; the farms are small, and chiefly in the occupation of persons who, dividing their attention between agriculture and the spinning of yarn and the weaving of linen, expend but little capital on the land, and pay but little attention to its improvement. There are considerable tracts of waste and a large extent of bog. In the valley of the river Braid are indications of coal, but no mines have yet been opened; and there are extensive quarries of stone in several parts of the parish, from which was raised all the stone for building the houses and bridges in the town and neighbourhood. The principal seats are The Green, Hugomont, Brigadie, and Ballygarvey.

Before the dissolution of religious houses, this parish was an appropriation of Muckamore Abbey. It is now an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Connor; the rectory is impropriate, by purchase from the Earl of Mountcashel, in William Adair, Esq., and the tithe rent-charge is £167. 13., the whole payable to the impropriator. The stipend of the curate is £82 per annum, of which £31. 10. are paid by the impropriator, £32. 10. from Primate Boulter's Augmentation fund, and £18 from a tenement in Ballymena. The glebe-house, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £73. 16., in 1823, is near the church; the glebe comprises six acres, valued at £16 per annum. The church was built in 1712, at the extremity of the parish, for the convenience of the town, and was repaired and enlarged in 1822, for which purpose a loan of £100 was granted by the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Ballymena, and comprising also the parish of Ballyclug: there are chapels at Ballymena and Crebilly; also three places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. Guy's free school is supported by a bequest of the late John Guy, Esq.; the school-house was built at an expense of between £400 and £500, and the master has a house and garden rent-free: there are numerous other schools, the master of one of which, the diocesan school, receives a salary of £120 per annum. Some remains exist of the ancient parish church, which appears to have been a spacious and handsome structure; but they are diminishing rapidly by the removal of the materials, for gravestones. There are several encampments in the parish; the most conspicuous is on the high grounds above Ballingarvey, near which, in the townland of Bottom, is a fine circular fortress, surrounded by a fosse and vallum. Not far from the glebe-house was a mass of rock, 30 feet in circumference and 8 feet high, called the Standing stone, of which no tradition is extant; it was blown up in the year 1841. Near the town of Ballymena, on the bank of the Braid water, and situated opposite Ballymena Castle, is a very remarkable moat rising from the brink of the river to a great height, and now covered with a plantation.

KNAVENSTOWN, a parish, in the union of Athy, barony of West Ophaly, county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Kildare, and on the road from Monastereven to Rathangan; containing 65 inhabitants. This small parish, which is situated on the Grand Canal, comprises 618¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare; the rectory is appropriate to the dean and chapter, and the vicarage until lately formed the corps of the treasurership of the cathedral of Kildare, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £9. 9., payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as vicarial tithe; the rectorial tithes have never been brought under any valuation, but have from time immemorial been let with the lands. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe; the members of the Established Church attend divine service at the church of Lackagh. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kildare.

KNIGH, a parish, in the poor-law union of Nenagh, barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2¾ miles (N.) from Nenagh, and near the river Shannon; containing 1572 inhabitants. The parish comprises 4515 statute acres. The principal seats are Riverview and Ballyhenny. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Nenagh: the tithe rent-charge is £214. 12. 4. There are some remains of the church, covered with ivy; and of the castle of Knigh, near which is a fine limestone-quarry.

KNOCK, a village or post-town, in the parish of Kilmurry, union of Kilrush, barony of Clonderlaw, county of Clare, and province of Munster, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Kildysart, on the road to Kilrush; containing 115 inhabitants. It is beautifully situated on the north-western side of Clonderlaw bay, and comprises 26 houses, several of which are ornamented in the rustic style and have tastefully disposed shrubberies and gardens attached. It is a station of the constabulary police, and petty-sessions are held weekly on Friday. Here is a small pier, where sea manure is landed, and whence corn is occasionally forwarded in boats to Limerick.

KNOCK, or Knockdrumcalry, a parish, in the union of Swinford, partly in the barony of Clanmorris, but chiefly in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, 5 miles (E.) from Clare, and on the road from Claremorris to Swinford; containing 3374 inhabitants. The parish comprises 11,704½ statute acres, and is partly under an improving system of tillage; there is a great quantity of bog. The principal seats are Ballyhoole and Aden. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Kiltullagh; the tithe rent-charge is £28. 4. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Aughamore; in each is a chapel.

KNOCK, or Knough, a parish, in the union of Navan, barony of Morgallion, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Nobber, on the road to Slane; containing 602 inhabitants. The place is said to have been the site of a priory founded in 1148, and dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, by Donchad Hua Kervail, prince of the territory, and Edan Coollaidhe, Bishop of Clogher, for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine; but there are no vestiges of the establishment, nor have any particulars of its history been recorded. The parish comprises 975¾ statute acres; there is a tract of bog, which extends into the adjoining parishes, but it is nearly exhausted. Gravelmount is a spacious and handsome house; the demesne comprises about 160 statute acres, and the grounds are tastefully laid out. A manufacture of tiles, garden-pots, and all kinds of coarse pottery, is carried on. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Castletown-Kilpatrick; the tithe rent-charge is £51. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish also forms part of the union or district of Castletown-Kilpatrick. There are some very slight remains of an ancient church.

KNOCKADERRY, a village, in the parish of Clonelty, union of Rathkeale, barony of Glenquin, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 4 miles (N. E.) from Newcastle, on the road to Ballingarry; containing 73 houses, and 366 inhabitants. Fairs are held on Ascension-day, Sept. 9th, Oct. 29th, and Dec. 19th, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. Not far from the village is Knockaderry House, the ancient seat of the D'Arcy family; it is pleasantly situated beneath the shelter of a hill, and surrounded by thriving plantations. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in the village; also a national school.

KNOCKANE, a parish, in the union of Killarney, barony of Dunkerron, county of Kerry, and province of Munster, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Killarney; containing 5191 inhabitants. This very extensive parish is situated on the river Laune, which, flowing from the Lower Lake of Killarney into the harbour of Castlemaine, forms its northern boundary; and also on the river Blackwater, by which it is bounded on the west. It comprehends an area more than 40 miles in circumference, and comprises 57,993 statute acres. With the exception of some low grounds near the Laune, the parish is chiefly occupied by a lofty and extensive range of mountains, called "M'Gillycuddy's Reeks" from the ancient and powerful sept of that name, who from a very remote period were lords of this territory, and whose descendants are still resident here. During the wars of Elizabeth, and also during those of Cromwell, these mountains were the secure retreat of this sept, one of which, Donogh, having embraced the peace offered by the Marquess of Ormonde, raised several companies of foot for the king's service, obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army of the Earl of Clancartie, and afterwards commanded Lord Muskerry's regiment at the siege of Limerick, where he was taken prisoner. The principal of the mountains is Garran Tual, which rises to the height of 3404 feet above the level of the sea, being the most elevated point in Ireland. The approach to it from Sir A. Blennerhasset's shooting-lodge is between ridges of rock, through a long and wide valley which gradually contracts itself into a narrow passage called the Hag's Glen, of terrific wildness; and the way is continued along the brow of a rocky precipice overhanging one of the lakes, of which there are several in this mountainous region, and under a projecting crag called the Hag's Tooth through a very confined passage hemmed in with huge masses of rugged rock. From the summit is a most magnificent view, embracing the course of the Shannon from Loop Head to Limerick, with a large portion of the county of Clare; the bays of Dingle and Castlemaine; the Tralee bay and mountains, to the north-west; and, to the south and west, the Bantry mountains, the Dursey islands, and the coast of Kerry with its numerous inlets. Of the lakes in the interior, Lough Cara is the most conspicuous; part only of the Lower Lake of Killarney is visible from Garran Tual, the other being concealed by the intervening heights. The remaining Reeks range in parallel ridges; on several are small lakes, and the view to the south-west comprehends a beautiful expanse of mountain scenery, including the Glencar mountain and others, intersected with deep glens and extensive wilds. The Reeks consist of soft argillaceous schistus or sandstone, large masses of which frequently detach themselves and roll down; the larger rocks are of a grey silicious stone intersected with thick veins of quartz, and in the interstices are found small hexaedral prisms of rock-crystal, and some coarse amethysts.

Between the Purple mountain and M'Gillycuddy's Reeks, is a singular defile called the Gap of Dunloe or Dunlogh. The entrance is extremely narrow; and the mountains on each side rise perpendicularly to a towering height, throwing a deep shadow on the waters of a lake, between which, on one side, and the lofty cliff on the other, is a narrow road in which are scattered masses of broken rock: these impede the progress of carriages beyond a certain point, and impending crags of threatening aspect render the passage to pedestrians apparently hazardous. Several small bridges are thrown over the stream which runs through the defile. This pass opens into the valley of Coome Dhuve, at the western extremity of which is a very considerable lough, called the Red-Trout lake; and opposite the termination of the defile, is a beautiful waterfall of great height, the water of which descends into a succession of small lakes that occupy the whole extent of the valley. The Gap affords excellent pasturage for sheep; it was formerly covered with wood. From a bank on the south side is a splendid view of the Upper Lake of Killarney, with its richly wooded islands and surrounding mountains, among which the ornamental tower at Gheramine is seen to great advantage.

The lands under cultivation are chiefly in tillage, but a very large portion of the parish is mountain pasture; the soil is light and gravelly, and interspersed with tracts of bog. The system of agriculture is gradually improving: at Manus is a limestone-quarry, which is extensively worked, chiefly for agricultural purposes; at Glencare is a small slate-quarry, and slate is also found in the Gap of Dunloe. Dunloe Castle, formerly the residence of the O'Sullivan family, was built by the O'Sullivan More, by whose descendant it was occupied at the time of its bombardment by General Ireton during the parliamentary war: it is situated about a mile from the Lower Lake of Killarney, on a steep bank rising from the river Laune, and in the midst of a thickly wooded demesne, and commands a fine view of the Lower Lake, and of the scenery of the Gap, with the M'Gillycuddy mountains. The other seats are, Beaufort House, built on the site of Short Castle; Whitefield, the residence of M'Gillicuddy of the Reeks; Churchtown, of Sir A. Blennerhasset; Cullina; and Glencare. There are also several sporting-lodges near Lough Cara, the beauty of which has been much increased by the plantations of M'Gillicuddy of the Reeks. The river Laune produces excellent salmon, and the mountains abound with wild-fowl and other game. The small village of Blackstones is surrounded by rocky hills and high mountains, in the rugged crags of which the yew, holly, and arbutus grow in wild luxuriance. To the north are two considerable lakes formed by the river Cara, and inclosed by lofty mountains; from the lower of which, the river flows into Dingle bay. Iron-works were established by Sir William Petty, and carried on till the middle of the last century, when they were discontinued for want of fuel, the timber of the neighbourhood being wholly exhausted: the hops and garden roses planted by the English settlers still grow here in a wild state. Fairs are held at Kilgobbinett on Feb. 11th and Dec. 21st; the former is a great fair for pigs, which are frequently sold to the amount of £4000. There is a police station at Beaufort, and petty-sessions are held at Tuagh every month.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £198: the glebe-house was built in 1825, by a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1828: there is a glebe of 20 acres. The church, a plain structure with a square tower, was originally built in 1812, by a gift of £800 from the same Board; but, having been burnt during the disturbances in 1822, was rebuilt in 1825, by a loan of £240 from the Board of Public Works. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, with the exception of Glencare, forms part of the district of Killorglin; there is a chapel at Tuagh, and another at Glencare, which latter is in the district of Glenbegh. At Cullina are two national schools, towards the erection of the house for which the late Colonel Mahony bequeathed £100, and Kean Mahony, Esq., gives two acres of land towards their support. Near Churchtown are the ruins of Castle Cor, formerly the residence of the M'Gillycuddy family. Some remains exist of the old church, in the burial-ground; and at Kilgobbinett and Killoghane are those of other churches, or chapels of ease, the latter of which was dependent on Castle Cor. In the reign of Elizabeth, Glencare gave the title of Earl to Donald Mac Carty More, by whose descendants it was forfeited.

KNOCKANEY.—See ANEY.

KNOCKANURE, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Listowel, and on the river Feale; containing 1358 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the confines of the county of Limerick, comprises 5950 statute acres; about one-half consists of good arable land, and the remainder of coarse mountain pasture and bog. The only seat is Riversdale. The parish is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory, which in 1607 was granted by James I. to Sir James Fullerton, is now impropriate in Anthony Stoughton, Esq.; the vicarage forms part of the union of Aghavillin, also called the union of Listowel. Of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £58. 16. 11., two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Newtownsandes; the chapel, at Knockanure, is a small thatched building. The ruins of the church still exist, in the burial-ground.

KNOCKAVILLY, or KNOCKAVILLE, a parish, in the union of BANDON, partly in the barony of KINNALEA, but chiefly in that of EAST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Bandon, on the road to Cork; containing 2078 inhabitants. It comprises 6210 statute acres. The land is generally good, although light and based on clay-slate, and is admirably cultivated; the manure is lime brought from Ahirlow, or sea-sand from Innishannon. The principal seats are, Upton, the residence of the Rev. Somers H. Payne, who has erected a handsome barrack for a party of constabulary police in his demesne; Garryhankard; and Beechmount. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork; the tithe rent-charge is £487. 10., and the glebe comprises 54 acres of excellent land. Divine service, hitherto performed in a room licensed by the bishop, is now celebrated in a church, recently erected, and consecrated in May, 1844; it stands in the glebe, on a site given by the rector, the Rev. W. L. Beaufort, and was built at an expense of £666, whereof £566 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Knockavilly forms part of the district of Innishannon, and has a large handsome chapel. Here is a parochial school of 40 children, which Mr. Justin M'Carty has endowed with an acre of land, and to which the rector contributes £10, and the Church Education Society £5, annually; also a Sunday school.

KNOCKBREDA, or KNOCK-with-BREDA, a parish, partly in the barony of LOWER, but chiefly in that of UPPER, CASTLEREAGH, union of BELFAST, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 2¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Belfast, on the road to Downpatrick; containing, with Ballymacarrett, 10,627 inhabitants. The ancient fortress called Castle-Reagh, or "the Royal Castle," which gives name to the barony, was the baronial residence of a branch of the O'Nials. It is said to have been erected in the reign of Edward III. by Aodh Flann, whose descendants possessed the Great Ardes, Toome, Massereene, Shankill or Belfast, and Carrickfergus. By inquisition in the reign of Elizabeth it appeared that Con O'Nial, the last of that powerful sept, possessed this castle, together with 224 townlands, which were all freehold, and also many others held by various tenures. In 1602, O'Nial having exhausted his cellars during a grand banquet which he gave here, sent some of his soldiers to Belfast to procure more wine; and the men there meeting with a party of the queen's soldiers, a battle ensued, and O'Nial was sent prisoner to Carrickfergus Castle, but was liberated the year following by the master of a Scottish trading vessel and conveyed to Scotland, where Sir Hugh Montgomery, in consequence of a surrender of most of his lands, obtained a pardon for him from James I., who had just ascended the English throne. After the decease of O'Nial, the castle fell into decay, and with the adjoining lands was purchased by the Hillsborough family; there are now no vestiges of it.

The parish is bounded on the north and west by the river Lagan, over which are two bridges connecting it with the parish of Belfast; and is intersected by the great Scottish road by way of Donaghadee. It comprises 8095¼ statute acres, of which 6968¾ are in the Upper and 1129½ in the Lower barony: the lands are chiefly under tillage, and in a high state of cultivation; there is neither bog nor waste land. Large quantities of tobacco were grown previously to its cultivation being prohibited. There are extensive quarries of clay-slate for building, and for repairing the roads; and on the townland of Gillinahirk was lately opened a fine quarry of basalt, of which a bridge has been built at Belfast over the river Lagan, which is navigable along the whole boundary of the parish. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and within the limits of Knockbreda are, Ormeau, the seat of the Marquess of Donegal; Belvoir Park, the residence of Sir R. Bateson, Bart.; Purdysburn, the splendid mansion of Narcissus Batt, Esq., built after a design by Hopper, in 1825, in the Elizabethan style; Orangefield; Fort Breda; Cherry Vale; and Ravenhill.

Previously to 1658 there were two separate parishes, called respectively Knock and Breda, and both rectories; but the church of the latter being in ruins, they were united into one rectory at the restoration of Charles II. The two villages long since disappeared, and a parish church was in 1747 built in the village of Newtown-Breda, which see. The rectory is in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of Sir R. Bateson, who purchased the advowson in 1825; the tithe rent-charge is £439. 14. The glebe-house was built in 1816, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £825 from the Board of First Fruits: the glebe comprises nearly 20 statute acres. Ballymacarrett was formerly in this parish, but was separated by act of parliament in 1825, and made a distinct parish, by permission of the Rev. John Kinahan, the rector, who had a church built by subscription, and endowed the minister with £50 per annum out of the tithes of Knockbreda, which sum was afterwards augmented by the Board of First Fruits to £100: the living is in the gift of the Rector for the time being. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and Covenanters. Six almshouses, built by subscription in 1810, were endowed with £100 by the Rev. Mr. Pratt, late rector, who also bequeathed £100 to the poor; to whom Lady Midleton, in 1747, had left £50. On an eminence near the south-eastern extremity of the parish, are the picturesque ruins of Knock church; and near them are the remains of a cromlech, consisting of five large stones; and a Danish rath of conical form. Of Breda church there are no remains, except the cemetery inclosed with a high stone wall in Belvoir Park, in which is a small mausoleum built by Arthur Hill Trevor, who was created Viscount Dungannon in 1765.

KNOCKBRIDE, a parish, in the union of COOTEHILL, barony of CLONKEE, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 5 miles (N.) from Bailieborough, on the road to Cootehill; containing 10,603 inhabitants. This parish comprises 18,693 statute acres, of which 857 are under water; there are about 1500 acres of bog and waste, the remainder being good arable and pasture land. Here is a large oatmeal-mill. A court is held monthly at Corronary, by the seneschal of the manor, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £262. 10. The glebe-house, situated near the church, was built in 1821 by a gift of £100 and a loan of £550 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 188 acres. The church, a small but very neat edifice in good repair, was built by a gift of £100 and a loan of £550 from the Board, in 1820. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: there are two chapels, one a good substantial edifice, erected in 1821; the other built more recently. Here is also a place of worship for Presbyterians, and one for Wesleyan Methodists.

KNOCKCOMON, or KNOCKMOON, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER DULEEK, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Slane; on the road from Navan to Drogheda, and on the river Boyne; containing 1000 inhabitants. The parish comprises 3500 statute acres. It is a curacy, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Duleek; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Drogheda, to whom the tithe rent-charge, £111, is payable. In the Roman Catholic divisions Knockcomon forms part of the district of Donore, or Rosnaree, at which latter place is a neat modern chapel; there is another at the Cross of Rathdrinath.

KNOCKCROGHERY, a village, in the parish of KILLENVOY, barony of ATHLONE, union and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 5 miles (S. E.) from Roscommon; containing 263 inhabitants. It consists of 46 houses, built on a hill; and has fairs on Aug. 22nd and Oct. 25th, the latter of which is a large sheep-fair. Here is a constabulary police station; and the manufacture of tobacco-pipes is carried on to a considerable extent.

KNOCKEA.—See CAHIRVALLAGH.

KNOCKGRAFFON, a parish, in the union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Cashel, on the road to Cahir; containing 3296 inhabitants. It comprises 9873 statute acres, and is moderately well cultivated; there is no bog, and the waste land is rapidly being brought into cultivation: here are several limestone-quarries. The principal seats are Rockwell, Westgrove, Garranlera, and Woodinstown. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Cashel, episcopally united in 1803 to the rectory of Doggstown, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Ormonde; the tithe rent-charge of Knockgraffon is £533. 1. 6., and of the entire benefice £553. 16. The glebe-house was built in 1790, at a cost exceeding £1400, by the then incumbent; the glebe comprises 40 acres. The church is a neat edifice, erected in 1788 by parochial assessment. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called New Inn, comprising this parish and Doggstown, in each of which is a chapel. The parochial school-house, with an acre of land, was given by the late rector. At Poolmucka is a dispensary. The moat of Knockgraffon covers a very considerable area, and, from its great elevation, forms a conspicuous object: contiguous are the ruins of the old church and of a castle; and a town or large village is supposed to have existed here formerly.

KNOCKLONG, or LONG, a parish, in the union of KILMALLOCK, barony of COSTLEA, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (S. E.) from Bruff, and on the road from Limerick to Mitchelstown; containing 1963 inhabitants. It comprises 4442 statute acres, about one-fourth of which is under tillage, and the remainder consists of rich meadow and pasture land, principally in large dairy-farms. The soil is in general very good, being based on limestone, of which there are two quarries; here is also abundance of bog. A butter-market is held on Tuesdays; and fairs are held at Knocklong on May 23rd and Oct. 1st, for fat-cattle, sheep, and pigs; the October fair has a large show of horses: fairs are also held at Knocktoran, on March 3rd, April 6th, July 29th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 20th. The Morning-Star river, which bounds the parish on the southern side, contains very fine trout. Knocklong is a vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, forming part of the union of Ancy; the rectory is impropriate in the Earl of Limerick, and the tithe rent-charge is £316. 19., two-thirds payable to the impropriator, and one-third to the vicar. There is a glebe of 6 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, and has chapels at Knocklong and Glenbrohane. The ruins of Knocklong Castle are on an eminence commanding very extensive views; it was the seat of the O'Hurleys, and near it are the remains of a church. In the grounds of Ryves Castle is an ancient burial-ground, with a lofty and handsome vault for the Lowe family, who were formerly proprietors of the castle. The Clangibbon family, also, had here the castle of Ballinahinch.

KNOCKMARK, a parish, in the union of DUNSHAUGHLIN, barony of LOWER DEECE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (W. by N.) from Donshaughlin, on the road to Trim; containing 630 inhabitants. It comprises 2876½ statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, united by act of council, in 1811, to the vicarage of Colmolyn, and held with the impropriate cures of Derry and Kiltale; it is in the gift of the Crown. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £150, and of the entire benefice £299. 12. 6. The glebe-house was built in 1815, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £675 from the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe here comprises 29 acres, and there is also a glebe of five acres in Colmolyn, valued at £10. 10. per annum. The church was built in 1819, by a loan of £900 from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donshaughlin.

KNOCKMOURNE, or KNOCKMORE, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, partly in the barony of BARRYMORE, partly in that of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, but chiefly in that of KINNATALOON, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Tallow, on the road to Rathcormac; containing 3376 inhabitants. It comprises 8836 statute acres, of which 75 are woodland, 250 bog, and the remainder arable land; the soil is good, and there is much limestone and some brownstone. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, united at an unknown period, by act of council, to the vicarage of Ballynoe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Corporation of Waterford. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £802. 19. 6., which is equally divided between the impropriators and the vicar; and the tithe of the entire vicarial benefice is £630. 5. 6. The glebe-house was built in 1828, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £900 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises three acres. The church has been recently rebuilt at a cost of £587, paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Knockmourne is the head of a district, which includes the parishes of Knockmourne, Ballynoe, and Mogealy, and has chapels at Conna, Ballynoe, and Lisnabrint.

KNOCKMOY.—See ABBEYKNOCKMOY.

KNOCKNEGAUL, a parish, in the union of LIMERICK, partly in the barony of PUBBLEBRIEN, county of LIMERICK, and partly in the ancient county of the city of LIMERICK, province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S.) from Limerick, on the road to Fedamore; containing 1230 inhabitants. This parish comprises 2172 statute acres: the land is in general good, and the system of agriculture improving; the fences are, however, very indifferent, consisting of low walls of loose stones, except in the neighbourhood of Leamonfield, where the country is exceedingly interesting. The principal seats are Leamonfield and Ballyclough, both pleasantly situated, and commanding some finely varied scenery. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick; the rectory forms part of the union of Nantinan and the corps of the precentorship, and the vicarage part of the union and corps of the prebend of Kilpeacon in the cathedral of Limerick. The tithe rent-charge is £173. 1. 6., of which £116. 3. are payable to the precentor, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house is a handsome residence, built in 1817, by aid of a gift of £250 and a loan of £550 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 11 acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Loughmore. The ruins of the church, which was destroyed during the war of 1641, are close to the glebe-house.

KNOCKRATH, a parish, in the union of RATHDRUM, partly in the barony of SOUTH BALLINACOR, but chiefly in that of NORTH BALLINACOR, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3¼ miles (N. W.) from Rathdrum, on the road to Glendalough; containing 2331 inhabitants. It is in and near the beautiful vale of Clara; comprises 18,854¼ statute acres; and forms part of the rectory and vicarage of Rathdrum, in the diocese of Dublin and Glendalough: the tithe rent-charge is £101. Divine service is performed by one of the curates of Rathdrum, in a licensed chapel. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the district of Rathdrum, and has a chapel in the village of Clara. Here are some remains of an old castle, and a rath.

KNOCKTEMPLE, a parish, in the union of KANTURK, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (S. W.) from Charleville, and on the new road from Newcastle to Mallow; containing 2245 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Allua, near the northern confines of the county, and comprises 4618 statute acres. Part of the extensive bog called the Red Bog is within its limits; and a vein of culm has been discovered, but not yet worked. The seats are, Castle Ishen, the family mansion of Sir James Fitzgerald, Bart.; and Glenfield, an old mansion belonging to the Boyle family. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, united by act of council to the impropriate cure of Kilbolane, constituting the union of Knocktemple, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10.; and the entire income of the benefice, including the stipend of the impropriate curacy, £193. 13. 1. There is a glebe of 3 acres in this parish. The church of the union is in Kilbolane. In the Roman Catholic divisions Knocktemple forms part of the district of Freemount, which also comprises the parish of Kilbolane and the greater part of Shandrum, and contains the chapels of Freemount, Millford, and Kilbolane. At Freemount, in this parish, is a national school. Adjoining the mansion of Castle Ishen are the ruins of the ancient structure from which it derives its name.

KNOCKTOPHER, a town and parish (formerly a parliamentary borough), in the union of CALLAN, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 10 miles (S.) from Kilkenny, on the road to Waterford; containing 1968 inhabitants, of whom 467 are in the town or village. This place was the principal residence of the Butlers, earls of Ormonde, of whom James, the second earl, in 1356, founded a monastery for Carmelite friars: the first prior, Henry Brown, received two parts of the temporalities of the see of Ossory, then in the king's hands; and the last prior, William, was made bishop of that diocese by Edward VI. The site and revenues of the establishment, at the Dissolution, were granted by Henry VIII. to Patrick Barnwell; and a regrant of the abbey and lands was made by James I. to Sir Nicholas White, Knt., from whose representatives the ancestor of the present proprietor, the Rev. Sir Hercules Richard Langrishe, purchased them. In 1365, the same Earl of Ormonde obtained from Edward III. the grant of a weekly market and several fairs; and the town appears to have enjoyed the privileges of a free borough by a kind of prescriptive right, which was acknowledged in a charter of James II. that never came into operation. The castle was taken in 1649 by the parliamentarian forces, commanded by Cromwell in person, and by his orders was immediately demolished. Knocktopher first sent members to the Irish parliament in 1661, and continued to do so till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised. The inhabitants by prescription chose a portreeve, chiefly for the election of their representatives, and in the charter of James II. the corporation is styled the "Sovereign, Burgesses, and Commonalty;" but since the Union every municipal right has become extinct. The place is at present merely a village, containing 80 houses, of which several are neatly built; and has a post-office, and a constabulary police station. Both market and fair have been discontinued.

The parish comprises 4732¼ statute acres, chiefly under tillage; limestone abounds, and lead-ore is frequently found in the vicinity. Adjoining the village is the seat of the Rev. Sir H. R. Langrishe, an ancient mansion, part of which was the old abbey. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory: it was united by act of council, in 1676, to the rectories and vicarages of Kilneddy, Aughaviller, Kiltorkin, Dernahensy, Kilkeril, Kilkeasy, and Donemagan, together forming the union of Knocktopher, in the patronage of the Bishop; but in 1839 the parishes of Aughaviller and Kilkeasy were separated from it, and added to Kilmoganny. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £132. The glebe-house is on a glebe of 12 acres, and is a commodious house, with cheerful pleasure-grounds; there are other glebe lands in the union, comprising 25 acres. The church, for the repairs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1839 granted £114, is a neat edifice with a spire. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called Ballyhale, comprising also the parishes of Derrynahinch, Aughaviller, and Kilkeasy, and part of the parishes of Burnchurch, Jerpoint, and Kells; and containing five chapels, of which the chapel of Knocktopher is a neat edifice lately built by a Carmelite friar, which, with his house adjoining it, cost about £2000: a Carmelite friary is about to be established here. There is an allotment of 12 acres of land, given, by an Inclosure act for the commons of Knocktopher, to found a parochial school; but the appropriation has been neglected, and the ground taken possession of by the peasantry. A dispensary has been established. There are some remains of the ancient abbey, consisting of two arches of one of the aisles, together with the tower of the church, which in the lower part is square, and in the upper octangular. No remains exist of the castle, but the mount and fosse are still entire.

KYLE, or CLONFERTMULLOE, a parish, in the union of ROSCREA, barony of CLANDONAGH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Burros-in-Ossory, on the road to Roscrea; containing 1888 inhabitants. It comprises 7146 statute acres. Agriculture is improving; there is little bog, but a considerable quantity of mountain land. Charleville, a seat, the property of the White family, is situated in a handsome demesne. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Roscrea; the tithe rent-charge is £84. 16. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions Kyle is part of the district of Roscrea, and contains a chapel. There is a public school of 20 children, to which Sir C. Coote, Bart., and the Rev. W. Roe contribute. Here are the remains of an encampment; of the church; and of Ballaghmore and Cloneurse Castles.

KYLE.—See KILPATRICK, county of WEXFORD.

L

LABASHEEDA, or POUNDSTREET, a village, in the parish of KILLOFIN, poor-law union of KILRUSH, barony of CLONDERLAW, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Kildysart, on the lower road to Kilrush; containing 127 houses, and 606 inhabitants. From its situation on the Shannon, a considerable quantity of corn is brought to this village in winter, and sent in boats to Limerick; culm obtained in the vicinity is also sent hence to Limerick, Ennis, and other places: the erection of a small pier and quay would be of great advantage to the trade. There is a ferry across the Shannon to Tarbert. A court for Col. Wyndham's manor of Clonderlaw is occasionally held by the seneschal, for the recovery of small debts; and a constabulary police force is stationed in the village. Near it is a large Roman Catholic chapel, a handsome cruciform building.—See KILLOFIN.

LACK, a village, in the parish of MAGHERACULMONEY, union of LOWTHERSTOWN, barony of LURG, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER; containing 99 inhabitants.

LACKAGH, a parish, in the barony of CLARE, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Galway, on the road to Castle-Blakeney; containing 3532 inhabitants. In 1504, Mac William of Clanricarde, O'Brien of Thomond, and other chieftains, suddenly captured Galway, but were soon afterwards defeated by the lord-deputy, the Earl of Kildare, at Knock-tuadh, in this parish, with great slaughter, when two of Mac William's sons were made prisoners; Galway was recovered, and Athenry surrendered. The parish comprises 12,996½ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Annaghdown; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Lackagh in the cathedral of Tuam, and the tithe rent-charge is £153. 7. 6., of which £75 are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains a chapel.

LACKAGH, a parish, in the union of ATHY, barony of WEST OPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Kildare; on the road to Monastereven, and on the Grand Canal; containing 1595 inhabitants. It comprises 8316 statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, united to the vicarage of Doneny, and in the gift of the Archbishop; the tithe rent-charge of Lackagh is £193. 16. 11., and the value of the whole benefice £226. 11. 5. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a loan of £415 and a gift of £323 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1816; the glebe of the union comprises 19 acres. The church was rebuilt by aid of a grant from the same Board, in 1838. There are some remains of a castle that belonged to the Fitzgeralds; and of Mount Rice, a large mansion erected by the Rice family.

LACKAN, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Killala, and on the north-western coast; containing 2943 inhabitants, and comprising 7338 statute acres. The land is partly under tillage and partly in pasture; there are large tracts of bog and reclaimable mountain, and some quarries of freestone, limestone, and slate. Copper is supposed to exist at Castlerea, and there is a fine fishery at Baltra. The principal seats are, Castle Lackan, Curramore, Heathfield, and Lissadrone, which last commands views of the bay of Killala and of the Sligo, Leitrim, and Donegal mountains, and in the grounds of which are nine Danish forts, and a very strong chalybeate spring. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, episcopally united to those of Templemurry and Kilcummin, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Lackan in the cathedral of Killala. The tithe rent-charge is £165, of which £75 are payable to the prebendary, and the remainder to the vicar: the entire tithe of the benefice amounts to £180. 15. The glebe-house was built in 1777; the glebe consists of 20 acres. The church has been lately rebuilt, at a cost of £837, paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lackan is the head of a district, comprising this parish and Kilcummin, and has a chapel.

LACKANALOOHA, a village, in the parish and union of MALLOW, barony of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 163 inhabitants.

LACKEEN, a parish, in the barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, union of MALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1¼ mile (W.) from Churchtown, on the road to Liscarrol; containing 79 inhabitants. It comprises only the townlands of Lackeen and Granard, containing 280 statute acres. The land is of excellent quality, and chiefly in tillage; limestone is quarried for burning, lime being generally used for manure, and the state of agriculture has been much improved. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Cloyne, forming the corps of the prebend of Lackeen in the cathedral of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £23. 5. The occasional duties are discharged by the curate of Churchtown. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lackeen is part of the union of Liscarrol. The ruins of the church still remain, in the burial-ground.

LADIES'-BRIDGE, a village, in the parish of IGHTERMURRAGH, union of MIDLETON, barony of IMOKILLY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 1½ mile (S.) from Castle-Martyr, on the road to Ballycotton; containing 45 houses, and 243 inhabitants. Here is the Roman Catholic chapel for the district of Ightermurragh, Garryvoe, and Bohilane; near which is a male and female national school.

LADY'S-ISLAND, WEXFORD.—See MARY'S (ST.).

LADYTOWN, a parish, in the union of NAAS, barony of CONNELL, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Naas; containing 292 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Liffey, comprises 268¾ statute acres. It is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Kildare, forming part of the union of Great Connell; the rectory is impropriate in Sir T. Molyneux, Bart., Sir G. Cockburn, K.G.H., and A. Rourke, Esq. The tithe rent-charge is £71. 12., of which £47. 14. 8. are payable to the impropriators, and £23. 17. 4. to the curate. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the union or district of Caragh and Downings.

LAGAN, county of LONGFORD.—See KILGLASS.

LAGHY, a village, in the parish of DRUMHOME, union of DONEGAL, barony of TYRHUGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER; containing 159 inhabitants.

LAHAN, an island, in the parish of TEMPLECRONE, union of GLENTIES, barony of BOYLAGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER. It is situated on the coast called the Rosses, and comprises 33¼ statute acres.

LAHINCH, or LAHENZY, a village, in the parish of KILMANAHEEN, union of ENNISTYMON, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (W.) from Ennistymon, and on the bay of Liscanor, on the western coast; containing 107 houses, and 433 inhabitants. This place has of late rapidly advanced on account of its fine bathing-strand, situated at the inner extremity of the bay, and much resorted to during the season. The roads in the vicinity have been greatly improved; and a bridge over the estuary of the river Inagh between this place and Liscanor has been recently completed, and allows of an uninterrupted drive along the coast from Miltown-Malbay to the cliffs of Moher. The village affords good accommodation for visiters, and races are generally held every season for their amusement. In the vicinity are the natural curiosities called the "Puffing Holes" and the "Dropping Well;" the former is described under the head of Miltown-Malbay; the latter is similar to the dropping well at Knaresborough, in Yorkshire: the surrounding scenery is extremely picturesque and diversified. In the village is the Roman Catholic chapel for this portion of the district of Ennistymon.

LALLYSCROSS, a village, in the parish of CASTLEMAGNER, union of KANTURK, barony of DUHALLOW, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER; containing 166 inhabitants.

LAMBAY, an island, in the parish of PORTRANE, union of BALROTHERY, barony of NETHERCROSS, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Rush; containing 89 inhabitants. This island, which is situated off the eastern coast, appears to have belonged at an early period to the cathedral establishment of Christ Church, Dublin. By license from Edward VI., in the 5th of his reign, it was, with the consent of the chapter, granted by the archbishop to John Challonor and his heirs, at a fee-farm rent of £6. 13. 4., for the use of a colony which he had brought to inhabit it, on condition that within six years he should build a town for the habitation of fishermen, with a place of defence surrounded by a wall and ditch, and a convenient harbour for their boats. In the reign of Elizabeth the island was granted to Archbishop Ussher, who resided here for a considerable time, during which he is said to have written part of his works; after his decease it was purchased from his representatives by the family of Talbot, who are its present proprietors. It is about four miles in circumference, and forms an elevated ridge, with rocky knolls and cragged brows, strongly contrasting with the flat sandy shore of the main land, appearing like the last off-set of the Wicklow mountains in this direction, and corresponding with the detached heights of Ireland's-Eye, Howth, and Dalkey, at the opposite extremity. The isle comprises 595¾ statute acres, and is watered with numerous streams, and susceptible of cultivation, to which a portion of it has been subjected; it abounds with rabbits, sea-parrots, puffins, and Cornish choughs. The rocky grounds surrounding the island form a plentiful lobster and crab fishery, and are much frequented by the Lough Shinny fishermen, who carry on a lucrative trade here.

The channel between Lambay and the main land at Rush Point and Portrane, is about three miles wide; and 200 yards from the west end is the Burrin rock, dry at half tide, and on which a perch is placed: between it and the island are four fathoms of water. About a quarter of a mile from the north-western extremity of the island, or Scotch Point, is a cluster of rocks called "the Tailors," on which a beacon is placed; and between these rocks is a pier-harbour, built by a grant of £591. 11. from the late Fishery Board, and of £451. 7. from the proprietor, who afterwards obtained a sum from government for its completion. It has four feet depth at the entrance at low water, and small vessels may find good anchorage and shelter from the north-east and south-east gales. On the northern side of Lambay is the Cardurris rock: the remainder of the shore is lofty and precipitous, with clear ground at a short distance; and vessels may anchor in safety to leeward. Upon the south-eastern side is a spacious cavern, called "Seal Hole," from the number of seals that breed there; on the north side, between the Tailors and Curdurris rock, is a cavern about 150 feet in length, with stalagmites rising from the floor, and stalactites depending from the roof. Experienced pilots for the Dublin coast, and supplies of excellent spring water, may always be obtained here; and on the island is a coast-guard station. The geological features are chiefly trap-rock, greenstone in massive beds, greenstone-porphyry alternating with small strata of clay-slate, conglomerate sandstone well adapted for millstones, greywacke, and greywacke-slate; the porphyry is found in abundance, and is susceptible of a very high polish: indications of copper are found. The castle erected here by Challonor is of polygonal form, and is occasionally inhabited by Lord Talbot de Malahide. In the Roman Catholic divisions the island forms part of the district of Rush; the first stone of a chapel was laid in 1833, by his lordship. There is an old burying-ground; also a well dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

LAMBEG, a parish, in the union of Lisburn, partly in the baronies of Upper Belfast and Upper Massereene, county of Antrim, but chiefly in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, county of Down, and province of Ulster, 2½ miles (N.) from Lisburn, and on the old road from Belfast to Dublin; containing 1967 inhabitants, of whom 218 are in the village. This parish, which is situated on the river Lagan, comprises 1567 statute acres, of which 376¾ are in the county of Antrim. The land is good, and the system of agriculture improved; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. Lambeg House is a handsome modern mansion, formerly belonging to J. Williamson, Esq., author of an able treatise on the linen trade, and framer of the laws by which it is now regulated throughout Ireland; he was much persecuted for framing those laws, and was driven from his house and his native country by an infuriated mob. Chrome Hill, also a spacious modern mansion, was erected by R. Nevin, Esq., late of Manchester, who established here some extensive works for printing muslin, in which he first applied with success his invention of the "Ba Chrome," now universally used, and also introduced the oxyde of chrome into the ornamental department of the china manufacture, from which circumstance he named his estate. The village is about a mile north of Lisburn, with which and also with Belfast it is connected by houses continued along the road between those towns. The blanket manufacture established by the Wolfenden family, who settled in this part of the country about two centuries since, is still carried on. On the Lagan are two large bleach-greens; and further down the stream is the extensive printing establishment of Mr. Nevin, the buildings of which are capacious, and furnished with every modern improvement in machinery. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate as mensal, but the whole of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £78, is given by him to the curate. The glebe-house was built in 1825, at a cost of £700, whereof £450 were a gift and £200 a loan from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of 15 acres. The church occupies the site of an ancient monastery, said to have been founded in the 15th century by Mac Donell for Franciscan friars of the third order; it is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style, with a tower at the west end, and was enlarged in 1824 by a loan of £150 from the Board. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. From a part of the churchyard being called the Nuns' Garden, it has been supposed that there was a nunnery here; but no account of such an establishment is extant.

LANESBOROUGH, a market and post town (formerly a parliamentary borough), in the union of Roscommon, partly in the parish of Clontuskert, barony of South Ballintober, county of Roscommon, and province of Connaught, but chiefly in the parish and barony of Rathcline, county of Longford, and province of Leinster, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Longford, on the road to Roscommon, and 66¾ (W. by N.) from Dublin; containing 581 inhabitants. This town derived its name from Sir G. Lane, whose lands of Ballyleagh and others in the county of Longford were erected into the manor of Lanesborough by charter of Charles II. in the 17th of his reign; and to whom was also granted a court baron, with jurisdiction to the amount of 40s., and a court of record for the determination of pleas to the amount of £200. The same charter constituted the town a free borough, under a sovereign and two bailiffs, who were annually elected, and of whom the former, with his deputy, was a justice of the peace; 12 burgesses, elected by a majority of their own body as vacancies occurred; and an indefinite number of freemen, admitted by the burgesses, by whom also a recorder, town-clerk, serjeant-at-mace, and other officers were to be appointed. The corporation continued to return two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised. For some time prior to the Union the corporation had exercised scarcely any other municipal duty than that of returning the members to parliament, and since that period it has become quite extinct.

The town is advantageously situated for trade on the river Shannon, over which are a beautiful new bridge of seven arches, and a swivel-bridge; erected by the commissioners for the improvement of the navigation of the Shannon, in 1844, and connecting the counties of Roscommon and Longford. The chief trade is the exportation of corn, pigs, and eggs, of which vast quantities are sent by the Shannon; eggs are also sent to Dublin by the Royal Canal from Killashee, to which place they are conveyed from Lanesborough by land carriage. The market, which is abundantly supplied with agricultural produce, is on Wednesday, and a fair is held on the 12th of February. The town has a sub-post office to Longford; and a constabulary police station. About a mile to the south is Rathcline, the seat of a branch of the White family, proprietors of the town, pleasingly situated at the base of Rathcline hill and on the shore of Lough Ree; and on the bank of the Shannon, about the same distance from the town, is Clonbony, commanding a fine view of the river and the town. The parish church of Rathcline, the chancel of which is in ruins, is situated here; and there are a Roman Catholic chapel, and a dispensary. Adjoining the church, are the shattered remains of a large tower, which is said to have been destroyed from the opposite side of the river by the army of James II. Lanesborough gives the title of Earl to a branch of the family of Butler, of Newtown, in which it was revived after it had become extinct in the family of Lane.

LANGFIELD, EAST, or UPPER, a parish, in the union and barony of Omagh, county of Tyrone, and province of Ulster, 6 miles (W.) from Omagh, containing, with the market-town of Drumquin (which is separately described), 3143 inhabitants. The old parish of Langfield was, in 1800, divided by act of council into the two parishes of East and West Langfield; the former portion comprises 9716¼ statute acres, of which 22¼ are water. The land in some parts is good, but the soil is generally light, particularly near the mountains, which, though lofty, afford good pasturage for cattle; the system of agriculture is slowly improving, and there is an extensive tract of bog. Excellent freestone is found at Claremore, and in several parts of the parish are indications of coal. The principal seats are Drumrane Lodge and Burle's Folly. The manufacture of linen is carried on in the farmhouses to a considerable extent. The townland of Magheraney, on which is the church, is the property of the Bishop of Derry. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £183. 15. The glebe-house, a good residence, was built in 1803, by aid of a gift of £100 and a loan of £600 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 26 Cunningham acres. The church, which was erected in 1803, is a small neat edifice with a square tower; the Board of First Fruits gave £500 towards its erection, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £254 towards its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, with that of West Langfield, forms the district of Langfield; there is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. About a quarter of a mile from the parish church are the remains of an ancient church, with a burial-ground.

LANGFIELD, WEST, or LOWER, a parish, in the union of Castlederg, barony of Omagh, county of Tyrone, and province of Ulster, 8 miles (W.) from Omagh, and on the road from Londonderry to Enniskillen; containing 5094 inhabitants. The parish comprises 23,906¾ statute acres, of which 176 are water, and about 6700 mountain and bog. The mountains afford good pasturage for cattle and sheep, and their declivities are in a state of progressive cultivation; a great portion of the bog is also being rapidly reclaimed, and the system of agriculture is fast improving. In Dunwest are extensive beds of coal in three strata, all easy of access; but though at every flood large masses are detached by the river Poe, and carried down the stream, no attempt has yet been made to work them: coal of very good quality is also found in other parts of the parish. In Kerlis are valuable quarries of freestone, from which was raised the stone for the portico of the court-house of Omagh and for other public edifices; the higher mountains, of which Dooish rises 1119 feet above the level of the sea, are of mica-slate. The river Poe rises in the mountains, and after passing through Drumquin falls into the river Foyle, about two miles below Omagh; there are several lakes in the parish, the largest of which is 58 acres in extent. The inhabitants combine with their agricultural pursuits the weaving of linen, and many of the females are employed in spinning linen and cotton yarn; there are a small tuck-mill for dressing home-made woollen-cloth, and several corn-mills. The parish is partly within the bishop's manor of Derg, and partly in that of Hastings, which was granted to Sir J. Davies by James I., under the name of Clonaghmore, and for which a court is held at Drumquin monthly, for the recovery of debts under 40*s*.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £221. 18. The glebe-house is a good and comfortable residence, situated near the church on a glebe of 50 acres, and embosomed in thriving plantations; there are also belonging to the rectory 10 townlands at Gortnasoal, about three miles distant, comprising together 1650 acres, of which about one-half are under cultivation, and the remainder mountain and bog. The church is a neat edifice. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, together with that of East Langfield, constitutes the district of Langfield; a large chapel at Drumquin serves for both parishes. The parochial school is principally supported by the rector, who in 1820 erected a house for the master on the glebe, and assigned an excellent garden; he also erected a schoolhouse for another on the glebe at Loughmulharn, which he also supports. Some extensive remains exist of the spacious and handsome castle of Kerlis, or Curlews, built by Sir John Davies, prior to 1619, upon the manor of Clonaghmore, with freestone found on the spot, with which he likewise constructed a road eight feet wide and seven miles in length, leading over mountains and morasses, to his other castle on the Derg; much of the road may still be traced near the castle, paved with large blocks of stone. There are forts in various parts of the parish, some of which are very large and tolerably perfect.

LARACOR, a parish, in the union of Trim, barony of Lower Moyfenragh, county of Meath, and province of Leinster; containing, with the post-town of Summerhill (which is separately described), 2682 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8335 statute acres, of which about two-thirds are under tillage; the remainder, with the exception of some bog near Summerhill, is good pasturage. The western part consists of limestone-gravel, and the eastern of a strong clayey loam. The principal seats are Rock Lodge, Freffans, Spring Valley, Baymount, and Adamstown. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, and in the patronage of the Crown; the tithe rent-charge is £311. 11. The glebe-house was built in 1813, by aid of a gift of £200 and a loan of £550 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 21 acres. The church is an ancient edifice, which it is intended to rebuild; it contains a handsome monument to the memory of Sir Colley Wellesley, Knt., this having been the burial-place of the Wellesley, as it still is of the Perceval, family. In the former parochial school-house at Summerhill, now used as a sessions-house, divine service is performed on Sunday evenings. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Summerhill, which includes the parishes of Laracor, Agher, Drumlargan, and Gallow; there is a chapel at Dangan, in Laracor, and another at Gallow. At Summerhill is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the Synod of Munster, the minister of which receives an annual grant of royal bounty. The parochial school is now at Dangan, and there is a school at Rocklodge; a school in Summerhill is under the patronage of the Presbyterian minister; and a national school is attached to the chapel at Dangan. Here are the ruins of Dangan Castle, which was the manorial seat of the Wellesleys, and in which the Duke of Wellington, the Marquess Wellesley, and Lords Maryborough and Cowley were born. It was a splendid residence, surrounded by a noble demesne, but was burnt some years since, and is now the property of Major Burrowes. Of Knightsbrook, formerly the handsome residence of the Perceval family, only the offices remain. This parish was for several years the residence of Dr. Jonathan Swift, afterwards Dean of St. Patrick's, who was instituted to the living in 1699; and of Esther Johnson, known by the poetic name of Stella.

LARAGHBRYAN.—See MAYNOOTH.

LARAH, a parish, in the union of COOTEHILL, partly in the barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, but chiefly in that of TULLAGHGARVEY, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Stradone, 8558 inhabitants. It comprises 17,282½ statute acres, including 180½ of water; 5166½ are in Upper Loughtee, and 12,116 in Tullaghgarvey. The state of agriculture is rather backward, and in the upper part of the parish is a quantity of bog: there are quarries of limestone, which is used for building and as manure. The principal seats are, Stradone House, a handsome structure in a well-planted demesne; and Ravenswood. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, forming part of the union of Drung; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath. The tithe rent-charge is £319. 11., of which £166. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar: the parochial glebe comprises 550 acres. The church, built in 1832, by a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, is a neat and commodious edifice. In the Roman Catholic divisions this district is divided into Upper and Lower Larah, and has chapels at Larah and Cleffernah. On the townland of Knockatoother is a very remarkable cairn, and several Danish raths are scattered over the parish.

LARNE, a sea-port, market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of UPPER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 11 miles (N.) from Carrickfergus, and 97 (N. by E.) from Dublin, on the road from Belfast to Ballycastle; containing 3515 inhabitants, of whom 2937 are in the town, which extends into the parish of Inver, and contains altogether 3345 inhabitants. This place is situated on the shore of Lough Larne, which was formerly called OLDERFLEET and gave name to a castle built on the extreme point of the promontory of Curraan, which forms the small bay adjacent to the town. This fortress, under the protection of which the town arose, is supposed to have been erected by a Scottish family named Bisset, to whom a settlement on this part of the coast had been granted by Henry III., and to have been subsequently improved by the English. Edward Bruce landed here in 1315, with an army of 6000 men for the conquest of Ireland; and Hugh Bisset forfeited his possessions by taking part in the rebellion. These were subsequently claimed in right of the same family, by James Mac Donnell, Lord of Cantyre, and after his death were granted by Queen Elizabeth during her pleasure to his son Angus, on condition that he should carry arms only under the crown of England, and pay annually a certain number of hawks and cattle. Olderfleet Castle was at that time considered so important a defence against the Scots, that in 1569, it was entrusted to Sir Moyses Hill; but it was dismantled in 1598. James I., in 1603, granted the entire headland to Sir Randal Mac Donnell, surnamed Sorley-Boy; and in 1612 gave the castle and lands to Sir Arthur Chichester, together with the right of ferry between this place and Island-Magee. During the disturbances of 1798, the town was attacked by the insurgent army from Ballymena, but the assailants were repulsed by the Tay fencibles, assisted by the yeomanry and inhabitants.

The TOWN is beautifully situated on the eastern coast, and is divided into the Old and New towns, containing together 584 houses, most of which are well built, and of very neat appearance: the streets in the Old town are narrow and indifferently paved; the New town consists of one long and regular street, in which the houses are of stone. There are two public libraries, supported by subscription, both containing good collections. During the last century a very extensive trade was carried on in salt, of which large quantities prepared here from rock-salt imported from Liverpool were sent from this port to Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, and Prussia; the duties paid thereon, on the average, amounted to £18,000 per annum. About the middle of the last century, this was the only port in the north of Ireland from which emigrant vessels sailed. The present trade consists chiefly in the exportation of linens, oats, beans, flour, occasionally black-cattle, and a very considerable quantity of lime; and in the importation of coal, slates, wheat, and North American timber. The gross value of the exports in a recent year, exclusively of lime, was £66,309, of which £16,372 were for corn, meal, and flour, £9937 in provisions, and £40,000 in linens; the imports in the same year were £7255, whereof £5050 were coal, culm, &c. The number of vessels that entered inwards during the year was 340, of the aggregate burthen of 13,517 tons, and of which 298 were from British ports and 42 employed in the coasting-trade; and during the same year, 113 vessels, of the aggregate burthen of 4339 tons, cleared out from Larne, of which 64 were bound to British ports and 49 were coasters. The port is a member of that of Belfast, and has an excellent harbour for small vessels, for which there is good anchorage between the Curraan and the peninsula of Island-Magee, in two or two and a half fathoms, quite land-locked; great numbers of vessels from Scotland anchor off this place, while waiting for their cargoes of lime from the Maghramorne works, in the parish of Glynn. There are some good quays on both sides of the lough, about a mile from the town; the water being too shallow to float vessels further up. The royal military road along the coast passes through Larne. A branch of the Belfast Bank has been established. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Lisburn. The market is on Tuesday; a great market is held on the first Monday of every month; and there are fairs on Dec. 1st and July 31st, for black-cattle, a few inferior horses, and pigs. A constabulary police force has been established; also a coast-guard station belonging to the Carrickfergus district. A court for the manor of Glenarm is held here every six weeks, and petty-sessions every alternate week.

The parish comprises 2210 statute acres of good arable and pasture land; the system of agriculture is slowly improving, and there is neither waste land nor bog. Limestone abounds, and is quarried both for building and agricultural purposes; at Ballycraigcy, about a mile to the north of the town, is a quarry of felspar, worked occasionally for building; and at Bankhead a fine stratum of coal has been discovered, but is not worked. The principal seats are, Gardenmore, an elegant villa; and the Curraan. The LIVING is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Dean; the tithe rent-charge is £102, of which £92. 16. 8. are payable to the curate, who receives also £23. 8. from Primate Boulter's fund. The glebe-house was built in 1824, by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 3¼ acres. The church, previously to its alteration in 1819, had some interesting details of ancient architecture. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Carrickfergus and Larne; a chapel was erected here in 1832 by subscription. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and with the Presbytery of Antrim; also for Wesleyan Methodists. A dispensary is supported by subscription. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 5¼ acres purchased for £477, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £4989, and is constructed to contain 400 paupers. There are some remains of the ancient castle of Olderfleet, on the promontory of Curraan. On the sea side, about a mile north of the town, is a cavern called the Black Cave, passing under the projecting base of a huge rock; the length of the cave, which is open at both ends, is 60 feet, and its height from 3 to 30 feet; the sides are formed of basaltic columns of large dimensions. On the shore of the lough, near Larne, are some singular petrifactions of a blue colour, apparently the result of a spring issuing from a bank at high-water mark. In a short road leading from the east to the north of the town is a chalybeate spring, at present little used.

LATTERAGH, a parish, in the barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (N. by W.) from Burris-o'-leagh, and on the new line of road from Ncnagh to Clonmel; containing 1132 inhabitants. This place was celebrated at a very early period for its monastery, the foundation of which is uncertain. It became an extensive seat of learning; and St. Odran of Leatrach-odhrain, who died in 548, presided over the establishment, in which were at that time not less than 3000 monks. In 1304, the neighbourhood was laid waste by Tirlogh, son of Teig-Caoluiske, King of Thomond, who spared only the churches and the dwellings of the clergy. From this period no further notice of the monastery occurs, neither are there any remains of the buildings. The parish comprises 4065 statute acres. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Killaloe, united at a period unknown to the rectory and vicarage of Innisdadrom, together constituting the corps of the precentorship in the cathedral of Killaloe, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £103. 17. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe.

LATTIN, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, barony of CLANWILLIAM, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4¼ miles (S. W.) from Tipperary; containing 785 inhabitants. It comprises 2276 statute acres, principally in pasture and of a superior quality. A fair is held at Knockordan on Nov. 7th. Here is Mooresfort, the handsome seat of the Moore family, situated in a well-planted demesne. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Emly, united at a period unknown to the rectory of Bruis and the vicarages of Corroge, Clonpet, and Cordangan, which union till lately formed the corps of the prebend of Lattin in Emly cathedral, in the gift of the Bishop of Cashel. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £73. 6. 6.; and the total annual value of the late prebendal union, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £356. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lattin is the head of a district comprising the parishes of Lattin, Cullen, Shronell, Bruis, and Clonpet, and containing a neat chapel at Lattin and one at Cullen.

LAUCORAN.—See LICKORAN.

LAURENCETOWN, a village, in the parish of CLONFERT, union of BALLINASLOE, barony of LONGFORD, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6 miles (S.) from Ballinasloe, on the road to Eyrecourt, under which places it has a receiving-house for letters; containing 82 houses, and 397 inhabitants. This is a chief constabulary police station, and petty-sessions are held weekly on Thursday. A considerable quantity of wooden-ware and furniture is manufactured here; and fairs are held on May 8th, Aug. 22nd, and Dec. 15th, for cattle, sheep, and pigs. The Roman Catholic chapel for this district, situated in the village, is a good modern building; the Wesleyan Methodists also have a chapel here, and support a school. The seats in the vicinity are, Bellevue, or Liscreaghan, an extensive and well-wooded demesne containing a number of remarkably fine cedars of Lebanon and evergreen-oaks; Gortnamona; Somerset House; and Ballymore Castle, a fortified structure erected in 1620, and modernised at a considerable expense in 1815. Near the village, also, are the ruins of the castle of O'Hill, from which it formerly took the name of Ohillmore.

LAVAY, or LOWEY, a parish, in the barony of UPPER LOUGHTEE, union and county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Cavan, on the road to Virginia; containing 5931 inhabitants. It comprises 10,679 statute acres, of which 76½ are water. The land is highly cultivated; there are some large tracts of bogs, affording an abundant supply of fuel. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath. The tithe rent-charge is £289. 13. 9., of which £115. 6. 3. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church, a very neat edifice, was erected in 1822, by aid of a gift of £900 from the Board of First Fruits, and has been repaired by a grant of £152 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is no glebe-house; the glebe consists of 220 acres. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and contains the Upper chapel, built in 1820, and the Lower chapel, recently built, at an expense of nearly £2000, on a site given by Major G. Burrowes. Here are some Danish raths; and several heads of battle-axes and brazen spears were discovered on an artificial island while draining Lake Lavey in 1832.

LAYDE, a grange, in the union of BALLYCASTLE, barony of LOWER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER, 4½ miles (W.) from Cushendall; containing 369 inhabitants. It comprises 7834 statute acres; and is extra-parochial, never having paid church cess or tithes. There being no provision for the cure of souls, the members of the Established Church attend the parish church of Layde.

LAYDE, a parish, in the union of BALLYCASTLE, barony of LOWER GLENARM, county of ANTRIM, and province of ULSTER; containing, with the post-town of Cushendall (which is separately described), 4218 inhabitants. This parish, called also Cushendall, from its post-town, and Newtown-Glens, from its situation in the centre of the Glyns, was the residence of the Mac Aulcys of the Glyns, who joined the standard of Mac Donnel at the celebrated battle of Aura, in 1569, after which the combined armies spent some days in festivity on the mountain of Trostan, where they raised a cairn, still called "Coslin Sorley-Boy." The parish comprises, exclusively of the Granges of Layde and Innispollan, 20,476½ statute acres, one-third of which is arable, and the remainder chiefly in pasture. The surface is undulating, and in parts mountainous; in the low grounds are some good meadow lands; the valleys are well cultivated, and the mountainous districts afford tolerable pasturage. Here are quarries of coarse freestone and of white limestone, which latter is burnt for manure. Salmon and many other kinds of fish are found in the rivers, and on the coast of this parish; which is skirted by the coast-road from Belfast to the Giants' Causeway, and intersected by the royal military road. On the former road is a splendid viaduct over the river Glendon, connecting Layde with Culfeightrin and the barony of Glenarm with that of Carey. The seats are Mount Edward and Glenville. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £176. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 7 acres. A church was built about a mile from Cushendall in 1800, but having gone to ruin, another was built in the town in 1831, by aid of £900 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Cushendall, including this parish and Ardclinis, and containing chapels at Cushendall and Redbay. A parochial school is partly supported by the rector; and F. Turnley, Esq., has built a good house for a national school. There is a dispensary. The ancient church is in ruins, but the cemetery is still used: a stone was lately found which had fallen from the dilapidated gable of the church, with the figures 696 carved on it, supposed to be the date of the erection of the edifice. Ossian is said to have been born here.

LEA, or LEY, a parish, in the union of MOUNT-MELLICK, barony of PORTNEHINCH, QUEEN'S county, and province of LEINSTER, on the road from Dublin to Maryborough; containing, with the greater part of the post-town of Portarlington and with the village of Ballybrittas (both separately described), 7797 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the north-eastern part of the county, and bounded on the north-east and north-west by the river Barrow, which separates it from the county of Kildare and King's county. From its central situation and proximity to the Barrow, it was selected, on the seizure of Leix and the rest of the province of Leinster by Strongbow, as one of the first settlements of the English; and a CASTLE was erected here, either by William, Earl-Marshal, by the family of De Vesci, or William de Braosa, to whom the lands came by marriage with one of the earl's daughters. This fortress, from its commanding situation, was frequently the subject of contest between the English lords and the native chieftains; it is noticed by Camden as being, in 1292, in the possession of John Fitzthomas, one of the Geraldines, who, during the hostilities that desolated the surrounding country, brought Richard, Earl of Ulster, prisoner to this place. Contiguous to the castle, which, though the territory had descended to the Mortimers, appears to have been retained by the Fitzgeralds, was a small burgh with a market and fairs, which is said to have been destroyed in 1315 by Edward Bruce, who also burned the castle. In the latter part of the reign of Edward II., this place was taken by Lysagh O'Moore; and on the decline of the English power, nearly the whole of the surrounding territory fell into the possession of the native septs. In 1534 the castle belonged to the Earl of Kildare, and was considered one of his six strongest castles: it was taken in 1642 by the insurgents, who were afterwards expelled by Lord Lisle; in commemoration of which an ash-tree was planted in the market-place, which is now rapidly falling to decay. The castle was dismantled by the parliamentarians under Colonels Hewson and Reynolds; and the subsequent foundation of the neighbouring town of Portarlington prevented the revival of the old burgh or town of Lea, which has since dwindled into an inconsiderable village.

The PARISH comprises 18,488 statute acres, of which about 500 are woodland, about 1000 waste and bog, and the remainder divided in nearly equal portions between tillage and pasture. The surface is mostly level, with a few hills of small elevation, the chief of which are Spire Hill, Windmill Hill, and Mullaghalig; the soil is light and shallow, and the system of agriculture improving. The substrata are limestone, limestone-gravel, and reddish sand; the limestone, which is of good quality, is extensively quarried. The Grand Canal passes for three miles through the parish, and the river Barrow might be rendered navigable from Portarlington to Monastereven at a trifling expense: a railway is in progress from Dublin to Cashel, and a branch is intended from Portarlington to Tullamore. Fairs are held at Portarlington; and petty-sessions are held there weekly on Wednesday, and at Ballybrittas on Monday.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Kildare, and in the patronage of the Lord Primate and the Archbishop of Dublin, who must present a fellow or ex-fellow of Trinity College; the rectory is appropriate to the dean and chapter. The tithe rent-charge is £622. 16. 6., of which £415. 7. 9. are payable to the lessee of the dean and chapter, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £400 and a loan to the same amount from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1827; the glebe comprises 38½ acres. The church, a small neat edifice, was built in 1809, by subscription, aided by a loan of £350 from the Board of First Fruits, for building the steeple; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £375 for repairs. There are two chapels of ease at Portarlington. In the Roman Catholic divisions nearly the whole of the parish forms part of the district of Portarlington, Emo, and Killeynard; the chapel, at Killeynard, has been rebuilt. At Portarlington and Ballybrittas are dispensaries. Ruins exist of the old churches of Old Lea, Tierhoghar, and Ballyadden; and on the bank of the river Barrow are the remains of the ancient castle, consisting of a massive round tower, with several quadrangular buildings, apparently parts of the original structure, and of great strength; the whole inclosed within massive walls pierced with embrasures, and presenting an imposing and venerable appearance as seen from the river. There are six raths in the parish. Near Portarlington is a powerful chalybeate spa, efficacious in scorbutic cases.

LEARMONT, an ecclesiastical district, partly in the barony of Tirkeeran, county of Londonderry, and partly in that of Strabane, county of Tyrone, and province of Ulster, 5 miles (S. W.) from Dungiven, on the road to Omagh. It was formed in 1831, under the 7th and 8th of George IV., by separating eleven townlands from Banagher, eight from Upper Cumber, and one from Lower Cumber; the whole of which are in Londonderry, except Stranagalvally, which is in Tyrone. Much of the land is very good and under an excellent system of cultivation, and the waste land is being reclaimed under the liberal encouragement of Barre Beresford, Esq. Sawel mountain, on the verge of the two counties, rises to the height of 2236 feet above the level of the sea; near it are the precipitous rocks called the Eagle's Nest. Blue limestone is burnt for manure, and manganese and lead-ore are found; also iron-ore, almost in a metallic state. The village of Learmont, or Park, is situated on the Faughan water, near the base of Sawel mountain, and has been much improved lately. The principal seat is Learmont, the elegant residence of Mr. Beresford, which he is enlarging and finishing in the Elizabethan or Tudor style: around it is an extensive demesne, containing valuable timber, and ornamented with baths and groups of statues. Here are also Kilcreen, Straid Lodge, and Tamna. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Derry, and in the alternate patronage of the Rectors of Banagher and Upper Cumber, except the fifth turn, which devolves on the Rector of Lower Cumber. The curate's income is £85 per annum, paid by the three rectors. The late Bishop Knox proposed to make this district a parish of itself, the tithes not to exceed £300 per annum, in which case Mr. Beresford proposed to exchange land planted and improved for a glebe. There is neither glebe-house nor glebe at present. The church, a small neat edifice, was built in 1831, at an expense of £750, of which £400 were given by the Board of First Fruits, £100 by Bishop Knox, £100 by B. Beresford, Esq., £50 by the Irish Society, £25 by the Skinners' Company, £25 by Robert Ogilby, Esq., and the rest by various individuals. In the Roman Catholic divisions Learmont forms part of the district of Banagher, and has a chapel at Altenure. There is a school at Park, to which Mr. Beresford allows £5 per annum and a house, and three other public schools; also three private schools, and two Sunday schools.

LECCAWN, a village, in the parish of Fiddown, union of Carrick, barony of Iverk, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster; containing 147 inhabitants.

LECK, a parish, in the union of Letterkenny, barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal, and province of Ulster, 1 mile (E.) from Letterkenny, on the road to Strabane; containing 3722 inhabitants. It comprises, including a detached portion, 10,744¾ statute acres, of which 264 are in the tideway of the river Swilly, which is navigable through the whole of the parish. A large cattle-fair is held at Old Town on June 8th. Here is Rock Hill, the beautiful seat of the Stewart family. The parish formed part of the corps of the deanery of Raphoe, but was separated from it by act of council in 1835, and is now a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £243. The glebe-house was erected by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1820; the glebe comprises 20 acres. The church has been rebuilt, at a cost of £749, of which £649 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; it accommodates 200 persons. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Conwall. A parochial school is aided by an annual donation from Colonel Robertson's fund; and there are two other public schools, one of which is supported by Sir E. Hayes, Bart.

LECKARROW, a village, partly in the parish of St. John's, and partly in that of Killenvoy, union and barony of Athlone, county of Roscommon, and province of Connaught, 8 miles (N. W.) from Athlone, on the road to Roscommon, to both which places it has a receiving-house for letters. A patron takes place on the 24th of June, at which lambs, pigs, &c., are sold; and petty-sessions are held every alternate week. In the village are a flour and an oatmeal mill; in the vicinity is a dispensary.

LECKEN, or Lacken, a parish, in the union of Mullingar, barony of Corkaree, county of Westmeath, and province of Leinster, 7½ miles (N. N. W.) from Mullingar, and between Lough Derrivagh and Lough Hoyle; containing 995 inhabitants. An abbey existed here in the early part of the 7th century, under the superintendence of St. Crumin. The parish comprises 3201 statute acres, of which 75 are in Lough Derrivagh; and contains some limestone, and a small quantity of moory land. It is a curacy, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Leney; the rectory is impropriate in Sir J. B. Piers, Bart., and the tithe rent-charge is £100. 5. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lecken forms part of the district of Multifernam, and has a chapel. On the summit of a hill is Wilson's Hospital, founded and endowed by A. Wilson, Esq., of Piercefield, for the support and education of 160 Protestant boys, with whom an apprentice fee of £10 is given on their leaving the school; and for 20 old male Protestants. The inhabitants of Westmeath have the preference, but those of the adjacent counties are also eligible. The house is a neat building in the form of a square, adorned with a cupola, and with two receding wings connected by a corridor, one of which includes the schoolroom and a dormitory, the other the dining-hall and a dormitory; there is a chapel handsomely fitted up. The trustees are the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin, and the Bishops of Meath and Kilmore. A body of insurgents posted themselves at this hospital in the night of Sept. 5th, 1798, but were almost all killed the following day by part of Lord Cornwallis's army. There are vestiges of an old fort at Carrick; and on a hill near the church is a large rath, with two others in its vicinity.

LECKNOWE.—See PIERCETOWNLANDY.

LECKPATRICK, a parish, in the union and barony of STRABANE, county of TYRONE, and province of ULSTER; containing, with part of the post-town of Strabane, 5523 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Leghpatrick, comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 13,451 statute acres, of which 104 are in the tideway of the Foyle. The soil is generally cold and wet, but part of the land is well cultivated and fertile; there are considerable tracts of mountain pasture and valuable bog. Here is an extensive bleach-green, not used at present; also two manufactories for spades and edged-tools. The Strabane canal passes through the parish, from its lower lock on the Foyle to the quay of Strabane. The principal seats are Holy Hill and Mount Pleasant. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the gift of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £484. 12., and there is a glebe-house, with a glebe of 143 acres, Cunningham measure. The church, a plain edifice without tower or spire, was built by a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1816, and much enlarged in 1824. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Donagheady, and has chapels at Cloghcor and Glenmornan. A Presbyterian meeting-house was lately erected at Artigarran. There is a parochial school, to which the Marquess of Abercorn, who is proprietor of nearly all the parish, subscribes £10, and the rector £5, annually; and to two other public schools the marquess contributes £5 each: there are also national and Sunday schools. Near the glebe-house is an ancient rocking-stone.

LEHINCH, a village, partly in the parish of KILMANAHEEN, but chiefly in that of KILMACREHY, union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing 107 houses, and 433 inhabitants.

LEIGHLIN, OLD, a parish, the seat of a diocese, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the barony of IDRONE WEST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 1¼ mile (S. S. W.) from Leighlin-Bridge, on the road to Castlecomer; containing 3658 inhabitants, of whom 140 are in the village. This place has from a remote period been distinguished for its religious establishments, the earliest of which was a PRIORY for Canons Regular, founded by St. Gobban about the close of the 6th or commencement of the 7th century. A grand synod was held here in 630 to deliberate on the proper time for celebrating the festival of Easter, and was attended by St. Laserian, who had been consecrated bishop by Pope Honorius and sent as legate from the holy see. In 632, St. Gobban built a cell for himself and brethren at another place, and relinquished the abbey to St. Laserian, who made it the head of a see, over which he presided till his death in 638; and so greatly did the monastery flourish that, during the prelacy of St. Laserian, there were at one time not less than 1500 monks in the establishment. The priory was plundered in 916, 978, and 982, and in 1060 was totally destroyed by fire. Among its subsequent benefactors was Burchard, son of Gurmond, a Norwegian, who either founded or endowed the priory of St. Stephen; which, being situated in a depopulated and wasted country, frequently afforded refuge and assistance to the English, in acknowledgment of which Edward III. granted to the prior a concordatum in 1372. This priory was dissolved by Pope Eugene IV., in 1432, and its possessions annexed to the deanery of Leighlin.

The TOWN appears to have derived all its importance and all its privileges from the see. Bishop Harlewin, who governed from 1201 till 1216, granted the inhabitants their burgage-houses, with all franchises enjoyed by Bristol, at a yearly rent of 12*d.* out of every burgage; which grant was confirmed by his successor; and in 1310, Edward II. gave to Ade Le Bretown certain customs to build a tower for the defence of the town, and to maintain three men-at-arms and two hobblers to protect the inhabitants from the attacks of the native Irish. During the prelacy of Richard Rocomb, who succeeded in 1399, there were 86 burgesses in the town, but it was so frequently plundered and desolated by successive hostilities, that it was reduced to an insignificant village. The inhabitants received a charter of incorporation from James II., in the 4th of his reign, the preamble of which recites that the town had been a free borough, and returned two members to the Irish parliament, which it continued to do till the Union, when it was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to the late Board of First Fruits, to be applied in promoting the residence of the clergy. Since the Union the corporation has become extinct; there are only 33 houses in the village.

Arms of the ancient Bishopric.

The DIOCESE OF LEIGHLIN is the smallest of the five which till lately constituted the ecclesiastical province of Dublin. Nothing particularly worthy of notice is recorded of the successors of St. Laserian till the time of Donat, who was made bishop in 1158, and after whose death the prelates were invariably appointed from the English clergy. Notwithstanding the devastation and plunder of the see in the continued hostilities of early times, it experienced no irreparable impoverishment till the succession of Daniel Cavanagh, in 1567: during his prelacy various grants and long leases were made to his friends, reserving for his successors only some very trifling rents; and to such poverty was the bishopric reduced that, upon his decease in 1587, it was granted in commendam to Peter Corse, archdeacon of the diocese, and afterwards held with the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. In 1600, Robert Grave was advanced to the see of Ferns, to which this diocese was then annexed; and the two continued from that time to be held together till 1836, when, on the death of Dr. Elrington, the last bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, both sees were united to the bishopric of Ossory, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act. The see estate of Ferns and Leighlin remains with the bishop of the three united dioceses, Ferns, Leighlin, and Ossory; and the see estate of Ossory, the suppressed bishopric, is vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, together with the mensal lands of Ferns and Leighlin; the residence of the bishop being by the act fixed at Kilkenny, which see.

The diocese is of very irregular form, extending 50 miles in length and varying from 8 to 16 miles in breadth. It comprehends part of the counties of Kilkenny and Wicklow, a considerable portion of the Queen's county, and the whole of the county of Carlow; and comprises an estimated superficies of 318,900 acres, of which 17,500 are in the county of Kilkenny, 42,000 in Wicklow, 122,000 in Queen's county, and 137,050 in the county of Carlow. The lands belonging to the see of Leighlin comprise 12,924 statute acres of profitable land; and the gross annual revenue, on an average of three years ending 1831, amounted to £2667. 7. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacon, and the prebendaries of Tecolme, Ullard, Aghold, and Tullowmagrinagh. The economy estate of the cathedral arises from rents of tithes reserved by lease out of the parishes of Tullowcrine, Slyguff, Ballinacarrig, Rahill, Liscoleman, and Old Leighlin; which, on an average of three years ending September, 1831, amounted to £158. 13. 10. per annum, applied to the payment of the perpetual cure and the repairs of the cathedral. There are four rural deaneries, namely, Leighlin, Carlow, Tullow, and Maryborough. The consistorial court of the diocese is held at Carlow, and consists of a vicar-general, three surrogates, a registrar, and two proctors. The total number of parishes is 80, comprised in 59 benefices, of which 14 are unions of two or more parishes, and 45 are single parishes; 5 benefices are in the patronage of the Crown, 10 in lay or corporation patronage, 9 in joint or alternate patronage, and the remainder in the patronage of the Bishop or Incumbents. The number of churches is 49, and there are four other episcopal places of worship; the number of glebe-houses is 25. In the Roman Catholic divisions this diocese is united with Kildare, and is suffragan to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin: the number of parochial benefices and clergy is given with the diocese of Kildare; the number of chapels is 64.

The parish comprises 9920 statute acres, of which about 400 are bog. Agriculture is improving; there are limestone and flagstone quarries, and coal exists, but is not worked. Old Leighlin is a rectory, belonging in moieties to the bishop, as part of the see estate, and to the chapter of the cathedral, as part of the economy fund: the rectory of Tullowcrine belongs also to the economy fund, and a perpetual curate is endowed to officiate at the cathedral, and to attend to the duties of both parishes, of which the dean and chapter are the incumbents. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £345. 3. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1820; the glebe comprises 12¼ acres. The cathedral, which is also the parish church, is situated in a secluded spot surrounded with hills; it is a plain ancient structure, consisting of a nave 84 feet long, and chancel 60 feet in length, with a square tower 60 feet high, surmounted by a low spire. The edifice was rebuilt, after having been destroyed by fire during the prelacy of Bishop Donat; and the choir was rebuilt by Bishop Sanders in 1527. The western entrance has a handsome doorway and window, and there are two side entrances: in the chancel are the bishop's throne, and the stalls of the dean and chapter; and the building contains several very ancient monuments, with some of the 16th century. On the north side are the remains of two roofless buildings; one of them of small dimensions; and the other 52 feet long and 22 feet wide, with a window of elegant design at its eastern extremity. Of the episcopal palace, which was repaired by Bishop Meredyth in 1589, there are no remains. About 100 yards from the west end of the church is the well of St. Laserian, formerly much resorted to; and in the churchyard is a stone supposed to have marked the boundary of the old borough. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Leighlin-Bridge. There are some chalybeate springs, which are used medicinally.

LEIGHLIN-BRIDGE, a market and post town, partly in the parish of AUGHA, barony of IDRONE-EAST, but chiefly in that of WELLS, barony of IDRONE-WEST, union and county of CARLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (S.) from Carlow, and 45 (S. S. W.) from Dublin, on the coach-road to Cork; containing 1748 inhabitants. This place derives its name from a bridge over the river Barrow, which connects the two parts of the town on the opposite banks with each other and is in a line with the road leading to Old Leighlin, in contradistinction to which place, previously to the erection of the bridge, this town was generally called New Leighlin. The lands were granted by Hugh de Lacy to John de Clahul, or de Claville, who in 1181 erected a strong castle or fortress, called the Black Castle, which was one of the earliest defences of the English in Ireland. Towards the close of the reign of Henry III., a Carmelite monastery was founded near the castle, on the eastern bank of the Barrow, by a member of the Carew family, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. The bridge, of nine arches, was built in 1320 by Maurice Jakis, a canon of the cathedral of Kildare, to facilitate the intercourse between the religious houses of Old and New Leighlin. As the English settlement here became more insecure, the monastery was much exposed to the hostile attacks of the native Irish; and in 1371, Edward III. granted ten marks annually for the repair and rebuilding of the house, which grant was renewed six years afterwards. In 1378, Richard II., in consideration of the expense and labour of supporting the house and the bridge against the king's enemies, bestowed on the prior an annual pension of 20 marks out of the rents of the town of Newcastle of Lyons; he confirmed the gift in 1394, and it was also ratified by Henry IV. and Henry V., the latter monarch ordering that all arrears then due should be paid. In 1408, Gerald, fifth earl of Kildare, built another fortress here, which he called White Castle; and after the Dissolution the monastery was also converted into a fort, and occupied as a military station by Sir Edward Bellingham, Marshal of the English army and Lord-Deputy of Ireland. This fort was taken in 1577 by Rory Oge O'More, dynast of Leix, who destroyed the town by fire; and in 1649 it surrendered to the parliamentarians under Col. Hewson, soon after which the main army under Ireton, on their march to Carlow, laid waste the neighbouring country.

The TOWN still retains many indications of its importance as a military station; it is pleasantly situated on the river Barrow, by which it is divided into two nearly equal parts, and contains 375 houses. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Kilkenny. The market is on Monday and Saturday, and is amply supplied with corn and butter; fairs are held on Easter-Monday, May 14th, Sept. 25th, and Dec. 27th. There is a constabulary police station. The parish church of Wells, and a Roman Catholic chapel, are in that portion of the town which lies on the Wells side of the river; and there is also a national school. About a mile distant is a celebrated spa, much resorted to. At the foot of the bridge, and on the eastern bank of the river, are the ruins of Black Castle, consisting of an oblong tower about 50 feet high, completely capped with ivy; one of the floors resting on an arch is still remaining, and there is a flight of steps leading to the summit. The tower appears to have formed the north-western angle of a quadrangular inclosure, 315 feet in length and 234 feet wide, surrounded by a wall seven feet thick, with a fosse on the outside; part of the wall is standing on the west side, and at the south-eastern angle of the inclosure are the ruins of a round tower, the walls of which are ten feet in thickness. At the south end of the west wall of the quadrangle was the monastery, of which an old building with loop-hole windows, and a stone doorway, are supposed to be the only remaining portion; adjoining, and within the inclosure, was a cemetery, now converted into a garden. In the neighbourhood of the town was the abbey of Achadfinglass, founded by St. Fintan, who died in the 6th century; it was plundered by the Danes in 864, and there are no remains, even the precise site being unknown.

LEIGHMONEY, Leoffoney, or Liffany, a parish, in the union of Kinsale, barony of Kinnalea, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 1½ mile (S. S. E.) from Innishannon, and on the road from Kinsale to Bandon; containing 896 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south by the river Bandon, on the margin of which are the remains of Shippool Castle (formerly called Poolnalong), built in 1496 by the Roche family, and, from its vicinity to Kinsale, twice attacked by the Spaniards in 1601, but vigorously defended by the garrison, who repulsed the assailants with considerable loss. In 1642 the castle was taken by the garrison of Bandon for the king, and by this means a communication was kept open with Kinsale and the eastern parts of the county, which very greatly assisted the royal cause; it was occupied by the father of the present proprietor till 1794. The remains consist of one lofty square tower, apparently battered by artillery, and cannon balls have been found in the vicinity.

The parish comprises 2716 statute acres: the land is generally poor, and chiefly under tillage; about 200 acres are waste, and there is no bog. The system of agriculture is slowly improving under the spirited example of Capt. Herrick; and there are quarries of good freestone, particularly at Shippool, the produce of which is worked into pillars and used for building. Near the castle are some singular rocks of the greenstone formation. The river Bandon is navigable for small vessels up to Colliers'-Quay, opposite to the parish; and great quantities of sea-sand are landed for manure, at four small quays at this place. The only seat of importance is Shippool, a handsome residence in a wooded demesne sloping gradually to the water's edge. There are some extensive hanging-woods, through which the new road from Kinsale to Bandon passes, disclosing some of the richest scenery in the county. On the river are several salmon-weirs, and great quantities of fish are taken. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is but £82. 14., and there is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The church is in ruins, and divine service is performed in the parochial schoolroom, which has been licensed for that purpose. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the union of Innishannon. The parochial school also serves for the parish of Dunderrow; a house and five acres of land were given to it by Captain Herrick. On an eminence near the ivy-clad ruins of the church are the remains of an extensive fortress, called Leoffoney Castle, which was occupied by the Spaniards in 1601, and by the royalists in 1641. There are several chalybeate springs, but they are not much used.

LEITRIM (County of), a county, of which a small portion is maritime, in the province of Connaught; bounded on the west by the counties of Sligo and Roscommon, on the south by that of Longford, on the east by those of Cavan and Fermanagh, and on the north by that of Donegal and by Donegal bay. It extends from 53° 45′ to 54° 29′ (N. Lat.) and from 7° 33′ to 8° 8′ (W. Lon.); and comprises 392,363 statute acres, of which 249,350 are cultivated land, 115, 869 uncultivated, 3396 in plantations, and 23,748 under water. The population, in 1821, was 124,785; in 1831, 141,303; and in 1841, 155,297.

According to Ptolemy, this tract, together with that comprised in the counties of Fermanagh and Cavan, was occupied by the Erdini, called in Irish Ernaigh, who possessed the entire country bordering on Lough Erne. The county, with that of Cavan and part of Fermanagh, afterwards formed the territory of Breffny or Brenny, which was divided into two principalities, of which the present county of Leitrim formed the western, under the name of Lower or West Breffny, and Hy-Briuin-Breffny, from Brian, son of Eachod, and grandson of Muredach; first king of Connaught of the Scottish race. Sometimes the county was designated Breffny O'Ruark, O'Rorke, O'Roirk, or O'Rourk, from the name of the family that ruled over it from a very early period. Its subordinate divisions were, Dromahaire, the present barony of the same name; Lietdrumai or Liathdromen, the modern Leitrim; Munster Eolus, or Hy Colluing, the present baronies of Carrigallen and Mohill, the principal families of which were the Maghrannals, or Mac Granells; and Hy Murragh, the modern barony of Rosslogher, of which the chiefs were the O'Murroghs, or O'Murreys. For some time after the arrival of the English, the whole was considered to form part of the ill-defined county of Roscommon: but the O'Rourks maintained an independent authority in their own territory until the middle of the 16th century. Tiernan O'Rourk, an active military chief, governed here in the latter part of the 12th century, when the princes of Connaught and Leinster combined to expel him from his territory; and Dermod Mac Murrough, the king of Leinster, taking advantage of their success, carried off his wife Dervorghal; but the expelled chieftain having applied for aid to Turlogh, supreme king of Ireland, the latter not only reinstated him in his principality, but regained him his wife. The ENGLISH, soon after their arrival, in conjunction with their ally Dermod, invaded the territory of Breffny, where, however, Dermod was twice defeated, and compelled to secure his safety by a precipitate retreat. O'Rourk afterwards made an unsuccessful attack on Dublin, when in the possession of Strongbow's forces; yet subsequently he joined Henry II. against Roderic, King of Connaught. The line of independent chieftains of this family terminated in Brian O'Rourk, lord of Breffny and Minterolis, who, relying on the promises of Pope Sixtus V. and the King of Spain, threw off his allegiance to Queen Elizabeth; but having been forced to flee to Scotland, he was there taken prisoner and conveyed to London, where he was executed as a traitor, on which occasion it is recorded that the only favour he asked was to be hanged, after his country's fashion, with a rope of twisted withe. His territory having escheated to the crown, extensive grants were made to English proprietors; and, in 1565, it was erected into a county by Sir Henry Sidney, under the name of Leitrim, from its chief town. The O'Rourks ruled over several subordinate septs, the principal families of whom were the O'Murreys, Mac Loghlins, Mac Glanchies, and Mac Granells, some of whose posterity still exist; the descendants of the last-named family are now called Reynolds, a corruption of the original name.

The native Irish were constantly at variance with the English settlers to whom the lands had been parcelled out by Elizabeth and James I.: in the war of 1641 they were among the first who joined the standard of O'Nial; and in a short time the whole country was in the possession of the insurgents, and so continued during the greater part of this war, on the termination of which the lands of all engaged on the part of the Irish were forfeited. At the Restoration, Charles II. made extensive grants to new settlers; and on the abdication of James II. many more grants of a similar nature were made by his successor. During the insurrection of 1798, this part of the kingdom was undisturbed except by a few isolated acts of violence.

The county is partly in the diocese of Ardagh, but chiefly in that of Kilmore. For purposes of CIVIL jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Carrigallen, Dromahaire, Leitrim, Mohill, and Rossclogher. It contains the disfranchised borough, market, and assize town of Carrick-on-Shannon; the disfranchised borough of Jamestown; the market and post towns of Manor-Hamilton, Ballinamore, and Mohill; and the post-towns of Drumod, Drumsna, and Ruskey. The largest villages are Cashcarrigan, Carrigallen, Dromahaire, Drumkeerin, Drumshambo (each of which has a sub-post), Leitrim (once the county and assize town), and Kinlough. The shire and its towns sent six members to the Irish parliament: since the Union two only have been returned, for the county, to the Imperial parliament; the election takes place at Carrick. The number of electors registered in 1841 was 1488, of whom 162 were £50, 98 £20, and 1214 £10, freeholders; 2 £20, and 12 £10, leaseholders. The county is in the Connaught circuit: the assizes and general quarter-sessions are held at Carrick; quarter-sessions are held also at Manor-Hamilton and Ballinamore. The county gaol and court-house are at Carrick; and there are court-houses and bridewells at Manor-Hamilton and Ballinamore: the number of persons charged with criminal offences and committed to prison for this county, in 1844, was 317. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 15 deputy-lieutenants, and 37 other magistrates, with the usual county officers. There are 23 constabulary police stations, having a force of a county inspector, 5 sub-inspectors, 6 head-constables, 26 constables, and 130 sub-constables, with 7 horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £8176, defrayed by grand jury presentments and by government, in equal portions. The county infirmary is at Carrick; the district lunatic asylum for Connaught is at Ballinasloe, where accommodations are provided for 34 cases from this county; and there are dispensaries at Ballinamore, Carrick, Carrigallen, Cloghan, Dromahaire, Drumkeerin, Drumshambo, Drumsna, Kinlough, Manor-Hamilton, and Mohill. The grand jury presentments for 1844 amounted to £18,422. In military arrangements the county is included in the Athlone district, and contains one barrack for infantry at Carrick, having accommodations for 4 officers and 126 men.

The form of the county is somewhat pyramidal or approaching to that of a slender cone, having its base resting on Longford, and its apex on the sea-coast: its extreme length is about 46 miles; its breadth varies from 16 at the former extremity to 2 at the latter. The greater part of the SURFACE not strictly mountainous being occupied by steep hills and deep valleys, the country displays many varieties of picturesque scenery heightened by striking and sudden contrasts of wild heathy mountain, and rich cultivation, wood, and water. The southern extremity from Ruskey to Carrick is fertile and well cultivated, particularly on the banks of the Shannon, which here separates Leitrim from Roscommon and spreads into Lough Boffin, backed by the heights of Sheebeg and Sheemore, forming a fine relief to the lofty grandeur of the more distant mountain of Slieve-an-irin, and the luxuriant swell of the adjacent part of Roscommon. Proceeding northward to Lough Allen, the country, though available for tillage, gradually assumes a gloomy aspect; and immediately from the verge of this lake, steep ascents stretch to a distance of two, three, and four miles to the mountains, which on almost every side terminate the view: but even here various delightful prospects are obtained, especially near the points where the Shannon enters into and emerges from the lake. The summit of the group called Slieve-an-irin, or Slieve-an-Jaroin, to the east of Lough Allen, rises 1922 feet above the level of the sea, and is the highest point in this mountainous district, which extends five or six miles northward; but large tracts of good land appear around Dromahaire, Manor-Hamilton, and Glencar, where the face of the country is extremely varied and pleasing. Not far distant are the mountains of Lacka, 1448 feet high; Lugnacullagh, 1485 feet high; Doon; Glenfarn or Mullaghusk; Benbo, 1365 feet high; and Green Mountain, 920 feet. These do not form a connected chain, but are separated by deep and broad valleys containing innumerable low but steep hills. Like those of the Slieve-an-irin group, the mountains are all of similar character, rising at a steep angle from their bases, and, except Benbo, frequently presenting mural precipices from 60 to 100 feet deep; their summits are all nearly flat, and covered with coarse herbage. Further northward, on approaching the sea, the most barren mountains rise from the fertile vale, amid which many scenes of superior beauty arrest the eye.

The Shannon and its tributaries add greatly to the beauty of the county, which is still further augmented by the numerous LAKES scattered over the surface. The principal of these is Lough Allen, stretching about seven miles in length, between Drumkerrin and Drumshambo, and with a mean breadth of five miles; its south-western extremity is in the county of Roscommon; it is in some places very deep, and owing to the surrounding mountains, the storms upon it are extremely sudden and violent. Lough Gill, though forming part of the western boundary of the county, is chiefly in that of Sligo: it is about five or six miles in length, and two in breadth; and its shores, naturally romantic, have been richly planted and cultivated. Lough Melvyn, which separates the counties of Leitrim and Fermanagh for some distance, is 5 miles in length, and varies in breadth from 3 miles to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile. Lough Clane, otherwise Belhovel Lake, is situated about 4 miles to the north-west of Lough Allen, with which it communicates by the river Duibhachar; this lake is nearly two miles long and one broad, and comprises 345 statute acres. Loughs Bodarrig and Boffin are expansions of the Shannon to the south of Drumsna; another lake worthy of particular notice is that of Garadise, an extensive and pleasing expanse of water, which, with Newtown-Gore Lake and several smaller in the vicinity of Ballinamore and Cashcarrigan, adds greatly to the picturesque beauties of this part of the county.

The climate is very cold and damp, and more variable, perhaps, than that of any other county in Ireland, owing to the great elevation of its surface and its contiguity to the Atlantic. The SOIL is also very various: the tops and sides of most of the hills towards the south have a surface composed of a thin layer of hungry ferruginous loam, resting on a hard gravel of similar nature, and forming a stiff heavy cold clay; that of the valleys is of a more valuable kind, being deeper, and much more fertile. The whole is exceedingly retentive of water, its hard gravelly substance being based on clay-slate of various colours, beneath which occurs, in many places, a yellow, brown, or blackish stiff argillaceous substratum; while in some parts this sort of raw unproductive earth, commonly of a reddish colour, is found immediately beneath the surface. Large tracts of deep, dark, rich loam on a limestone bottom are found in the neighbourhoods of Sheemore, Mohill, Dromahaire, and Manor-Hamilton. The ordinary varieties of peat, forming the soils of the bogs, moors, and much of the mountain, occupy wide tracts.

This is by no means an AGRICULTURAL county, although considerable tracts of land have been brought into cultivation within these few years. The principal crops are oats, potatoes, and flax; the culture of wheat has become more general of late, and bere, barley, and clover are occasionally sown. The general rotation is, potatoes, flax, and afterwards successive crops of oats, until the land is exhausted, when it is generally much encumbered with weeds, and in this state is left to recruit itself by natural means alone; fallowing is unknown here, and grass or clover seeds are rarely sown; hence the land is almost useless until broken up again for potatoes after a few years. When the soil is considered to be too good for flax, wheat sometimes succeeds potatoes; but the land is scarcely ever manured for any but the potato crop. The old heavy wooden plough is generally used in the low country; while in the mountain districts the land is chiefly cultivated by the loy, a narrow spade with a blade about 14 inches long by 3 inches broad, and much bent, with a strong handle 5 or 6 feet long. But neither with the plough nor the loy is fresh soil turned up, the same thin surface being merely broken year after year; and even where the wealthier farmers have introduced the Scotch plough, the ploughman attached to the old method will not cut his furrow deep enough. The light angle harrow is found only with the gentry and wealthier farmers, who are doing much to improve the system of agriculture. Potatoes are in some instances dibbled in, with a pointed stake called "a steeveen;" in others they are spread on the sward or on manure, and the soil dug out of the trenches is thrown over them with a broad awkward shovel. The GRASS lands are of every quality, from the richest herbage to mountain heath and rushes. It is observed, however, that even on the coarsest and most marshy soils, the old native cow thrives well, and both milk and butter are of excellent flavour. Though there are no regular or extensive dairies, almost every family, however poor, has one or more cows; and hence great quantities of butter are made, which is principally carried to market in firkins and bought up to be shipped for England. Leitrim, generally, is not a feeding county like Roscommon; yet there are some excellent farms on which numbers of cattle are annually fed, principally for the Dublin or English markets.

In most of the valleys are found limestone-gravel and marl, which are extensively used for manure; and in the districts of Ballynagleragh and Glenfarn, which are deficient in these materials, the inhabitants bring lime from a distance of three or four miles: sea weed, shells, and sand are not only used in all parts contiguous to the shores, but are carried several miles into the interior. The fences are chiefly a trench from four to six feet wide, having on one side a bank of earth thrown out of the trench, which becomes durable by exposure to the air. A layer of sods is sometimes added, and quicksets are planted on the breast of the bank; but this sort of hedge or fence is found only in the southern parts of the county, where, on some of the larger farms, double-faced banks, with trenches on each side, and planted with thorn, crab, and forest trees, are also to be seen. Farms of every size, from 4 acres to 3000, are to be met with; the larger principally in the mountainous districts, and mostly under pasture, with some inclosures near the dwelling-houses.

Vast numbers of young and store CATTLE are reared, and in some districts there are large flocks of sheep, but they are not so general as they might be: horned-cattle are preferred, because they require less attention. In the southern parts of the county, and generally in the fertile districts, great improvements have been made in the breed of this latter stock, by the introduction of English and Scotch cows of the most esteemed sorts. The Durham is a general favourite, but is too delicate for the climate except in sheltered situations; the North Devon and Hereford do not attain to so great a size as at home. The cross which appears best suited to the richer parts of the county, is that between the old Leicester and Durham; and in the upland districts, the blood of the Leicester mixes well with that of the native long-horned stock, producing a large and useful animal well adapted to the soil and climate, which thrives well, fattens rapidly, and makes excellent beef. The breed of Sheep has also been greatly improved: the new Leicester answers well on the limestone soils, and, in both size and fleece, is not inferior to any in England. But the breed most encouraged is a cross between the Leicester and the native; the fleece is good, and the flavour of the mutton highly esteemed. Pigs, though numerous, are neither so general nor so good as in some of the northern and southern counties. Goats are found most frequently at the foot of the mountains, and are often an appendage to the cabin on the plain; but they are not by any means so common as in the mountainous counties of Munster. The Horse, which appears to combine the characteristics of all the breeds to be met with in Roscommon, Longford, and Sligo, is not so good as that of any of those counties, being mostly small and light: the gentlemen and large farmers, however, have horses admirably adapted for the saddle. A light and useful one-horse cart has every where superseded the old solid wheel and slide car.

Leitrim was formerly celebrated for its numerous and extensive forests. So lately as 1605, five are distinctly mentioned as being of very considerable extent, under the names of the forests of Drummat, Clone, Drumdaragh, Cortmore, and Screeney; all of these have long since disappeared, and this county, like the rest of Connaught, presents a bleak and denuded aspect. Yet vestiges of woods are seen around Lurganboy and Woodville, which have some appearance of the remains of ancient forests; and there are old plantations, containing full-grown timber, in various parts, with others of modern growth around some of the mansions of the gentry: there are also several nurseries. An orchard and a good kitchen-garden are a usual appendage to the farmhouse.

The GEOLOGY of the county presents many remarkable features. The lowest strata are those of the primary mountain range entering from the county of Sligo and extending from south-west to north-east: this range is mostly composed of mica-slate; a green steatite, thickly studded with valuable garnets, has been found at the foot of a mountain near Lurganboy. On the western base of Benbo, a clay of a blueish-white hue has been found, and used for fullers'-earth; the western side of the same mountain is traversed by a metallic vein containing copper pyrites, which was formerly wrought. Veins of the sulphuret of lead have also been largely wrought in several places between Benbo and Lurganboy. This primary range is generally bordered on both sides by beds of variously coloured freestone, to which limestone succeeds in every direction, occupying the remainder of the northern portion of the county and forming part of the great limestone field of Ireland. All the central portion of the county forms part of the Connaught COAL field, constituting a vast basin of which Lough Allen is the centre. The principal vein of coal is about three feet thick, of very great extent, and of excellent quality both for domestic purposes and for smelting; but the beds are often interrupted by faults, by which portions of the strata are broken and thrown upwards from 20 to 40 yards. It was originally discovered in the Munterkenny mountains, and such was the importance attached to the discovery that a parliamentary grant was made for the formation of roads to it; but the workings were soon discontinued in consequence of a fault, by which the stratum was considerably elevated, and which induced the workmen, who were ignorant of the cause of the interruption and of the means of remedying it, to relinquish any further operations. In the northern part of the coal district, the beds are found only in the higher parts of Lugnacuillagh and Lacka. Extensive quarries of fine-grained yellowish-white sandstone are worked near the summit of Glanfarn mountain, for window-seats and various ornamental purposes. Lacka mountain contains a great bed of sandstone, the strata of which form a succession of abrupt precipices with considerable flat intervals between them; above the sandstone are beds of slate-clay succeeded by layers of coal from 4 to 6 inches thick, alternating with beds of sandstone: this field has been but little worked. The stratification of Lugnacuillagh mountain, on the borders of Cavan, much resembles that of Lacka. The remainder of the coal district to the east of Lough Allen is composed of the great mountain group of Slieve-an-irin, or Slieve-an-Jaroin, "the Iron Mountain;" its stratification is extremely irregular. Three layers of coal have been discovered in it, one of them of good quality, 18 inches thick. Rich clay iron-stone abounds also at various elevations, and was worked so long as timber could be procured to feed the furnaces: those of Drumshambo, the last in operation, were abandoned in 1765. The ore of Slieve-an-irin is said to be far richer than that on the Roscommon side of the lake. In the channels of many of the streams descending from it, are beds of pipe-clay and yellow ochre. Manganese is also found in great abundance.

The manufactures are few: the principal are the spinning of flax and the weaving of linen-cloth, which are carried on in some parts to a considerable extent; the greater part of the cloth is sold in the open market to the merchants and bleachers of the county, and the remainder is purchased by buyers from the neighbouring northern counties. There are only four bleach-greens now in operation, in which about 32,000 pieces are annually finished, principally for the English market. Coarse pottery is made near Dromahaire and Leitrim, in quantities sufficient to supply the domestic demand. Friezes, flannels, and woollen stuffs are made in various parts, and are considered equal to any of Irish fabric, particularly the flannels, which are in great esteem and always command good prices. The commerce of the county is on a very limited scale, consisting chiefly in the sale of butter, live cattle, pigs, and a small portion of the manufactured articles above noticed. Fresh-water fish of every kind are abundant in all the rivers and lakes; very fine salmon are caught in the Bundoran river, below Lough Melvin; and off the coast, great quantities of herrings, sprats, cod, ling, and whiting, are taken.

The principal of the numerous RIVERS is the Shannon (originally Sionan, signifying "calmness," but afterwards written Shenan), which enters the county in a copious stream about four miles from its source in the midst of the lonely district of Glangavlin, in the county of Cavan, and descends southward into Lough Allen, whence it emerges near Drumshambo and pursues a winding southern course by Leitrim, Carrick-on-Shannon, Jamestown, and Drumsna; it thence proceeds south-eastward, and, after forming the Loughs Bodarig and Boffin, quits the county below Ruskey. Throughout the whole of its course from Lough Allen to this point, it separates the county from that of Roscommon, and is navigable. The Abhain-Naille, which takes its name from St. Naille, or Natalis, who built a monastery at its source, rises in Killowman lake, on the summit of Lacka mountain, whence it issues in a copious stream; and, being soon joined by other rivulets, becomes a river of considerable size, and descends with rapidity to join the Shannon. The Duibhachar river runs from Belhovel lake southward into Lough Allen: it is but four miles in length, and is at first a small stream; but being joined by numerous tributaries descending from the mountain and hills of Barradaaltdeag, or "the tops of the twelve dingles," it becomes both wide and deep. The smaller rivers are very numerous, rippling through endless varieties of scenery in various parts of the county; one worthy of especial notice is the Boonid or Bonnet, which rises in the parish of Rossinver, and flows along the beautiful vale of Dromahaire into Lough Gill. The Shannon has been rendered navigable by means of several cuts, or short CANALS. The principal is that from the south-eastern extremity of Lough Allen to Battle Bridge, four miles above Carrick; it was completed in 1817 by means of a parliamentary grant of £15,000, and is about 5 miles in length. Hitherto it has been of little advantage; but from the great mineral wealth of the districts with which it is connected, the high reputation the iron found in them has already acquired, the railway lately constructed from the Arigna works to Lough Allen, and the numerous advantages to be expected from a spirit of internal commerce judiciously directed, it is to be hoped that this fine canal, now nearly choked with reeds, will be made available towards increasing the prosperity of the county. Other short cuts, more or less connected with the Shannon near the shores of Leitrim, belong properly to Roscommon, and are described in the article on that county.

The roads are numerous, but by no means well laid out, nor do they pass through the districts where they would be most useful to the public. Throughout every part of the mountainous tracts, with one exception, there are no passable roads; the want is generally felt, and universally admitted, but no effort was made to remedy it until a recent year, when the grand jury decided upon opening a new mail line from Sligo to Ballyshannon, through the mountains of Rocclogher, between Cartrongibbough and the Deerpark: the line is already marked out, but its formation has not yet commenced. This improvement, however, will not touch upon, or afford an opening into, the rich mineral districts of Leitrim. Some important roads have been formed in various parts, but being made by contract the foundations are defective, and the roads themselves are now much neglected, although the materials are every where most abundant and of superior quality.

Vestiges of the remotest antiquity are not numerous: there are but two Druidical altars, one within half a mile of Fena, and the other on the demesne of Letterfyan; they are called respectively by the inhabitants Leaba Dearmudi Graine, or "Darby and Graine's Bed or Altar." Fifteen religious houses are recorded to have formerly existed within the limits of the county; and there are still remains of those of Fena, Annaghduff, Clone, Kilnaille, and Ince in Lough Allen. The castles and fortified mansions were also very numerous: those which remain, more or less in ruin, are, O'Rourk's Castle, near the fortified residence called Dromahaire Castle; those of Jamestown and Longfield; Castlefore; Castle John; Cloncorrick Castle; Castle Car; the fortresses of Dungarbery and Manor-Hamilton; and two castles on the banks of Lough Gill. The modern seats, which are not remarkable either for number or grandeur, are noticed under the heads of the parishes in which they are respectively situated. The farmhouses are usually long narrow cabins, which sometimes shelter the cattle in common with the family; but houses of a better description, with chimneys, partitions, and separate or detached buildings, are gradually superseding them. The fuel is turf, procured in great abundance through every part of the county. The general food is potatoes and oaten-bread, sometimes with buttermilk, or with fish; butchers' meat is only used at Easter and Christmas, or on other great festive occasions. The clothing of the men is neat and strong, the coat mostly of frieze, the smallclothes of corduroy; the females usually wear a coarse woollen-stuff petticoat, and of late cotton gowns have become common. The general character of the people is that of sobriety and industry: the English language is every where spoken by adults and children, and mostly by elderly people, except in the remote mountain districts, and even there it rarely occurs that a person is met with who cannot speak it. The principal natural curiosities, besides those already noticed as forming grand features of the surface, are the chalybeate and sulphureous springs, of which latter the most noted are the spas of Drumsna, Meelock, and Athimonus, besides several about Drumshambo and Cashcarrigan. The chief chalybeate spas are those on the border of Cavan, at the northern extremity of Lough Allen; and Oakfield, within two miles of the sea. In 1783, Robert Clements, Esq., was created Baron Leitrim of Manor-Hamilton; he was advanced to the viscounty in 1793, and created Earl of Leitrim in 1795, which titles are now enjoyed by his son.

LEITRIM, a parish, partly in the union of LISMORE, barony of COSHMORE and COSHBRIDE, county of WATERFORD, but chiefly in that of FERMOY, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Kilworth; on the north side of the river Blackwater, and on the road from Fermoy to Lismore; containing 2579 inhabitants. It comprises 7128 statute acres. Of the land, which is of variable quality, that portion on the banks of the river is the best: limestone, brownstone, and slate are found in the parish, of which the former is quarried for agricultural purposes, but the latter two are not worked. The only seat is Kilmurry, beautifully situated in the midst of some extensive improvements at the junction of the two counties, which are here separated only by a small glen stream and a mountain path. Leitrim is in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in William Norcott, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilworth. The tithe rent-charge is £345, payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish also forms part of the union or district of Kilworth. In the demesne of Kilmurry was discovered, some years since, a number of human skeletons; which circumstance, combined with the word Kil, has led to the inference that a church, or cell to some religious house, formerly existed here.

LEITRIM, a parish, in the union of LOUGHREA, barony of LEITRIM, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Portumna, on the road to Loughrea; containing 1562 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded by the Slievebaughta mountains, comprises $4098\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres; the land is in general in a profitable state of cultivation, and there is very little bog. The principal seats are Carrowkeel and Dalystown. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Lickmolassey; the rectory is appropriate to the see, and the tithe rent-charge of the parish is £51. 8. 8., of which £10. 7. 9. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the vicar. There is no church, glebe-house, or glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Kilcooley; the chapel here is a neat edifice, and there is also a chapel at Kilcooley. There is a school, of which the school-house was built by the Hon. F. Ponsonby. Considerable remains exist of the castle of Leitrim, in good preservation; and the ruins of an old chapel are attached to it, the cemetery of which is still used. Petrified cockle and muscle shells are found at Carrowkeel, which is about 18 miles distant from the sea.

LEITRIM, a village, in the parish of KILTOGHART, union of CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, barony and county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Carrick-on-Shannon, and on the eastern bank of the river Shannon; containing 68 houses, and 406 inhabitants. It is recorded that St. Mac Liegus, son of Cernac, was bishop of Lictdrumai, or Liathdromen, which was the original name of this place. A castle existed here in ancient times, from which, or, as some state, from the castle of Dromahaire, Dervorghal, wife of O'Rourk, Prince of Breffny, was taken by Dermod, King of Leinster; which was one of the causes of the English invasion. There are some remains of ancient buildings, which probably formed part of the castle. Fairs are held on Jan. 22nd, Feb. 21st, March 25th, May 5th, June 16th, July 23rd, Sept. 1st, Oct. 13th, and Dec. 1st. Leitrim was formerly a place of importance, and gave name to the county.

LEIXLIP, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, partly in the barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, but chiefly in the barony of NORTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 12 miles (N. N. E.) from Naas, and 8 (W.) from Dublin; containing 2033 inhabitants, of whom 1086 are in the town. This place was included in the grant made to Adam Fitz Hereford, one of the earliest of the English adventurers, who is said to have built the castle, which is situated on an eminence overlooking the river Liffey, and according to tradition was the occasional residence of John, Earl of Morton, while governor of Ireland in the reign of his father Henry II. Leixlip was afterwards granted to the abbey of St. Thomas' Court, Dublin; and by an inquisition in 1604 it appears that Thomas Cottrel, the last abbot of that house, was seized of the manor of Leixlip, and the right of a flagon of ale out of every brewing in the town. The castle and manor were subsequently purchased by the Right Hon. Thomas Conolly, speaker of the Irish house of commons, and are now the property of Colonel Conolly, of Castletown. This venerable castle was the favourite retreat of several of the viceroys, of whom Lord Townsend usually spent the summer here; it is at present the residence of the Hon. George Cavendish, by whom it has been modernised and greatly improved. The other seats are Rye Vale, Leixlip House, and Music Hall.

The TOWN is situated near the confluence of the Rye Water with the river Liffey, over which is an ancient stone bridge of three arches; and on the coach-road from Dublin to Galway. It consists only of one street; the houses, 152 in number, are irregularly built, and, with the exception of a few of handsome appearance, have generally an aspect of negligence and decay. The inhabitants are amply supplied with water from springs. On the banks of the Liffey are rolling-mills for the manufacture of bar and sheet iron, and near them is a flour-mill; a mill race 40 feet wide has been constructed in the castle demesne, for the purpose of turning another mill, or for applying water power to some manufactory. On the Rye Water is the Rye Vale distillery, which produces more than 20,000 gallons of whiskey annually. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Naas. The Royal Canal approaches within half a mile, and is carried over the Liffey by an aqueduct nearly 100 feet high; affording facility of water-carriage to Dublin. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held annually on May 4th and Oct. 9th. There is a constabulary police station.

The PARISH comprises 3202 statute acres; a considerable portion of the land is in pasture for fattening stock for the Dublin, Liverpool, and Bristol markets, and the remainder is under tillage. The soil is good, and the system of agriculture slowly but progressively improving; there is neither waste nor bog, and, from the consequent scarcity of fuel, the peasantry are dependent on such precarious supplies as they can find in the roads and hedges. Limestone is very abundant, and is quarried to a considerable extent, for building, and also for burning into lime for manure. The country around, though deficient in those striking features of romantic grandeur which distinguish the neighbouring county of Wicklow, concentrates much that is pleasing and picturesque in landscape. The surface is finely undulating, and richly diversified with wood and water; and the view embraces the town with its bridge, numerous elegant seats with highly cultivated demesnes, ancient and picturesque ruins, distant mountains, and a variety of other interesting features of rural scenery. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin, united by act of council, prior to 1662, to the vicarages of Esker and Lucan, the curacies of Confoy and Stacumnie, and the denominations of Aldergh, Westmorestown and St. Catherine's, and in the patronage of the Archbishop. The tithe rent-charge for the whole union is £450. The glebe-house was built in 1822, by the then incumbent, partly by aid of a loan of £562 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe consists of 23 acres of profitable land. The church, an ancient structure with a massive square tower, has been repaired by a grant of £291 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Maynooth and Leixlip; the chapel, lately built, occupies a commanding site presented by Colonel Conolly. In the parish is a chalybeate spring of great strength and purity, which was in high repute towards the close of the last century; in winter the water is somewhat tepid: it is situated about half a mile from the town, by the side of the canal. The Right Hon. Thomas Conolly intended to build a pump-room and an hotel; but dying before they were commenced, the design was abandoned for the more fashionable spa of Lucan, which is nearer to Dublin.

LEMANAGHAN, or KILNEGARENAGH, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of GARRYCASTLE, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Clara; containing, with the villages of Ballycumber, Bellair, and Grogan (which are separately described), 5806 inhabitants. This place, which is also called Melain, is situated on the river Brosna; and appears to have derived its name from St. Manachan, probably the founder of the monastery here, of which he died abbot in 661. The establishment continued to flourish till 1205, after which it became a parish church; and there are still some remains of the building, surrounded by a large tract of bog. The PARISH comprises 19,615 statute acres, of which 200 are woodland, 6740 arable, 4000 pasture, and the remainder bog; the system of agriculture is very backward, little improvement having been made within the last two centuries. Limestone abounds, and is quarried for agricultural and other purposes. The principal seats are Bellair, Prospect, Moorock, The Doon, Castle Armstrong, Ballycumber House, Twickenham, and Hollybrook. Fairs are held at Ballycumber on Dec. 1st and May 2nd, for horned-cattle, sheep, and pigs, but they are very indifferently attended; and petty-sessions are held alternately at Bellair and Doon, on Fridays.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, formerly held by faculty with the rectory and vicarage of Tessauran, but now separately, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £311. 11.; there is no glebe-house, but there is a neat small cottage, on the glebe, which comprises 79 acres. The church is a plain edifice, situated at Liss, and built in 1826, partly by parochial assessment, but chiefly by aid of a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits; and an organ was erected in it at the cost of T. H. Mulock, Esq. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is in the diocese of Ardagh, and forms part of the district of Ballinahone: the chapel is a very humble building; on the altar is an ancient shrine, supposed to contain the bones of St. Manachan. A dispensary is supported at the expense of Dr. Molloy, who has also invested £500 in a loan fund, which is supported solely by him. There are some remains of the castle of Lemanaghan; and at Doon are the remains of the ancient castle of the O'Mooneys, now in the possession of R. J. E. Mooney, Esq., a lineal descendant of that family, whose residence is on the estate. Of the castle, which was a spacious structure on a rock, only one tower is remaining; it is thickly overspread with ivy, and forms a picturesque object.

LENEY, a parish, in the union of MULLINGAR, barony of CORKAREE, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Mullingar, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Sligo; containing, with the village of Ballinalack, 1455 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the south-west by Lough Iron, and on the south-east by Lough Hoyle, comprises 4231½ statute acres, chiefly under tillage; the system of agriculture is unimproved: there is but very little bog; black stone of a good quality is quarried for building, and also for flags. The seats are, Clanhugh, a lodge belonging to Lord Forbes; and Lakeview. Fairs are held at Ballinalack twice in the year. The living is an impropriate curacy, in the diocese of Meath, episcopally united to the curacies of Templeoran, Kilmacnevin, Lecken, and Tyfernon, together constituting the union of Leney, in the patronage of Sir J. B. Piers, Bart., in whom the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £88. 11. 6., payable to the impropriator; the curate's stipend is £78, arising from payments of £64 per annum from Primate Boulter's, and £14 from Bishop Evans's, fund. The glebe-house was erected in 1817, by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 20 acres of profitable land, subject to a rent of £36. 2. 6. The church, a plain edifice, was built (near the village of Brumbrusna) by a loan of £350 from the same Board; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners lately granted £129 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Multifarnam. The Farra Charter-school, for boarding and clothing 100 children, and apprenticing them with a premium of £7, and a gratuity of £3 to each boy on the expiration of his indentures, was endowed by the Rev. W. Wilson; the parochial school is supported under the patronage of J. Gibbons, Esq., who gives the master £10 per annum with a house and garden, and appropriates 2½ acres of land to it.

LERRIGS, a village, in the parish of KILMOILEY, union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 7 miles (N.) from Tralee, on the road to Causeway; containing 26 houses, and 116 inhabitants. The Roman Catholic chapel for this portion of the district of Ardfert is situated in the village.

LESKINFERE, or CLOUGH, a parish, in the union and barony of GOREY, county of WEXFORD, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Gorey, on the high road to Enniscorthy; containing 1260 inhabitants. During the disturbances of 1798, a battle was fought at Tubbernecarig Rock, in this parish, between the king's troops and the insurgents, in which Colonel Walpole, who commanded the former, was killed. The parish comprises 5380¾ statute acres, the greater portion under tillage: the soil in some parts is poor and shingly, but in general moderately good; there is an abundance of marl, which is used as manure. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Ferns, united by act of council, in 1739, to the rectories of Ballycannew, Kiltrisk and Monomolin, forming together the union of Leskinfere, and constituting the corps of the treasurership of Ferns, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £238. 10., and of the entire benefice £777. 16. The glebe-house was built by the late incumbent, in 1805, at an expense of £1400, towards which the Board of First Fruits gave £100; it has been surrounded by the present incumbent with a thriving plantation. There are 64 acres of glebe in the union, of which 16 are attached to the glebe-house. The church, a handsome edifice in the later English style, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected in 1831 by a loan of £1250 from the Board of First Fruits; the churchyard is well planted. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Camolin. About 100 children, Protestant and Roman Catholic, are taught in the parochial school: the school-house is a neat building, erected chiefly by aid of a grant of £60 from the Lord Lieutenant's fund; it is about to be enlarged. At Tubbernecarig is a strongly impregnated chalybeate spring.

LETTERKENNY, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of CONWALL, barony of KILMACRENAN, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 13½ miles (W.) from Lifford, and 116½ (N. W.) from Dublin, on the road from Lifford to Ramelton and Dunfanaghy; containing 2161 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Swilly, over which are two bridges, and consists of one street with a market-square, containing 358 houses. The market is on Friday, and is well supplied with provisions; the fairs are on the Friday before Christmas, Easter-Monday, May 12th, July 10th, the third Friday in August, and Nov. 8th. The Belfast Bank has a branch here. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Londonderry. A constabulary police force is stationed at Letterkenny; petty-sessions are held every Wednesday, and the quarter-sessions for the county are held here in April and October: the court-house is a neat building, and there is a bridewell, containing six cells and two day-rooms, with two airing-yards. In the mountains in the vicinity are great quantities of stone of good quality, and some marl; on the shores of the lough are potters'-clay and clay for bricks. The river is navigable from Lough Swilly to this place for vessels of 150 tons' burthen. The parish church, and the Roman Catholic chapel of the district of Aughnish, a plain small building, are situated in the town; and there are two places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and one for Covenanters; also a national school, a dispensary, and a small fever hospital. The union workhouse, on a site of 4¼ acres purchased for £480, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £5790, and is constructed to contain 500 paupers. Near this place were the ancient English settlements of Drummore and Lurgagh, comprising about 2000 acres, with a hawn of brick and a castle of stone in a strong position, and a village at some distance, in which were 29 British families able to muster 64 men-at-arms; Dunboy was a territory comprising 1000 acres, where, at the time of Pynnar's survey, in 1619, John Cunningham had a strong bawn 70 feet square and 14 feet high, defended by two lofty towers, with a castle and 26 houses and a mill within the inclosure, the houses tenanted by British families able to muster 50 armed men.

LETTERLUNA, or LETTER, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of BALLYBRIT, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, 1½ mile (N.) from Kinnitty, and on the road from Dublin to Parsonstown; containing, with the village of Cadamstown, 1115 inhabitants. The parish comprises 8430 statute acres. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe; the rectory is partly impropriate in H. Malone, Esq., and partly united to the vicarage, which forms part of the union of Kinnitty; the tithe rent-charge is £55. 7. 9., of which £13. 17. are payable to the impropriator and the remainder to the incumbent. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor glebe. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kinnitty or Longford.

LETTERMACWARD, a parish, in the union of GLENTIES, barony of BOYLAGH, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 21 miles (W. S. W.) from Letterkenny, and on the road from Killybegs to Rutland Island; containing 2475 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Guibarra, comprises 20,800½ statute acres, of which 512 are in the tideway of the river, and 503 in lakes; of the remainder, a large portion is mountain waste and bog. The system of agriculture is in an unimproved state, a very small portion of the land being under tillage; there are strong indications of rich lead-ore, in which silver-ore has been found. Fairs are held on Feb. 20th, May 20th, Aug. 20th, and Oct. 1st, for cattle and sheep; and manorial courts are held occasionally. Prior to the 25th of March, 1835, this parish formed part of the corps of the deanery of Raphoe, from which it was then separated. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Raphoe, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithe rent-charge is £67. 1. 6. The glebe-house was built by a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1828; the glebe comprises four acres. The church is a plain edifice, erected about 1788. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also a portion of the parish of Templecroan; the chapel here is a small building, and there is also a chapel at Templecroan. The parochial school is partly supported from Colonel Robertson's fund; another school was built with the surplus of the funds granted by the Board of First Fruits for erecting the glebe-house. Very large seals are taken in the river Guibarra. Near the glebe-house is a large moat.

LEWISBURGH, or LOUISBOURG, an ecclesiastical district, and a market and post town, in the parish of KILGAVOWER, union of WESTPORT, barony of MURRISK, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 11 miles (W. S. W.) from Westport. This place is situated near the mouth or entrance of Clew bay, on the southern shore; the district is romantic and beautiful in the summer months, and well worthy of the notice of tourists, but although capable of great improvement, it is yet in a wild and uncultivated state. It includes the isles of Clare and Innisturk; and contains a population exceeding 12,000, though about sixty years ago it was almost entirely uninhabited. The village, which contains 448 inhabitants, has some few good houses lately built, and would be a suitable place for trade, were efforts made to encourage it: it has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Westport; a market for provisions, held on Monday; and fairs on the 24th of June, August 4th, and Sept. 29th. A constabulary police force, also, is stationed in the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Tuam, and in the patronage of the Bishop and the Incumbent of Westport; the stipend is, £80 paid by the incumbent of Westport, and £46 paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The glebe-house, a neat edifice, was built in 1826, by a gift of £415 and a loan of £46 from the Board of First Fruits; there is a glebe consisting of 20 acres. The church, also a neat edifice, was erected in 1798, and was repaired by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1839. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lewisburgh forms a separate district; the chapel is a good slated building.

LICKBLA, or LICKBLAGH, a parish, in the union of GRANARD, barony of DEMIFORE, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Castlepollard, on the road to Finae; containing 2394 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the north by Lough Sheelin, and on the west by Lough Kinail and the river Inny, and is intersected by the river Glore, which issues from the latter lake and falls into the Inny. It comprises 8837¾ statute acres, of which a very large portion is mountain and bog; the system of agriculture is improving, and limestone is quarried for building and for burning into lime. The surface is uneven, and towards the east marked by mountainous elevations; the high rock of Curreagh and the mountain of Moil rise within the limits of the parish. Lickbla is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Rathgraff; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Westmeath, and the tithe rent-charge is £207. 14., of which £92. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The church has long been a ruin. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lickbla forms part of the district of Castlepollard; the chapel is near Carlanstown. There are several raths in the parish; and on the rock of Moil is found a species of coral. Near Curreagh are the ruins of Rathcreenagh Castle, situated on a high mound, with a large rath nearly adjoining; and at Carlanstown are the ruins of a mansion belonging to a branch of the Nugent family, of whom Lord George Grenville Nugent Temple, second son of the late Marchioness of Buckingham, is, in right of his mother, Baron Nugent of Carlanstown: a good farmhouse was built by the late Duke of Buckingham on the site of the old mansion.

LICKERRIG, a parish, partly in the barony of ATHENRY, partly in that of LOUGHREA, but chiefly in that of DUNKELLIN, union of LOUGHREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3 miles (N. W.) from Loughrea, on the road to Athenry; containing 1191 inhabitants, and comprising 4465¾ statute acres. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, forming part of the union of Kilconicky; the rectory is partly appropriate to the see, partly to the deanery, and partly to the rectory of Loughrea. The tithe rent-charge is £65. 5. 9., of which £17. 6. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, a similar sum to the dean, £13. 3. to the rector of Loughrea, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lickerrig forms part of the district of Carrabawn, which also comprises Kilconeran and contains a chapel in each parish.

LICKFINN, a parish, in the barony of SLIEVARDAGH, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3¼ miles (N. E.) from Killenaule; containing 548 inhabitants. The parish comprises 680 statute acres. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and forms part of the ecclesiastical union of Killenaule; the tithe rent-charge is £20. 14.

LICKMOLASSY, a parish, in the barony of LONGFORD, union of LOUGHREA, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, on the road from Gort to Roscrea; containing, with the post-town of Portumna (which is separately described), 5742 inhabitants; and comprising 12,112¾ statute acres. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert, united about 1735 to the rectory of Ballynakill and the vicarage of Leitrim, together constituting the union of Lickmolassy, in the patronage of the Marquess of Clanricarde: the rectory is appropriate to the see. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £207. 14., of which £34. 12. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £390. 8. The glebe-house was built in 1813, and the late Board of First Fruits gave £400, and lent a similar sum, towards its erection: the glebe of the union comprises 28 acres. There are two churches; one in the town of Portumna, erected in 1832, by aid of a loan of £1500 from the Board of First Fruits; and the other at Woodford, in the parish of Ballynakill. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Portumna, which also comprises the parish of Kilnabronogue and contains the chapels of Portumna and Lickmolassy, and the friary chapel of Boula in the parish of Kilnabronogue. Several schools are supported in the parish.

LICKORAN, or LAUCORAN, a parish, in the barony of DECIES-without-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (N. E.) from Cappoquin, containing 625 inhabitants, and comprising 2415 statute acres. It is in the diocese of Lismore; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Whitechurch: the tithe rent-charge is £57. 13. 4., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator and the remainder to the vicar.

LIFFORD, an assize town (formerly a parliamentary borough) and a parish, in the union of STRABANE, barony of RAPHOE, county of DONEGAL, and province of ULSTER, 1 mile (W.) from Strabane, and 102 (N. by W.) from Dublin, on the road from Strabane to Letterkenny; containing 5686 inhabitants, of whom 752 are in the town. This place, formerly called Ballyduff and Liffer, and of which the parish still retains its ancient name of Clonleigh, was first distinguished as the residence of the chiefs of the sept of the O'Donells, who had a strong castle here, in which Manus O'Donell, Prince of Tyrconnell, after being detained prisoner for the last eight years of his life by his own son Calvagh, died in 1563. Hugh O'Donell, called Red Hugh, in 1596, entertained in this castle Don Alonzo Copis, emissary of Philip III. of Spain, who had been sent to ascertain the state of Ireland previously to the embarkation of a Spanish force for its assistance against the English. In 1600, Nial Garbh O'Donell, who had abandoned the cause of Hugh, led 1000 men of the English garrison of Derry to this place, which, from the previous destruction of its castle, was defended only by ramparts of earth and a shallow ditch. On the approach of the English, the garrison of Hugh O'Donell abandoned the place, and encamped within two miles of it; and the English took possession of the post, which they fortified with walls of stone. Nial O'Donell, after some weeks had elapsed without any action taking place, observing some disorder in the camp of Hugh, advised the English to attack it; but after an obstinate battle, in which many were killed on both sides, the English retreated to their fortifications, and Hugh O'Donell soon after led his forces into Connaught to oppose the young Earl of Clanricarde. Under the protection of this English fortress the present town first arose, and in 1603 had attained such importance that a market was granted by James I. to Sir Henry Docwra, Knt., governor of Lough Foyle. In 1611, the "village of Liffer," with the fortress and about 500 acres of land adjoining, were, on the settlement of Ulster, given by James to Sir Richard Hansard, with right to hold two fairs in the town; on condition that he should, within five years, assign convenient portions of land to sixty inhabitants for the erection of houses with gardens, and 200 acres for a common; and that he should also set apart 100 acres for the keep of 50 horses, should His Majesty think proper to place a garrison of horse in the town. The same monarch, in the 10th of his reign, granted to the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, under the designation of the "Warden, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Liffer;" from which time its progress was gradual.

The TOWN is situated in a beautiful valley at the base of an extensive range of mountains, and on the western bank of the river Foyle, over which is a stone bridge of twelve arches leading into the county of Tyrone. It consists of two streets, and contains 122 houses, of which several are neat and well built: the market and fairs have been discontinued. There are infantry barracks for 3 officers and 54 non-commissioned officers and privates. A post under Strabane has been established; and there is a constabulary police station in the town. The CORPORATION by the charter consisted of a warden, 12 free burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, assisted by two serjeants-at-mace and other officers. The warden, who was also clerk-of-the-market, was annually elected from the free burgesses, who were chosen for life from the commonalty or freemen by a majority of their own body, by whom also the freemen were admitted and the serjeants-at-mace and other officers appointed. The borough returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when it was disfranchised. A court of record for the recovery of debts to the amount of £3. 6. 8. was granted by the charter, to be held weekly before the warden, but no proceedings appear to have issued from it for a long period; the corporation seems to have ceased in the last century to exercise any other municipal function than that of returning members to the Irish parliament, and since the Union it has become quite extinct. The assizes and January quarter-sessions are held in the town. The court-house is well adapted for holding the various courts, and the county gaol is a very spacious and handsome building in the castellated style, the new portion on the panoptic plan; it is divided into six wards, is well arranged for classification, and capable of receiving 124 prisoners. The men are employed in breaking stones, and in pounding bones for manure, for which there is a large demand, and the women in needlework, spinning, and washing; there is a good school, and the discipline and interior economy have been recommended to the imitation of the managers of other prisons.

The parish, which is also called Clonleigh, comprises 12,517½ statute acres; 153 are in the tideway of the river Foyle. The principal seats are Clonleigh and Cavanacor. The river is navigable for vessels of 20 tons from Derry to this place. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £630, and the glebe comprises 515 acres, of which 177 are uncultivated land. The church is a neat edifice of stone with a square tower, and contains a monument to Sir Richard Hansard and Anne, his wife, enumerating his various benefactions to the town. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Camus-juxta-Morne: the chapel, within a mile of the town, is a neat edifice. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. About 450 children are taught in eight public schools, of which one was endowed by Sir Richard Hansard with £30 per annum for a master and £20 for an usher, both appointed by the Bishop of Derry, who is visiter; three are parochial schools, supported, one by Lord Erne and two by the rector; and four schools are in connexion with the National Board of Education. Mr. Blackburn, in 1806, bequeathed £200, the interest of which he appropriated to be annually distributed among poor householders; but by some mismanagement the principal has been wasted, and the intention of the donor frustrated. There are remains of three religious houses, at Ballibogan, Churchminster, and Clonleigh; the monastery of Cluanleodh, according to Archdall, was founded by St. Columb, and St. Carnech was bishop and abbot of the establishment in 530. Lifford gives the titles of Baron and Viscount to the family of Hewitt.

LIMERICK (County of), in the province of MUNSTER, bounded on the north by the estuary of the Shannon and the county of Tipperary; on the east by the same county; on the south by that of Cork; and on the west by that of Kerry. It extends from 52° 17′ to 52° 45′ (N. Lat.), and from 8° 6′ to 9° 15′ (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of 680,842 statute acres, of which 526,876 are arable land, 121,101 uncultivated, 11,576 plantation, 2759 in towns and villages, and 18,531 under water. The population, in 1821, was 218,432; in 1831, 248,201; and in 1841, 281,638.

Of the tribes mentioned by Ptolemy, the Coriondi appear to have inhabited this portion of Ireland; and although from a very early period it was included in the native kingdom or principality of Thomond, it is said to have had at one time a separate political existence, under the name of Aine-Cliach, or Eoganach-Aine-Cliach, and to have been divided into five cantreds, governed by subordinate chieftains. The cantred of Carrigoginniol belonged to the O'Kiarwicks, and afterwards to the O'Briens, whence the name of Pubblebrien was given to the barony; Uaithney, now the barony of Owneybeg, belonged to the O'Ryans; Cairbre Aobhdha, or Kenry, to the O'Donovans; Hy-Cnocnuil-Gabhra, now the baronies of Upper Connello and Coshma, to the M'Eneirys and O'Sheehans; and Connalla, now Lower Connello, to the O'Kinealys and O'Thyans. [At the time of the English invasion, the O'Hurleys, MacSheehys, O'Gormans, O'Collins, O'Coins, O'Scanlans, and O'Hallinans, were also among the principal families.] About the middle of the ninth century, the Ostmen made themselves masters of the city of Limerick and of the island of Inniscattery, in the Shannon; and they maintained their power in both places until the commencement of the eleventh century, when Brien Boroimhe, King of Thomond, compelled them to become his tributaries. The city subsequently became the chief seat of the rulers of Thomond, of the O'Brien family, whence their country was often called the Kingdom of Limerick.

HENRY II. granted this kingdom to Herebert Fitz-Herebert; who having soon after resigned his claim, it was bestowed upon Philip de Braosa, and the grant was renewed to him by Richard I., with the exception of the city and the cantred of the Ostmen, which were committed to the custody of William de Burgo, who established a settlement there that defied all subsequent attacks of the natives. Braosa's grants having been forfeited, various Anglo-Norman settlements were made in the county (which was one of the twelve formed by King John in 1210) under Theobald Fitzwalter, ancestor of the Butler family; Hamo de Valois; William Fitz-Aldelm; and Thomas, son of Maurice Fitzgerald. With these, the O'Briens of Thomond had part possession; Donogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, having been enfeoffed of the extensive lands of Carrigoginniol by King John. The Irish of Thomond often proved themselves formidable enemies of the English settlers. In 1367, they took prisoner, at Manister-Nenagh, the Lord-Justice Gerald Fitzgerald and many persons of distinction; and at the time of the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the county was entirely overrun by them. During the rebellion of the Earl of Desmond in the reign of Elizabeth, that nobleman possessed the towns of Kilmallock, Askeaton, Rathkeale, and Newcastle, then the four chief places in the county; and the confiscation of his estates after his death caused the transfer of a considerable portion of its fertile lands to new proprietors. It suffered a similar fate in the wars of 1641 and 1688, each of which considerably increased the number of English settlers.

Early in the last century, Lord Southwell brought over a number of German Protestants, whom he settled at Court-Mattras, or Castle Matres, near Rathkeale; other colonies were also planted in various places through the county. Their descendants have increased greatly in number, and are now generally distinguished by the name of Palatines. For a long time they were objects of hatred to the native peasantry, but the feeling has gradually though not wholly subsided, and they are now chiefly noted for their habits of cleanliness and order, and their superior skill in agriculture and rural economy. In the year 1762, a most alarming spirit of insurrection showed itself in this part of the country; the peasantry assembled in great numbers, chiefly by night, dug up corn-fields, levelled inclosures, houghed or killed the cattle of the gentry, and even put to death or treated with great cruelty individuals obnoxious to them from their harsh mode of collecting the tithes and taxes. From wearing shirts over their clothes in order to know one another in the night, they were called WHITEBOYS. Some very severe statutes were enacted to suppress this spirit, and their observance being enforced by a large body of the military, tranquillity was after some time restored; several of the leaders of the insurrection were executed, and many of their followers transported. A similar insurrection broke out in 1786, in which the hostility of the insurgents was directed against the same objects as before; they even assembled and traversed the country in military array during the open day, compelling every person they met to take an oath against the payment of taxes. They were, however, soon put down by the strong arm of the law, aided by the military.

But the pause was of short duration. A new association appeared in 1793, under the name of DEFENDERS, who had so well matured their plans that they made a simultaneous attack upon the towns of Kilfinane and Bruff; and though repulsed from the former by the spirited resistance of the inhabitants, supported by the Palatine yeomanry, they succeeded in gaining possession of the latter. But they were shortly driven out of it, with some loss of life, by a detachment of the army against which they had ventured to make a stand. In 1803, a project was conceived of seizing the city of Limerick, as a means of co-operating with the insurgents in Dublin under Emmet; but on learning that preparations were in progress to oppose them, the men dispersed. Symptoms of disturbance again showed themselves in 1809; and in 1815 the spirit of discontent broke out in an insurrection of peculiar violence, which raged during that and the greater part of the succeeding year, but was ultimately subdued by the operation of the Insurrection act. In 1817, a general failure of the crops occasioned a very distressing famine, which, though relieved by issues of public money and liberal contributions of benevolent individuals, entailed on the districts most visited by the dearth a frightful scourge of contagious disease.

In 1820 succeeded the distresses occasioned by the stoppage of nearly all the principal banks in Munster. The scarcity of provisions caused by the failure of the crops in the following year, reduced the peasantry to the last stage of calamity; the consequence was, an insurrection more maturely planned and vigorously executed than any that had preceded. In every quarter of the county, predatory bands appeared under the directions of an invisible chief, styled CAPTAIN ROCK, declaring their determination to reduce high rents, tithes, and taxes, and threatening with destruction all proprietors of land who should attempt to disobey their mandates. The outrages of the insurgents increased and extended, in spite of the exertions of the gentry, military, and Roman Catholic clergy; Abbeyfeale, on the borders of Limerick and Kerry, became their chief place of rendezvous. The police were augmented; large bodies of regular troops were sent into the county, and quartered generally in the western baronies. Yet still the insurgents kept up a kind of guerilla warfare: parties of them were attacked by surprise, and deprived of their arms, but when dispersed in one quarter they shewed themselves suddenly in another, committing their devastations often in the open day; the churches of Kilkeedy, Ballybrook, and Athlacca, together with several gentlemen's houses, were burnt by them, and the plundered property publicly and systematically divided among the captors. Several wealthy and influential persons were murdered, amongst whom was a Roman Catholic clergyman, who had rashly attempted to exhort them to submission to the laws; and it was only under the application of the Insurrection act, and the most vigorous exertions of the magistracy, that the spirit of violence was at length suppressed.

The county is chiefly in the diocese of Limerick, with some small portions in those of Emly and Killaloe. For purposes of CIVIL JURISDICTION it is divided into the baronies of Clanwilliam, Lower Connello, Upper Connello, Coonagh, Coshma, Costlea, Kenry, Owneybeg, Pubblebrien, and Small County. Lower Connello is subdivided into the barony of Lower Connello, and the division or barony of Shanid; and Upper Connello, into that of Upper Connello, and the division or barony of Glenquin: these arrangements have been found necessary from the great extent of the two baronies, which comprised full one-half of the county; the new divisions were named after the castles whose ruins are conspicuous near their respective centres. Exclusively of the county of the city of Limerick, the county contains the ancient corporate towns of Askeaton and Kilmallock; the market-town of Kilfinane; the market and post towns of Rathkeale, Newcastle, Bruff, Ballingarry, Pallaskenry, and Glin; the post-towns of Castle-Connell, Shanagolden, Croom, Cahirconlish, Pallasgreine, Adare, and Broadford; and the sub-posts of Abbeyfeale, Barrington's-Bridge, Patrick's-Well, and Drumcollogher. Previously to the Union, it sent six members (besides the city members) to the Irish parliament, two for the county at large, and two for each of the boroughs of Askeaton and Kilmallock; but, since that period, the two returned to the Imperial parliament for the county at large have been its only representatives. The number of electors registered in 1841 was 1670, of whom 385 were £50, 153 £20, and 1022 £10, freeholders; 2 £50, 12 £20, and 74 £10, leaseholders; and 13 £50, and 9 £20, rentchargers: the place of election is the city of Limerick. The county is in the Munster circuit; the assizes are held in the county town, where the courthouse, county gaol, and house of correction are situated. Quarter-sessions are held at Limerick, Newcastle, Rathkeale, and Bruff; and there are bridewells at each of these places, and also at Glin, Kilfinane, and Croom. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 18 deputy-lieutenants, and 94 other magistrates, with the usual county officers and 4 coroners. There are nearly 70 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, six sub-inspectors, six head-constables, 56 constables, and 286 sub-constables, with seven horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £17,170. The lunatic district asylum for this county and those of Clare and Kerry is in the city of Limerick; there are four fever hospitals, besides that of Limerick, and 30 dispensaries, supported by county presentments and private subscriptions in equal portions. The total amount of grand jury presentments in the year 1844 was £37,320. In military arrangements the county is included in the Limerick district.

The general aspect of the SURFACE is flat, though diversified by many small hills, and in some parts by mountains of considerable height. The whole western district, from Loughill to Drumcollogher, is composed of an unbroken range of mountain, stretching in a vast but regular and beautiful curve. On the south-east, the plain country is bounded by the Galtees, rising precipitously to a great elevation, forming the boundary of Limerick, and stretching thence far into the county of Tipperary. On the north-east the barony of Owneybeg embraces the skirts of the Slieve-Phelim mountains, which form an extensive group penetrating the interior of Tipperary. In the neighbourhood of Pallasgreine are several hills of considerable height and beauty. The Ballingarry hills, lying near the centre of the county, and rising abruptly from a fertile plain, are very conspicuous; the principal elevation is Knockferine, a conical mountain, said to be one of the highest in the county. Another conspicuous height is Knockpatrick, between Shanagolden and the river Shannon.

From the banks of this river, stretches south-eastward a vast tract of land which is justly considered to be the richest in Ireland, the soil being in general a deep mellow loam, for the most part based on limestone and fit for every kind of culture. The most productive tract, comprising about 100,000 acres, is in the neighbourhoods of Bruff, Kilmallock, Athlacca, and Hospital, forming part of the district called, from the extraordinary richness of its soil, "The Golden Vale," which extends through this county in length from Pallaskenry to Kilfinane and Kilfrush, a distance of thirty-two miles, and in breadth from Drehidtarsna, by the city of Limerick, to Abington, a distance of eighteen. The Corcasses, or low meadow lands, which extend from the Mague along the Shannon to Limerick, have a substratum of yellow and blue clay, covered with a black mould, occasionally mixed with sand and gravel. The soil of other parts of the county not occupied by mountain, particularly to the west of the river Deel, consists of a light loam resting on limestone or stiff clay, and well suited both for pasture and tillage. In several of the lower districts are small detached portions of bog, which kind of land is exceedingly valuable in some places, bringing the high rent of £1 per rood; when reclaimed, it is peculiarly adapted to the culture of hemp, though very little either of flax or hemp is grown in the county. A great part of the surface of the western mountains, also, is a light turbary, but not so good as that in the low grounds. The climate of the county is remarkably good, and the weather less variable than in any other county in Ireland; an effect which has been much promoted by the drainage and cultivation of the bogs. It is said, that, in some seasons, the heat of the summer's sun is scarcely powerful enough to ripen thoroughly the heavy crops of grain. The entire face of the country, notwithstanding its great natural fertility, presents a denuded appearance, from the want of trees; hedge-rows being very uncommon, and timber trees in any number being seldom seen except in the immediate vicinity of the residences of the wealthier proprietors.

Although a considerable proportion of the soil is calculated to produce abundant crops, having been regarded by Mr. Arthur Young as the richest that he had ever seen, yet not more than a fourth is under TILLAGE, the remainder being wholly devoted to the fattening of black-cattle and sheep; and it is here worthy of observation, that in some leases there is a special clause, under heavy penalties, to prevent more than one acre in 20, and in some cases more than one in 50, being broken up or in any way cultivated. Even where no such clause exists, if a farmer begins to bring his land into tillage, it is regarded as a certain indication of approaching poverty. Many of the landholders round Dromin, Bruff, Bulgadine, Kilpeacon, Crecora, and Lough Gur, are very wealthy, and have stocks of from 400 to 600 head of cattle. In the baronies of Clanwilliam and Small County, the quantity of pasture far exceeds the arable land. The barony of Kenry is the most remarkable for the abundant crops and fine quality of its grain. The wheat crops are every where very heavy; and the produce of potatoes is about sixty barrels, in some instances one hundred barrels, of twenty-one stone each, per acre. The tillage, except on large farms, which are mostly in the hands of gentlemen, is generally conducted in a slovenly manner; and even the wealthier landholders are not wholly exempt from the charge of negligence.

In some parts the land is much divided, and wretchedly exhausted by the impoverishing system of subletting. The crop of the greatest importance to the peasant is the potato, the cultivation of which is chiefly by the spade: the potato is generally followed by wheat, then oats, or potatoes again, and thus in succession until the ground is wholly exhausted, when it is left to recruit its powers by the unassisted efforts of nature. This system of subdivision, however, though too common, is by no means universal. It exists to a great extent in the neighbourhood of Kildeemo, where scarcely half a dozen persons in the district keep a horse, and even more so around Tankards-town, near Kilmallock; the con-acre system is also on the increase in the neighbourhood of Galbally and other parts of the county. Still there are many good and extensive practical farmers, and many landlords who discountenance altogether the system of parcelling out and subletting; and the tillage-farms, in many instances, are managed under the most approved systems: some few are drained and well fenced, but these are rare. Irrigation is little if at all practised in the county; indeed, the soil is so productive by nature, that most farmers deem any outlay for its improvement a superfluous expenditure; some even of the more intelligent assert that sowing grass-seeds, in laying down land, completely destroys it for the next seven years. Flax grows here to an extraordinary height; but notwithstanding the efforts of the Limerick Chamber of Commerce and the Agricultural Society, the farmer is not yet convinced that it will prove a remunerating crop. This and the contiguous county of Clare are famous for their orchards, which produce the much-esteemed Cackagay cider; the most celebrated districts for its manufacture are those round Pallaskenry, Adare, Croom, Rathkeale, and Kilpeacon. The greatest variety of apple is to be seen around the farmhouses of the Palatines.

Dairy-farms are very numerous and large, varying from 150 to 600 acres; their management appears to be well understood. The cattle are chiefly crosses between the Leicester, the Devon, the Durham, the Teeswater, the Kerry, and the old or native Irish; and the breed called by the Cork and Kerry farmer "the Limerick heifer," appears to be admirably adapted to the soil. The horses are mostly light, being a cross between the Suffolk and Ayrshire; in the neighbourhood of Adare, Croom, and Kilmallock, a very useful and active kind of horse is to be met with. The breed of sheep has been greatly improved by crosses with English stock, principally the Leicester; and in some parts of the county, considerable flocks are kept. That of pigs embraces every variety, but a mixture of the Berkshire and Irish appears to fatten with the least trouble, and to be the most profitable. The agricultural implements are generally of the newest and most improved construction, particularly the plough and the harrow: the old Irish car is quite banished, except among the very poorest people; and its place is supplied by a light cart, composed of shafts, and a frame resting on a pair of wheels, on which is placed an oblong basket of wicker work, capable of containing a large quantity of field or garden produce, and removable at pleasure when timber or other bulky articles are to be conveyed on it. The fences are in some places stone walls; in others, large ditches or banks of sods, with a deep trench on both sides. In some places, furze is planted on the tops of the banks; the thorn fence is very rare. The agricultural association for the county holds its meetings regularly in Limerick: it is energetically supported; many premiums have been distributed, and much encouragement for improvement held out both by instruction and example, but little advantage has been derived as yet from its spirited efforts.

In a GEOLOGICAL point of view the county comprehends four formations, the calcareous, coal, sandstone, and basalt. The Calcareous district comprises the greater portion of the champaign part of the county, extending with little interruption from Newcastle in the west to Abbington in the north-east, and from Mount-Trenchard on the Shannon to the eastern boundary of the county south of Kilfrush, comprising the larger part of the vales of the rivers that are tributary to the Shannon. The range is almost uniformly from east to west, and the dip or inclination westward. It presents much variety both in structure and colour, the stone being raised in some places in blocks of very great size, and in others in thin laminæ; the prevailing colour is light grey, and it is susceptible of a high polish. The greatest varieties are near Croom and Manister-Nenagh. Near Askeaton are some indications of lead-ore, but not of a character that would encourage any outlay in tracing the veins: there are indications of a very valuable ore near Tory hill. The Coal formation forms the western boundary of the limestone field. The coal lies in thin seams, the lower increasing in goodness of quality and in thickness; but no attempts of any importance have yet been made to raise this mineral, except on a small scale, and from the upper stratum, which is merely a thin seam of coal shale. The ironstone that alternates with the coal is only used in road-making; nor is it probable that any vigorous researches will be made in quest of coal while bog fuel can be had in abundance on the surface. Besides the coal-field above described, there are thin seams in a glen between Castlereagh, Galbally, and the town of Tipperary. The Old Red-sandstone formation comprises the hills of Ballingarry, Knockaderry, and Kilmeedy, which rise abruptly from a limestone plain and range from the Deel to the Maig in a direction east and west. The New Red-sandstone comprises the mountains of Castle Oliver, the Long mountain, the Black mountain, and others from Charleville to Glenbrohane, forming the boundary between Cork and Limerick, and verging into the Galtees. The Basalt shows itself in the hill of Ballygooly on the verge of Lough Gur, in the hills of Knockruadh, Knockgreine, Cahirnarry, and Carrigoginniol, and the hill of Newcastle. At Linfield, near the Dead river, it rises to a height of nearly 200 feet, presenting a perpendicular colonnade of massive pillars towards the north, and bearing a striking resemblance to the promontory of Fair Head, in Antrim. Some of these pillars are 109 feet long, and approximate to a pentagonal or hexagonal form; but in general the basalt of this county is amorphous. To the south-east of this range is Knockgreine, "the Hill of the Sun," 500 feet high, with a base of limestone and a summit of basalt. It every where contains a large portion of iron. Oxyde of iron and iron-clay are found in great quantities at the foot of the hills, and near Bohermore are procured specimens containing shells with an appearance of partial calcination. There are appearances of greenstone and millstone-grit in several places: near Doon is a valuable bed of excellent freestone. Specimens of very pure copper-ore have been collected near Abington, and some attempts made to trace the vein. At Rathmore, in Manister-Nenagh parish, is a large bed of inferior pipe-clay. Slate, but of indifferent quality, is obtained in the demesne of Daragh and at Towerlegan; and in the mountains near Athea are procured large, thin, smooth, and very superior flagstones.

The manufactures and commerce, except an inconsiderable supply of coarse frieze, coarse linen, and flannel for domestic use, and a manufacture of linen and cotton checks at Glin, centre in the city of Limerick, under the head of which they are described. There are bleach-greens, principally for home sale, at Newcastle, Castle-Connell, and Lingland; and paper-mills at Ballygooley, Anacotty, and Rossbryn, the two latter in the ancient liberties of the city; also very extensive flour-mills at Askeaton, Cahirass, Rathkeale, Croom, Corbally, Kilmallock, and Sunville, whence great quantities of flour are shipped for London, Liverpool, and the Clyde. The exports are butter, grain, flour, and salted provisions; the whole of which are either shipped at Limerick, or sent to Dublin by the canal, but the great outlet is by the Shannon. This noble river, of which some account is given under the head of the county of Cavan, forms the northern boundary of the county. Below the pool of Limerick it expands into a wide estuary, and after a course of about 17 miles, mingles its waters with those of the Fergus, forming an arm of the sea several miles wide, interspersed with islands of very various character, and discharging itself into the Atlantic between Loop Head and Kerry Head, about 60 miles from Limerick. All the rivers of the interior are branches of the Shannon; they are the Maig or Mague, the Commogue, the Daun or Morning Star, the Deel, and the Mulcairne. The Deel is navigable to Askeaton, and the Maig to the parish of Adare. On the south-west the county is bounded for some distance by the Feale river, flowing by Abbeyfeale; and on the south-east for about three miles by the Funcheon. Except the short canal above Limerick, made in 1759, to facilitate the navigation of the Shannon, there is no artificial navigation within the county.

The ROADS are every where remarkably good, particularly those leading respectively from the city of Limerick to Tipperary, a new and excellent line; to Cork, of which a great portion is new, and the old portions have been much improved; to Tralee, a mail line greatly improved, widened, and levelled; to Tarbert, on the banks of the Shannon, a new, level, and excellent road; and lastly, the Dublin line, which, though generally good, is decidedly inferior to any of the others, being circuitous and hilly, and at Annacotty narrow and dangerous. A road has been opened through the mountains from Abbeyfeale to Glin, which is of great advantage to that part of the country; another is now open between Croom and Charleville, on the western bank of the Maig, for the mail between Limerick and Charleville; and a third has also been completed from Kilfinane to Mitchelstown, forming a shorter and more direct mail line from Limerick to Fermoy and Cork.

The VESTIGES of ANTIQUITY are numerous, and of great variety of character. There were two round towers: that at Ardpatrick fell a few years since; the other, at Carrigreen, is in good preservation. Of the earlier and ruder kind of pagan relics are, the cromlech on Bailenalycaellach hill, and two others near it; the fortifications on Knocktow; a large fort at Friarstown; a large and very perfect moat at Kilfinane, and another at Pallasgreine; a tumulus at Bruree; an earthen fort of great height near Croom; the stone circles at Grange; a large dun or intrenched mount, with raths and other circular fortifications, at Kilpeacon; a circular fort divided into segments near Shanid Castle; and traces of an ancient city in Cahir Park. The number of the religious houses that were founded here is about 35, exclusively of those in the city and its liberties. There are still remains of those of the Trinitarians, Augustinians, and Franciscans, at Adare; of Monaster na Gealleach; of Askeaton Abbey; and of Kilshane Abbey, in the parish of Ballingarry; also several extensive ruins of the ancient college at Mungret; of Galbally friary; of Kilfin monastery; of Kilmallock Abbey; of Monaster-Nenagh Abbey; and of the fine old abbey in the parish of Rochestown: all of which are particularly described in their respective parishes. The county contains upwards of 50 ruins of churches: it is, however, but right to observe, that in many instances new structures have been built in more eligible situations, and every parish has now a church, or is united to a parish in which there is one. So numerous were the castles rendered necessary by the former unsettled state of the country, that they are sometimes found within half a mile of each other; there are still ruins, more or less extensive, of nearly one hundred, which, with the modern seats of the nobility and gentry, are noticed in their respective places.

The peasantry differ little in their manners, habits, and dwellings, from the same class in the other southern agricultural counties; their dwellings being thatched cabins, their food potatoes, with milk and butter occasionally, their fuel turf, their clothing home-made frieze and cheap cottons and stuffs. Their attachment to the neighbourhood of their nativity, and their love of large assemblages, whether for purposes of festivity or mourning, are further indications of the community of feelings and customs with their countrymen in the surrounding counties. Among the natural curiosities may be included Lough Gur, with its romantic knolls, islands, and cave; the Castle-Connell chalybeate and astringent spa; and the sulphuric spring at Montpelier, in the parish of Kilnegariff. Bones and horns of the moose-deer have been found in many parts of the county, from five to ten feet deep in boggy ground; five pairs of horns were found at Castle Farm, near Hospital, and seven pairs near Knocktow. In many parts old fireplaces of the primitive inhabitants are occasionally turned up, containing burnt black earth, charcoal, and sooty and siliceous stones.

LIMERICK, a city, a county of itself, and the head of a poor-law union; situated on the river Shannon, locally in the county of LIMERICK (of which it forms the capital), and province of MUNSTER, 51 miles (N.) from Cork, and 94 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing, in 1841, in the parliamentary borough, 65,296 inhabitants, of whom 48,391 were in the city and suburbs, and the remainder in the rural district. This ancient and important city, supposed by some writers to be the Regia of Ptolemy, is called Rosse-de-Naitleagh in the Annals of Multifernan; and is believed to be the place described under the name of Lumneach, as forming the western extremity of the southern half of the island as divided A.M. 2870 and 3970. The last-mentioned name, indeed, appears to have been modified by the English into its present designation. St. Patrick is said to have visited the district about the middle of the fifth century; but the first authentic notices of Limerick represent it as a DANISH settlement. The place was plundered by them in 812; and about the middle of the same century they made this one of their principal maritime stations, surrounding it with walls and towers, which inclosed the area now occupied by the English Town. For nearly a century their power continued to increase, until Brien Boroimhe assumed the dominion of Munster and Thomond, when he expelled the Danes from Inniscattery, and reduced Limerick; allowing the inhabitants however to continue, subject to their own laws and customs, on payment of an annual tribute, said to have been fixed at 365 tuns or casks of wine, of 32 gallons each. In 1064, Turlogh, King of Munster, received here the homage of Donsleibhe, King of Ulidia; and his successor Murtogh, having given Cashel to the church, removed the seat of royalty to Limerick in 1106, from which time it continued to be the residence of the kings of Thomond, or North Munster, until its conquest by the English: from this circumstance, his successors were styled indiscriminately kings of North Munster or of Limerick. The Danes of Limerick did not embrace Christianity until the 11th century, and in the following they elected their first bishop. In 1153, Turlogh O'Conor, King of Connaught, besieged the city, and compelled the Danes to renounce the authority of Turlogh O'Brien, and drive him west of the Shannon.

A succession of intestine wars among the native princes was carried on until the landing of HENRY II., who soon obtained possession of Limerick, and placed a garrison here; but after his departure, Donald O'Brien, King of Thomond, regained it. In 1175, Raymond le Gros, with the assistance of the King of Ossory, invested the place, and, by fording the river in the face of the enemy, so daunted them that he entered it without opposition, obtained a great booty, and secured the town by a garrison; but on the death of Earl Strongbow, it was again evacuated by the English, and subsequently burned by order of Donald, who declared that it should no longer be a nest for foreigners. In 1179, Henry II. gave the kingdom of Limerick to Herebert Fitz-Herebert, who having resigned his claim to an inheritance so uncertain, it was granted to Philip de Braosa; and he, aided by Milo de Cogan and Robert Fitz-Stephen, advanced against the city, which the garrison set on fire. This so dispirited Braosa, that he immediately retreated; and so assured was Donald O'Brien afterwards of the security of his metropolis, that, in 1194, he founded the cathedral church of St. Mary, on the site of his palace. In 1195, the English appear to have regained possession of the city, for it was then governed by a provost; but Mac Carthy of Desmond forced them once more to abandon it.

King JOHN renewed the grant to Philip de Braosa, with the exception of the city of Limerick, the cantred of the Ostmen, and the Holy Island, which he committed to the custody of William de Burgo, who formed a settlement here which from that period set at defiance all the efforts of the Irish. A strong castle and bridge were erected; and, encouraged by the privileges offered to them, English settlers flocked hither in great numbers, between whom and the inhabitants of the adjacent country amicable relations appear to have been soon established; for, among the names of the chief magistrates for the ensuing century, besides those which seem to be English, Norman or Flemish, and Italian, there are several purely Irish. Money was coined here in the reign of John. In 1234, the city was taken, after a siege of four days, by Richard, Earl Marshal of England, then in rebellion; and by the continued wars in the surrounding country, especially among the O'Briens, De Burgos, De Clares, and Fitzgeralds, its progress in commercial prosperity appears to have been greatly checked. In 1308, Pierce Gaveston, the viceroy, passed through Limerick with an army, and compelled O'Brien to submit; but the tranquillity was of short duration. In 1314 De Clare burned the suburbs; in 1316, Edward Bruce terminated his career of conquest southward at this place, and kept his court here until the following Easter. The hostilities of the O'Briens and others, and the unbounded authority assumed by the Earl of Desmond and other Anglo-Norman leaders, rendered additional military defences necessary for the protection of the city; and various grants were made by EDWARD II. for inclosing the suburbs with a stone wall, and for repairing the castle. In 1331, the Earl of Desmond was committed to the custody of the marshal of Limerick.

In 1337, a dispute arose between the merchants of Limerick and Galway respecting tolls; which, notwithstanding the interference of the Lord-Justice, finally led to open hostilities. In 1340, Limerick was for a short period the head-quarters of Sir William Windsor, chief governor, when marching into the west against the O'Briens. During the whole of the fifteenth century, the fortifications, which, prior to the grants of Edward II., had comprised only the part of the city insulated by the Shannon and called the English Town, were extended so as to include the portion on the southern bank of the river, called the Irish Town, the defences of which were completed by the erection of St. John's gate and the neighbouring works, begun in 1450, but not finished until 1495. In the reign of EDWARD IV., Connor O'Brien, Prince of Thomond, drove the English from various parts of Munster, and compelled the citizens of Limerick to pay him an annual tribute of 60 marks. Another remarkable proof of the distracted state of the country is afforded by a statute of the 28th of Henry VI., from which it appears that, owing to the prevailing power of the "Irish enemy and English rebels" in the surrounding country, the inhabitants were under the necessity of deriving their provisions principally from France, which were sent only on condition of the ships being placed under the special protection of the King of England. In 1467, a mint was established in the city; in 1484, Gerald, Earl of Kildare, held a parliament here; and in 1495, the brotherhood of the guild of merchants was erected.

In the reign of HENRY VII. the city recovered some degree of prosperity; in 1524 it was harassed by the open hostilities, both by sea and land, resulting from the commercial jealousies between it and Galway, but these were at length terminated by a formal treaty, and by an injunction from the king, in 1536, requiring a better demeanour from the men of Galway. In the reign of HENRY VIII., Alderman Sexton, of this city, took a distinguished part in favour of the British interest. In 1542, the proclamation declaring Henry king of Ireland was received with demonstrations of the greatest joy, and in the following year Sir Anthony St. Leger held a parliament here, in which divers important acts were passed. Towards the close of MARY's reign, the Lord-Deputy Sussex arrived in the city to suppress a revolt of some inferior branches of the O'Brien family against their chief, on which occasion the Earl of Thomond and all the freeholders of his country swore fealty to the crown of England. During the entire reign of ELIZABETH, and throughout the wars that devastated the whole surrounding province, Limerick maintained the most unshaken loyalty, and was made a centre of civil and military administration. Sir Henry Sydney, lord-deputy, who visited it in 1567, in 1569, and in 1576, states that he was received here with greater magnificence than he had hitherto experienced in Ireland. At this period Limerick is described as a place well and substantially built, with walls extending round a circuit of about three miles.

On the arrival of Sir William Pelham, Lord-Deputy, in 1579, the mayor appeared before him attended by 1000 citizens well armed; and in 1584, the city militia amounted to 800 men, being double that of Cork, and a third more than that of Waterford, demonstrating that Limerick was then the most important city in the island next to Dublin. During the Earl of Desmond's rebellion, the city was for some time the head-quarters of the English army. From the commencement of the reign of JAMES I. until the war of 1641, it enjoyed undisturbed tranquillity: and notwithstanding accidental conflagrations, in 1618 and 1620, considerable improvement in the construction of buildings and public works took place. The customs' duties for the year ending Lady-day, 1633, amounted to no less a sum than £1619. 1. $7\frac{3}{4}$. In 1636 the city was visited by the Lord-Deputy Wentworth, who was splendidly entertained by the mayor for nine days, and on his departure presented to the corporation a valuable cup of silver gilt. On the approach of the insurgent army under Lord Ikerrin, Lord Muskerry, and General Barry, in 1642, the gates were thrown open by the citizens; and the royal garrison, consisting only of 200 men who had shut themselves up in the castle, were compelled to surrender after an obstinate defence; after which, the magistrates sent representatives to the Catholic convention at Kilkenny, and made every exertion to repair and strengthen the fortifications. In 1646, when it was attempted to proclaim the pacification that had just been concluded between King CHARLES and the parliament, the attempt was met by violence; and afterwards, the supreme council, headed by Rinuncini, the pope's nuncio, removed hither, to encourage the besiegers of the neighbouring castle of Bunratty, on the Clare side of the Shannon, in which the parliamentarians had placed a garrison. In 1650, the Marquess of Ormonde marched into the city, in the hope of securing it for the king; but the nuncio's party having deprived him of all power, he at length quitted the kingdom, leaving the command of the royalist troops to the Earl of Castlehaven, who induced the magistrates to accept his offer to defend them against the threatened attack of IRETON. The latter, however, did not commence operations until the spring of 1651; and the siege being protracted until the approach of winter, famine, misery, and death made formidable ravages among the ranks of both parties. The attempts of the Irish forces to relieve the place were defeated, but a sally by O'Nial, who commanded the garrison, nearly proved fatal to the besiegers. The privations of the inhabitants at length compelled the troops to turn out all useless persons, who, to prevent them from communicating the plague, which then raged at Limerick, to the parliamentarian forces, were, at the command of Ireton, immediately whipped back; and dissensions gradually arose among the besieged, as to the propriety of capitulating. The resistance of the clergy to a surrender being at length overbalanced by some officers who took possession of one of the gates and turned the cannon against the city, the place was surrendered to the besiegers on condition that the garrison should march out unarmed, and the inhabitants be allowed time for removing, with their effects, to any place where they might be appointed to live. Twenty-four persons were excluded by name from the benefit of this treaty: the soldiers, who marched out to the number of 2500, were greatly reduced by disease contracted by the sufferings of a protracted siege of six months. After the surrender, the emblems of royalty were removed, the magistrates displaced; and for five years the city was subjected to a military government. In 1653 an act was passed permitting the English adventurers, officers, and soldiers, to purchase the forfeited houses at six years' purchase; and a charter was granted conferring upon the citizens the same privileges and franchises as those enjoyed by the city of Bristol. In 1656, the municipal government was restored, by the election of a mayor and twelve English aldermen.

At the Restoration, Sir Ralph Wilson, the governor, declared in favour of the king. He was shortly after succeeded by the Earl of Orrery, who was instructed to endeavour to procure good merchants, English and Dutch, to inhabit the place, and cause it to flourish by trade. All the banished merchants were restored to their freedom and privileges, on entering into recognizances for their peaceful demeanour; and the inland trade increased so rapidly that, in 1672, the tolls of the gates were let for upwards of £300 per annum. During a progress through Munster made by the Duke of Ormonde, lord-lieutenant, he was received at Limerick with great distinction, being attended by the principal nobility and gentry of the county, and the cavalry militia of each barony. The same year was remarkable for a drought in the Shannon, insomuch that the mayor and citizens perambulated the English Town, dry-shod, outside the walls; and the following year a storm, with a high tide, did great damage.

The accession of JAMES II. caused an alteration in the religious ascendancy of the corporation; and after the battle of the Boyne, the Earl of Tyreonnel established his viceregal court in the city. Soon after this, it was invested by King WILLIAM in person, at the head of 20,000 veterans. The siege, undertaken at a late period of the season, was rendered particularly harassing by the formidable obstacles opposed to the besiegers by the fortifications and natural defences of the town, the abundance of its munitions of war, and the circumstance of the flower of the Irish army being assembled in and around it, under General Boiseleau, the Duke of Berwick, and other distinguished leaders, who were enabled to obtain supplies of every kind from Connaught, and by sea, where the French fleet rode undisturbed. The operations of the English army were also greatly checked by the loss of its battering train, which had been intercepted and destroyed by General Sarsfield, in a gallant attack, within twelve miles of William's camp. A breach having been at length effected, the besiegers thrice penetrated into the town, and as often were beaten back, until, after a desperate contest of four hours, in which they lost 1700 men, they were obliged to retire; William himself being compelled to raise the siege, and withdraw towards Clonmel. In the August following, William's army, now commanded by General DE GINKELL, again invested the town; and the garrison having been abundantly supplied, and in expectation of succour from France, the siege was protracted and sanguinary. One of the most serious conflicts at this period was that in which 600 Irish were slain, 150 drowned, and above 100 taken prisoners, in the defence of Thomond-bridge, the gates having been closed upon them too speedily, by which their retreat was cut off. Operations were at length terminated by the celebrated treaty of Limerick, ratified on Oct. 1st, and said to have been signed on a large stone near Thomond-bridge, within sight of both armies. Two days after, the French fleet arrived on the coast, and on the 14th entered the Shannon, with a reinforcement of troops and 30,000 stand of arms and ammunition. Both parties now made strenuous exertions to retain the Irish soldiers in their service: 3000 were prevailed upon to enter into that of the victorious monarch; but the remainder, amounting to upwards of 19,000 men, embarked for France, and formed the foundation of the Irish brigade, afterwards so celebrated in the wars of Europe.

After the embarkation of the Irish troops, the inhabitants, who had been compelled by the bombardment to quit their dwellings, on their return found their effects destroyed, and the entire city a scene of desolation and misery. While all classes were engaged in repairing their losses, the poorer by erecting small huts under the walls, the richer by re-edifying their houses, and the soldiers by restoring and enlarging the fortifications, a new and unthought of casualty nearly involved the whole in a second destruction: one of the towers on the quay suddenly fell, and 250 barrels of gunpowder which it contained blew up with a tremendous explosion, by which 240 persons were crushed to death or dreadfully maimed, some being struck dead by stones that fell a mile from the town. For more than 60 years after the siege, the fortifications were kept in complete repair, a garrison and several companies of city militia maintained, and every precaution of an important military station observed. In 1698, the Marquess of Winchester and the Earl of Galway, lords justices, on a tour of inspection, visited the city; which in the same year suffered most severely by a storm and high tide. In 1703 an act was passed providing that no Roman Catholic strangers should reside in the city or suburbs, and that the existing inhabitants of that persuasion should be expelled, unless they gave sufficient securities for their allegiance; but in 1724 these restrictions were removed. During the Scottish rebellion in 1745, similar precautions were used, but no symptom of disaffection was discovered. In 1751, a storm, accompanied with high tides, overflowed a part of the place, and did great damage. In 1760, Limerick was declared to be no longer a fortress; and the dismantling of its walls and other defences was immediately commenced, and completed by slow degrees, as the extension of the various improvements rendered it necessary. On the breaking out of the American war, three volunteer corps were formed under the names of the Limerick Union, the Loyal Limerick Volunteers, and the Limerick Volunteers.

After the termination of the American war, the improvement and extension of the city were renewed with unexampled spirit: and although contested elections, and alarms of insurrection in the neighbouring districts, at times disturbed its tranquillity, they never retarded its improvement. During the French invasion in 1798, the city militia distinguished itself by the stand it made at Collooney under Colonel Vereker, who in consequence received the thanks of parliament. In 1803, a design was formed by those engaged in Emmett's conspiracy to take the city by surprise; and the plan was conducted with so much secrecy that it was unknown to the military commandant in Limerick until the evening preceding the intended day of attack; but the prompt and decisive measures adopted prevented the apprehended danger. In 1821, symptoms of insubordination in the liberties led to a proclamation declaring the county of the city to be in a state of disturbance, and to require an extraordinary establishment of police, which was accordingly sent. In the winter of 1833, the town suffered severely by storms and high tides.

The CITY of LIMERICK, situated in an extensive plain watered by the Shannon, is composed of three portions, the English Town, the Irish Town, and Newtown-Pery; the whole containing 5866 houses. The English Town, the oldest, occupies the southern end of the King's Island, a tract formed by the Shannon, here divided into two streams of which the narrower and more rapid is called the Abbey river. This part of the city, the houses of which are chiefly built in the Flemish fashion, is said to resemble Rouen, in Normandy: but, since the erection of the New Town, it has been deserted by the more wealthy inhabitants, and exhibits a dirty and neglected appearance. The Irish Town is also very ancient, being allotted to the native inhabitants so early as the reign of King John; here the streets are wider, and the houses more modern. Both these parts were strongly fortified. The suburb called Thomond-gate, situated on the county of Clare side of the river, at the end of Thomond-bridge, was formerly the only entrance to the ancient city, and was protected by a strong castle; it is now of considerable extent: close to the foot of the bridge is the stone on which the treaty of Limerick was signed. Newtown-Pery, built wholly within the last 60 years, on elevated ground parallel with the course of the river, below the union of its two branches, on a site formerly called the South Prior's Land, which became the property of the Pery family about 1770, is one of the handsomest modern towns in Ireland: a very fine square was lately erected in it. There are six bridges. The late Thomond Bridge, leading from King John's Castle in the English Town to Thomond-gate, on the county of Clare side, was the most ancient: it was built in 1210, and subsequently widened, and consisted of 14 unequal arches, which were originally turned on wicker work, the marks of which were even recently apparent in the cement; its roadway was perfectly level. The structure was taken down, and replaced by a new bridge the foundation stone of which was laid in 1836, and the whole opened in 1843, at an expense of £11,000, whereof £9000 were obtained by loan from the Board of Works. Wellesley-Bridge, erected in 1827, and consisting of five large and elegant elliptic arches, crosses the Shannon from the New Town to the northern, or county of Clare, shore. Its roadway is level, and its parapet formed of a massive open balustrade; on the city side is a swing-bridge over a lock through which vessels pass to the upper basin and quays. The late bridge called the New Bridge, crossing the Abbey river, and connecting the New Town with the English Town, was built in 1761, but was so steep and inconvenient that it was recently resolved to remove it; and the light and handsome structure of three arches which now replaces it was commenced in 1845, and opened on the 26th of February, 1846: of the cost, £1800, the grand juries of the county and city gave £500, and the corporation the remainder. Baal's-Bridge, higher up on the same branch of the river, is a beautiful structure of a single arch, built in 1831 to replace an ancient bridge of the same name, which consisted of four arches with a range of houses on one of its sides. On the same branch of the Shannon is Park-Bridge, an old lofty structure of five irregular arches. Athlunkard-Bridge, consisting of five large elliptic arches, crosses the Shannon about a mile from the city; it was erected in 1830 by means of a loan of £9000 from the Board of Works, £6000 from the consolidated fund, and a grant of £1000 from the grand jury of the county of Clare; it forms a communication between Limerick and Killaloe.

The Environs, though flat, are generally very beautiful; the soil extremely rich; and the sinuous course of the Shannon, in many points of view, presents the appearance of a succession of lakes; but the landscape is deficient in wood. Of the four principal approaches, that from Clare, by Wellesley-bridge, is the best; the others are, for the most part, through lines of inferior houses, crooked and deficient in cleanliness. In the vicinity of the city are several good houses and neat villas, but they are by no means so numerous as its wealth would lead strangers to expect, as the rich merchants chiefly reside in the New Town. Among the seats in the neighbourhood, those most worthy of notice are, Mount Shannon, that of the Earl of Clare, one of the finest mansions in the south of Ireland; Hermitage, of Lord Massy; Clarina Park, of Lord Clarina; and Doonass, on the opposite side of the Shannon, of Sir Hugh Dillon Massy, Bart.: in the city are the mansions of the Earl of Limerick and of the bishop.

The Streets in the New Town, which are spacious, intersect each other at right angles, and are occupied by elegant houses, splendid and well-stocked shops, and merchants' stores. Patrick-street, George-street, and the Crescent form a continuous line of houses, extending about a mile from the New bridge. The city was till lately lighted with gas under a contract made in 1824 with the United London Gas Company; the original engagement was confined to the New Town, but it was extended by the liberality of the corporation to the Irish town and Dublin road, and by private subscriptions to part of the English Town. The Gas Consumers' Company, of more recent establishment, and of which the chief shareholders are citizens, now lights the public streets; and the terms for lighting in shops have been much reduced by the competition of the rival companies. Works for supplying Limerick with water were commenced in 1834 by a London company: there are two tanks about a mile from the city, at Cromwell's-Fort, near Gallows'-Green, on the site of two forts occupied by Cromwell and William III.; their elevation is 50 feet above the highest part of the city, and 72 feet above the river, from which the water is raised through a metal pipe 12 inches in diameter by two steam-engines, each of 20-horse power. In excavating for a foundation for the tanks, several skeletons, cannon and musket balls, armour, and divers remains of military weapons were found; and in forming the new line of road along the Shannon, on the county of Clare side, heaps of skeletons were found, some of which were 15 yards in length and 6 feet in depth; they are supposed to be the remains of those who died in the great plague. In military arrangements, Limerick is the head-quarters of the south-western district, which comprises the counties of Clare and Limerick, with the town of Mount-Shannon, in the county of Galway; the county of Tipperary, except the barony of Lower Ormond, but including the town of Nenagh; and that part of the county of Kerry north of the Flesk. There are four barracks; the Castle barrack, in the English Town, for infantry, capable of accommodating 17 officers and 270 non-commissioned officers and privates, with an hospital for 29 patients; the New barrack, on the outside of Newtown-Pery, adapted for 37 officers, and 714 infantry and cavalry, and 54 horses, with an hospital for 60 patients; the Artillery barrack, in the Irish Town, for 6 officers, 194 men, and 104 horses, with an hospital for 35 patients; and an Infantry barrack, in St. John's-square, for 4 officers and 107 men: a military prison, lately built in the New barrack, has six cells.

The Limerick Institution, founded in 1809, and composed of shareholders and annual subscribers, has a library containing upwards of 2000 volumes. There are four newspapers, three published twice a week, and one weekly. An elegant theatre, erected some years ago by subscription, at a cost of £5000, was so inadequately supported that the building was at length sold to the Augustinian monks. The Assembly-house, built in 1770, at an expense of £4000, and recently taken down, was not latterly used for its original purpose, the balls commonly taking place at Swinburne's hotel; part of it was occasionally used for dramatic performances. The Hanging-Gardens, constructed in 1808 by William Roche, Esq., M.P., at an expense of £15,000, form a singular ornament to the town; they are raised on ranges of arches of various elevation, from 25 to 40 feet, the vaults thus formed being converted into store-houses for wine, spirits, and other goods, now occupied by government at a rent of £500 per annum. On this foundation are elevated terraces, the highest of which has a range of hothouses, with greenhouses at the angles. The façade of these gardens extends about 200 feet; and the top of the highest terrace, which is 70 feet above the street, commands a most extensive prospect of the city and the Shannon.

Considerable efforts for the encouragement of the linen and cotton MANUFACTURES were not long since made, but failed. The former branch of industry has of late greatly declined: it had existed in the county for more than a century, and, by the exertions of the Chamber of Commerce, the weavers were enabled to manufacture that description of linen best adapted to command a sale. There was a linen-hall, in which markets were held every Friday and Saturday. Premiums, also, were given by the Chamber of Commerce, until this branch of their public exertions was undertaken by the Agricultural Association, a committee of which, united with the Trustees for the Promotion of Industry in the county, met for the purpose in the committee-room at the linen-hall every Saturday. This united committee, besides annual subscriptions from its own body, which are applicable to all improvements in agriculture, has under its management a fund of about £7000 allocated to the county by a board of directors in London, for the purpose of promoting the linen, woollen, cotton, and other trades, among the poor. The glove trade, once of great celebrity, has declined considerably, most of the gloves sold under the name of Limerick being now manufactured in Cork. The tanning of leather was formerly very flourishing, but fell latterly into a very depressed state; it has, however, revived within the last two years, through the encouragement given to it by Mr. Russell, an extensive provision-merchant, by whom this branch of business is largely carried on. A manufactory was formed in 1829, at Mount Kennett, for tambour lace and running, better known by the name of Irish blonde, which is here brought to great perfection; the wrought article is sent to London. A second lace-factory was established in 1836, in Clare-street, by Wm. Lloyd, Esq.; and there are now four lace factories, employing in the aggregate 2000 females of all ages. A muslin-factory, in the Abbey parish, employs 100 boys as apprentices; and a brush factory gives employment to 300 persons. The distillery of Stein, Browne, and Co., at Thomond-gate, produces 455,000 gallons of whisky annually; there are also seven breweries, each of which brews porter, ale, and beer, to a total amount of 5000 barrels annually: the consumption, both of these and of the distillery, is chiefly confined to the neighbourhood. There are several iron-foundries, coopergages, and comb-manufactories. In the liberties of the city are extensive mills, which grind upwards of 50,000 barrels of flour annually; likewise a large pig "factory," in which a million of pigs a year are slaughtered: and not far from the town are two paper-mills and two bleach-greens. The supply of fuel is abundant: large quantities of coal are imported from England; but turf, of which a very great quantity is brought up and down the Shannon, is still the chief fuel of the lower classes, and is also much used in manufactories and in the kitchens of the higher ranks. An abundance of fish is procured by the exertions of the inhabitants, towards the mouth of the river, and on the neighbouring coasts; and besides a salmon-fishery, leased by the corporation, trout, eels, perch, and pike, are taken in the river, and, lower down, all kinds of shell and flat fish. In the month of May numerous temporary causeways are formed several yards into the river on each side, by the poor, who fish with nets for eel-fry; the quantities taken are so great that each individual fills a couple of washing-tubs with them every tide. The corporation by charter claim an exclusive right to all fishing from the city to Inniscattery Island.

The TRADE of the PORT is comparatively of modern origin. The first return of the customs on record, made in 1277, gives an amount of but £6. 18. In 1337 they were only 8 marks; in 1495, £9. 0. 10.; in 1521, £6. 7. 4.; in 1537, £9. 8. $4\frac{1}{2}$.; and in 1607, when King James called for a return of the customs of all the ports in Ireland, those of Limerick were stated to be £15. 14. 8., while at Waterford they were £954. 18. 2., and at Cork £255. 11. 7. But they increased rapidly during the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; in 1633 the customs had risen to £1619. 1. $7\frac{3}{4}$. During the war of 1641 they diminished considerably, but after the Restoration again rose, insomuch that, in 1672, the customs were £1906. 19. 8., and the tolls at the city gates £310. 12. 4. In 1688, during the government of Lord Tyrconnel, they fell to £801. 3. 4.; and it was not till the middle of the last century that Limerick took a position among the principal commercial ports. At present, it is a great place of export for the agricultural produce of the most fertile tracts in Ireland: from Kerry, Tipperary, Clare, and Limerick, are sent in corn, provisions, and butter, which are exported to London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Glasgow.

The exports for the year ending 1st of September, 1835, were, beef, 1364 tierces; pork, 14,263 tierces and barrels; butter, 72,630 firkins; bacon, 81,839 cwt.; lard, 9697 cwt.; wheat, 117,874 barrels; barley, 32,847 barrels; oats, 285,623 barrels; flour, 22,725 cwt.; oatmeal, 16,320 cwt.; eggs 26,214 crates; besides hams, tongues, spirits, porter, ale, flax, linen, wool, feathers, and salmon: the estimated value of all which amounted to £726,430. The chief imports are timber, coal, iron, salt, flax-seed, tallow, pitch, tar, hoops, staves, tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, wine, and fruit; the gross estimated value of which in a recent year amounted to £323,740. The number of vessels entered inwards from foreign ports in 1835 was, 51, of the aggregate burthen of 12,408 tons, of British shipping; and 3, of 698 tons of foreign: the number of vessels cleared outwards during the same period was 31, of the aggregate burthen of 7980 tons. The number entered inwards coastways was 494, of 53,078 tons; 44 of these being from Irish ports: the number cleared outwards was 561, of 62,349 tons; 43 of which were for Irish ports. On the 5th of Jan., 1836, there were 71 vessels of 5008 tons belonging to the port: the customs for the year ending on that day amounted to £142,843. 10., and for the subsequent year to £146,322. 17. The excise duties of the Limerick district, for 1835, were £71,616. 6. During the last ten years, there has been a remarkable advance in the general business of the port: the number of vessels which reported inwards, foreign and coasting, in 1845, was 613, of the aggregate burthen of 75,000 tons; and the number clearing outwards within that year, was 691, of the aggregate burthen of 85,000 tons. The exports for the year included, of wheat, 160,377 barrels; oats, 412,790 barrels; barley, 773 barrels; beans, 816 barrels; and rapeseed, 779 barrels: of flour, 87,527 cwt.; oatmeal, 424 cwt.; feathers, 620 packs; and of leather, 113 bales. Of provisions there were, pork, 20,000 tierces and barrels; butter, 61,000 firkins; bacon, 57,855 cwt.; lard, 12,134 cwt.; and hams, 16,889 cwt.: among other articles were eggs, raw hides, bones, rags, marble, and flagstones. In 1845, the number of vessels belonging to the port was 114, of which the aggregate tonnage was 15,115: the amount of customs duties in that year, was £193,000; and of the excise, £48,986. 16. 2. In the excise arrangements, Limerick gives name to, and is the head of, a district which comprises the towns of Ennis and Kilrush, in the county of Clare, and the city of Limerick. The Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank, and National Bank, have branches here.

The situation of Limerick, about sixty Irish miles from the sea, and its extent of river navigation, render the port an object of peculiar importance; and though the course of the river is interrupted by obstructions, there is still sufficient water for ships drawing 22 feet, to come up to the city, which has now a range of quay-age accommodation extending from Wellesley-bridge to Meade's-quay. Accommodation is also afforded for a good many vessels on the opposite side, at the North Strand. At each side of the narrow arm of the Shannon that encircles the English Town, are several quays accessible to boats; and at Merchants'-quay is the Long Dock, where the turf and fish boats unload. The Chamber of Commerce, consisting of opulent and most respectable merchants, has supreme interest in the navigation of the port; and from its funds has been defrayed a great portion of the expense that has been incurred by whatever improvements have been made, although it has no right or control over the river. The commissioners appointed by act of parliament in 1823, were empowered to levy certain taxes for the erection of Wellesley-bridge (which was built accordingly), and of docks to accommodate vessels frequenting the port: their revenue now averages £4500, and they have jurisdiction over the pilotage of the river. They obtained from government a loan of £55,384, under a mortgage of the tolls on exports and imports, tonnage, dock dues, &c.; and it was their intention to construct a floating-dock. The original plan, however, was abandoned; and an act was subsequently granted to carry into effect a design by Mr. Rhodes, who, in 1833, had been appointed by government to survey the port, with a view to provide a safe harbour for shipping. He proposed, by constructing a dam or weir across the Shannon at Kelly's-quay, to convert that part of the river above into floating-docks, to be formed by excavating and levelling the bed of the river along the present quay-walls; and to build a new line of quays on which bonded warehouses, and store-houses for grain, &c., might be erected; also a dock-yard on the north side of the river, with two slips or inclined planes, and a graving-dock; and on the south side another graving-dock. His plan also embraced a line of embankments on each side for reclaiming considerable tracts of waste land, the water to be discharged by tide sluices through the embankments. The total amount required to carry these projects into execution was estimated at £82,756. 10., of which £40,000 have been already granted; but Mr. Rhodes' plan for the construction of the weir across the river, and for converting the entire port into a floating-dock, has been relinquished, in consequence of the difficulty of securing the proper and effectual drainage of the city itself, as well as the low grounds above it. A large tract of land, however, has been inclosed by an embankment at the north side of the river extending from the quay three miles down to and below Coonagh Point.

The plan now contemplated for improving the port and harbour, and which seems to be more in favour than any other, is, to construct lateral floating-docks below and adjoining Kelly's or Meade's quay, extending downwards; for which purpose the commissioners hold ample ground: it is intended to have 24 feet of water at the dock entrance, which will be made sufficiently wide for taking in the largest steam-ships of the navy or of the packet department. Dry and graving docks will be attached, or contiguous, to the floating-dock; and there are already a patent-slip and ship-building yards at the north side of the river, which, as well as the iron-foundries, are now capable of any work of magnitude. On the south side, the present line of quays extends 3030 feet, from Kelly's-quay to the custom-house. The water-bailiff's fees, and all other charges on shipping, have been merged into one general tonnage-rate, levied by the commissioners under the acts of 1823 and 1834.

A cut from the Abbey river continues the navigation of the Shannon, partly in the river and partly by an artificial canal, for fifteen miles, to Lough Derg. This cut was transferred by government to a private association, called the Limerick Navigation Company, on their undertaking to expend £3000 in the rebuilding of Baal's-bridge, which had previously interrupted the communication between the canal and the tide-water of the river, and still continues to do so in a great degree. About the same period, a new and important impulse was given to the trade of the Shannon, by the establishment of the Inland Steam-navigation Company, by which a communication has been opened by steam with Kilrush and other places in the estuary of the Shannon, and by packet-boats to Killaloe, whence there is a communication by steam through Lough Derg to Portumna, Banagher, and Athlone.

As a naval and military station, the river Shannon and port of Limerick may be regarded as of great national importance. The safe and excellent anchorages along the whole extent of the river, are capable of accommodating almost any number of line-of-battle ships and transports, which may ride in any depth of water. The entrance to the Shannon is easy, nearly nine miles in width, and clear of all danger; and the port, though one of the most western in the United Kingdom, is far in the interior of Ireland, and has direct communication with Dublin and the north, by means of railways now in course of construction, and by the junction of the Upper Shannon and the Grand and Royal Canals. Its position renders the port highly eligible for a Trans-Atlantic packet-station; by this route, passengers and mails, via Dublin, might at once clear out into the Atlantic in the tenth degree of west longitude, free from the numerous dangers and difficulties attendant upon a Channel voyage, in the short space of twenty-two hours from London. The trade of the port will be much benefited by the formation of several RAILWAYS. At the close of the year 1843, a railway was proposed from Dublin to Cashel, 98½ British miles in length, with a branch from Monastereven to Carlow 24 miles long; and though the preliminary measures necessary to bring the scheme before parliament were not commenced until February, 1844, being several months later than the period required by the standing orders of the house of commons, yet the great national importance of the undertaking was considered a sufficient reason for deviating from the established rule, and consequently a bill was introduced, which passed rapidly through both houses, and received the royal assent on the 6th August. At the first general meeting of the company, held on the 4th October, it was resolved to take immediate steps for extending the line to Cork and Limerick; and in the year 1845, so remarkable for railway projects, an act was passed, authorising the construction of a line from Cashel to Cork, 77 miles long, with a branch to Limerick of 21¼ miles. As, however, the branch to Limerick is nearly identical in plan with part of the Waterford and Limerick line, which was before parliament at the same time, one railway will be made for the use of both companies: if the Waterford Company complete their line, the powers granted to the Dublin and Cork Company for making a branch are not to be carried into effect. The capital of the original line to Cashel and Carlow is £1,300,000, with power to borrow £433,300; and of the extension to Cork and Limerick, £1,200,000, with power to borrow £400,000. Already the Waterford and Limerick Company are constructing a splendid terminus in Nelson-street, in the very heart of the New Town.

The hay and straw MARKETS are held in two inclosures, on Wednesday and Saturday; the wheat-market is large, and has sheds all round its inclosure; the butter-market, a spacious and lofty building, is open daily throughout the year. There are two potato-markets, one in the English, the other in the Irish Town, where vast quantities are daily sold: the latter of these markets, on the site of what was formerly the Long Dock, is inclosed and shedded round, and the whole vicinity of it has undergone much remodelling and improvement. The city has also two meat-markets, each plentifully supplied with butchers'-meat and poultry, but the supply of fish and vegetables is often deficient; the smaller of the markets, called the Northumberland-Buildings, has attached to it large apartments for public meetings, a bazaar, and commercial chambers. There are four annual fairs, on Easter-Tuesday, July 4th, Aug. 4th, and Dec. 12th: to the August fair was attached a privilege by virtue of which no person, for fifteen days after it, could be arrested in the city or liberties on process issuing out of the late tholsel court. The principal commercial edifices are the Custom-House and the Commercial Buildings. The Custom-House, situated at the entrance of the New Town from the Old, was completed in 1769, at an expense of £8000, and consists of a centre and two wings, built with hewn stone and handsomely ornamented: a surveyor's house and habitations for boatmen have been erected at the Pool. The Commercial Buildings were erected in 1806, at a cost of £8000, by a proprietary of 100 shareholders. They consist of a large and well-supplied news-room on the ground floor, above which is a library, with apartments for the Chamber of Commerce, which was incorporated in 1815, for the protection of the trade. Its fund arises from fees on the exports and imports of the members; the surplus is employed in promoting the commercial interest of the city, improving the navigation, and aiding the manufactures. The Post-office is a small building, in a situation so inconvenient that none of the coaches can approach it; mails start for Dublin, Cork, Tralee, Waterford, and Galway.

The CORPORATION exists both by prescription and charter, and its authority is confirmed and regulated by statute. The first documentary grant of municipal privileges was by John, Earl of Morton and Lord of Ireland, in 1199, conferring the same liberties and free customs as were enjoyed by the citizens of Dublin, which were secured and explained by a charter of the 20th of Edward I. Charters confirming or extending these privileges were granted in the 1st of Henry IV., 1st of Henry V., 8th of Henry VI., 2nd of Henry VII., 6th of Edward VI., and 17th and 25th of Elizabeth: the former charter of this last-named sovereign granted, among other new privileges, that a sword of state and cap of maintenance should be borne before the mayor within the city and liberties. The late governing charter, granted by James I. in 1609, constituted the city a county of itself, excepting the sites of the king's castle and the county court-house and gaol; conferred an exclusive admiralty jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, over so much of the Shannon as extends three miles north-east of the city, to the main sea, with all its creeks, banks, and rivulets within those limits; constituted the mayor, recorder, and four of the aldermen annually elected, justices of the peace for the county of the city; and incorporated a society of merchants of the staple of Dublin and Waterford. By the "New Rules" of the 25th of Charles II., the Lord-Lieutenant and Privy Council were invested with the power of approving and confirming the appointment of the principal officers of the corporation, who were thereby required to take the oath of supremacy; and the election of all corporate officers was taken away from the body of freemen, and vested in the common-council. The discussion of any matter connected with municipal affairs in the general assembly of freemen, or court of d'oyer hundred, which had not previously passed the common-council, was forbidden under penalty of disfranchisement, and it was provided, as in other corporate towns, that foreigners and other Protestant settlers in the town should be admissible to the freedom. James II. granted a new charter after the seizure of the franchises under a decree of the exchequer, but the judgment of that court having been subsequently set aside, it became void; and the constitution of the municipality continued unaltered until the year 1823, when an act of the 4th of George IV., c. 126, commonly called the "Limerick Regulation act," partially remodelled the powers of the corporation. Numerous incorporated trading companies or guilds were established under these different charters, several of which still exist; but they are not recognized as component parts of the corporation, and do not appear to have ever exercised any corporate rights. The guild of merchants incorporated by James I., having become extinct, was revived by the act of 1823, but has never since met; nor has any attempt been made to enforce its charter, its objects being effectually accomplished by the Chamber of Commerce.

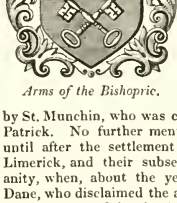
Under the charter of James I., the corporation was, until 1840, styled "The Mayor, Sheriffs, and Citizens of the City of Limerick;" and consisted of a mayor, two sheriffs, and an indefinite number of aldermen, burgesses, and freemen, aided by a recorder, four charter justices, a town-clerk (who was also clerk of the crown, and of the peace, for the county of the city), chamberlain, common-speaker, water-bailiff, sword-bearer, high constable, petty constables, serjeants-at-mace, weigh-master, crane-master, and other inferior officers. The mayor (which office and title were enjoyed by Limerick ten years before they were granted to London), the sheriffs, recorder, and town-clerk, were annually elected by the common-council on the 2nd Monday after the 24th of June; the four charter justices by the same body, on the 2nd Monday after the 29th of September. The chamberlain was elected from among the burgesses, for life or during pleasure, by the mayor, sheriffs, and recorder. The aldermen were elected for life, from among the burgesses, by the common-council: the title, however, was a mere honorary distinction, usually conferred on the person who had served the office of mayor. The common-speaker was elected every two years, under the provisions of the act of 1823, by the body of freemen assembled on the first Tuesday after June 24th, in the court of d'oyer hundred, and was obliged to be approved of by the common-council before he could be sworn into office. The other officers were appointed respectively by the common-council, the mayor, and the sheriffs. The freedom was, and is still, under the Municipal act, obtained by birth, for the eldest son, or marriage with any daughter, of a freeman; also by apprenticeship to a freeman within the city, but no longer by gift of the corporation: the admissions of freemen were made by the common-council, subject to the approbation of the court of d'oyer hundred. The act of 1823 required the council to hold quarterly meetings on the first Monday after June 24th, second Monday after Sept. 29th, and the first Mondays in January and April; extraordinary meetings were convened on requisition of the mayor. All acts of the corporation, except the election of officers, were latterly obliged to be approved of and confirmed by the freemen at large in the court of d'oyer hundred. This court had been re-established by the act of 1823, after having for about seventy years previously fallen into almost total disuse; and was held on the day following each of the four stated quarterly meetings of the common-council, and also within a specified time after the extraordinary meetings of that body: it was composed of the entire body of freemen, and a certified minute of all proceedings at the meetings of the common-council used to be transmitted by the town-clerk to the common-speaker, who presided over the court, for its approval. The corporation continued to exercise its functions, under the charters already recited, until 1840, when it was entirely remodelled by the Municipal act, 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108.

By this act, so much of all former charters, grants, letters-patent, &c., then in force, as was inconsistent with its provisions, was repealed or cancelled; and as at present constituted, the corporation consists of a council of forty burgesses elected by such citizens as, being qualified by a six months' residence in a house or tenement of the yearly value of £10, are on the burgess-roll. The city being divided into five wards, each ward returns eight burgesses, viz.: two as aldermen and six as councillors. The mayor is elected annually by the town-council, from among its members, on the 1st of December, and takes office on the 1st of January following. Under the old regime, the city had two sheriffs, appointed by the corporation; but the number is now limited to one, and the appointment is vested in the Lord-Lieutenant, in the same manner as sheriffs are nominated for counties at large. The city returned two representatives to the Irish parliament from the period of its earliest convocations until the Union, after which it sent one member to the Imperial parliament; but under the act of the 2nd of William IV., c. 88, it sends two. Besides the freemen, the right of voting belonged to the freeholders of the county of the city, estimated in 1831 at about 2000, making the total number of electors at that period 2413. The above-named act extended the franchise to £10 householders, and to £20 and £10 leaseholders for the respective terms of 14 and 20 years; the non-resident freemen, except within seven miles, were disfranchised; and the 40s. freeholders allowed to retain the privilege only for life. The total number of voters in 1845 was 2100: the sheriff is the returning officer.

The liberties, as they were defined previously to 1840, were divided into North and South by the river Shannon. The limits of the North liberties varied from one to four statute miles, comprising 1714 acres, as rated to the grand jury cess; the South liberties, extending from four to five statute miles, comprehended 14,754 acres assessed: making in all 16,458 Irish acres, equal to about 26,600 statute acres; exclusively of the site of the town. By the new act, the extent of the liberties was much curtailed, except for parliamentary purposes; as many as 24,000 statute acres being added to the adjoining baronies north and south. The small island of Inniscattery, about 60 miles distant, at the mouth of the Shannon, forms a part of the parish of St. Mary, and is within the jurisdiction of the corporation. The mayor is a justice of the peace within the county of the city, and ex officio a magistrate for the county at large: he is a judge in local courts, and is named first in the commission with the judges at the assizes for the county of the city; he is also clerk-of-the-markets; and was, until lately, the coroner of the city, and had chartered admiralty jurisdiction over the Shannon. The other magistrates are appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant.

The county of the city has an exclusive jurisdiction exercised by its magistrates at petty-sessions; assizes are held for it twice a year, by the mayor and the judges travelling the Munster circuit. The petty-sessions are held every Friday, before the mayor and borough magistrates. The chief civil court, under the old regime, was the tholsel or city court, in which the mayor and sheriffs presided as judges, assisted by the recorder, when present, as assessor, and the town-clerk as prothonotary: it was held under the charter of Henry V., which gave pleas, real and personal, to any amount arising within the county of the city: the court sat every Wednesday; the process was either by attachment against goods, action against the person, or latitat, but the last was seldom resorted to. By the late Municipal act, this court was abolished; but provision was made by the 163rd section for its revival, should it be deemed advisable, by memorial from the council to the Lord-Lieutenant. The council, however, determined upon not availing themselves of this privilege, on account of the hardships inflicted on members of the trading community by the process of attachment issuing from such courts, and also on account of the heavy annual charge which the salary of the recorder would impose on the borough fund; particularly as the council would not have the right of nominating that officer. The want of the periodical gaol delivery created by the suspension of this court, became a source of great inconvenience, and was not supplied before the session of parliament of 1845, when an act was passed extending the powers of the assistant barrister of the county, who is now enabled to hold a court quarterly for the transaction of criminal business within the borough. He sits twice a year for the trial of civil-bill cases. A court of conscience is held by the mayor every Thursday, by prescription, for the recovery of debts under 40s. late currency. The ordinary revenues of the corporation are derived from rents of houses and lands in the city and liberties, the fishery of the salmon-weir, tolls and customs (which yield by far the greatest portion), and the cleansing of the streets in the old city; producing a gross income of between £4000 and £5000 per annum. The constabulary force stationed in the city consists of one sub-inspector, one head-constable, 11 constables, and 54 sub-constables, with one horse; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £3697. There are a lieutenant, two deputy-lieutenants, and 12 borough magistrates. The amount of grand jury presentments for 1845 was £7484.

The old City Court-house, in Bridge-street, was erected in 1763, at an expense of £700 only; it is 60 feet by 30, and fronted with hewn stone, with a rustic gateway. This building has been recently converted into a Roman Catholic parochial school, and a new court-house was completed in 1846, at a cost of £1200; it stands on Merchants'-quay, adjoining the county court-house, and on part of the ground belonging to the city gaol. The Exchange, erected in 1778 at an expense of £1500, is one of the chief ornaments of the Old Town; the front is of hewn stone, and is adorned with seven Tuscan columns connected by a handsome balustrade. The council-chamber is a fine room of the Ionic order; and there are various convenient municipal offices. The County Court-house, an elegant structure, completed in 1810, at an expense of £12,000, is a quadrangular building of hewn stone, with a portico supported by four lofty pillars, and is surrounded by a light iron balustrade; it contains civil and criminal courts, jury-rooms, and other offices. The City Gaol, in the Old Town, is a gloomy quadrangular edifice, with which the old county gaol is now united: it contains 88 cells, 9 day-rooms, and 12 yards, besides debtors'-rooms, a good hospital, and a chapel; and is remarkably well regulated, orderly, and clean. But the buildings do not admit of proper classification, or sufficient means of employment; and they are, in consequence, now being extended. The new County Gaol, which occupies a favourable situation on the south-east side of the city, was completed in 1821, at an expense of £23,000, and £2000 more were afterwards expended on additions: it has a noble castellated appearance, and its internal construction and arrangement are exceedingly well contrived. The grand entrance is composed of hewn stone, and is of the Doric order. In the centre of the gaol is a polygonal tower, 60 feet high, containing on successive stories the governor's residence, the committee-room, a chapel, and an hospital, and having round the second story an arcade commanding the several yards. Five rays of buildings diverge from this tower, forming ten wards; each communicating by a cast-iron bridge with the chapel, and containing in the whole 22 apartments for debtors, and 131 cells for criminals, 12 day-rooms, 4 work-rooms, 12 yards, and 4 solitary cells. Between the wall immediately surrounding these and the outer wall, is a space containing two tread-wheels, the female prison, various offices, and some ornamented plots. The whole is supplied with excellent water from two springs.



Arms of the Bishopric.

The See of Limerick, one of the eleven which until lately constituted the ecclesiastical province of Cashel, but now in that of Dublin, is 27 miles in length and 17 in breadth, extending over an estimated surface of 306,950 acres, of which 12,500 are in Clare and the remainder in county Limerick. It is said to have been founded in the sixth century by St. Munchin, who was consecrated bishop of it by St. Patrick. No further mention is made of the bishopric until after the settlement of the Ostmen or Danes in Limerick, and their subsequent conversion to Christianity, when, about the year 1110, Gille, or Gilbert, a Dane, who disclaimed the authority of the Irish prelates, was consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury; he governed the see till 1140. In the charter of Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, in 1194, the bishops are called Lumnicenses and Lumnicani, from Lumniach, the Irish name of the city. In 1195, the ancient see of Inniscathay or Iniscattery was united with this bishopric. In 1284, Gerald le Mareschal succeeded in recovering the episcopal property which had been usurped by the bishops of Emly and Killaloe during the period the Danish bishops held it under the Archbishop of Canterbury. This property was extensive and valuable at the Reformation; but was afterwards so much diminished by grants to the Fitzgerald family, that the see of Ardfert and Aghadoe was added to it in 1660, and has ever since been annexed to it. The see of Limerick is valued in the king's books at £40 sterling, according to an extent returned in the 5th of Charles I. The see lands comprise 6720 acres; the gross yearly revenue of the bishopric, including Ardfert and Aghadoe, amounted to £5368. 13., on an average of three years ending Jan. 1, 1832. The palace is a modern brick edifice in the New Town, with a front to the Shannon, commanding an extensive view of the opposite shores of the county of Clare. The consistorial court is held in the city by the vicar-general, with a surrogate and registrar, who is keeper of the diocesan records, the oldest of which is intituled the "Liber Niger," copied by Bishop Adams in 1616, from a book which he states to have been then much defaced by age, and to contain an account of all the parishes, their procurations, taxation, subsidies, &c.

The CATHEDRAL, which is said to have been founded and endowed by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, and is dedicated to St. Mary, was enlarged by Donat O'Brien about the year 1200, greatly adorned by Bishop Eustace del Ewe early in the fourteenth century, partly re-edified by the citizens in 1490, much improved by Bishop Adams in the seventeenth century, carefully restored after the wars of the same century, and improved at various subsequent periods. It is a venerable Gothic building, in the English Town, surrounded with graduated battlements, and has at the west end a square tower 120 feet high, containing 8 bells, and surmounted by turrets at the angles. The interior is composed of a nave and choir, separated from the aisles by pointed arches: the choir is 91 feet by 30, with a fine window at the east end; the bishop's throne and the stalls of the dignitaries exhibit some curious carved work: there is a powerful organ. In the nave and aisles are several recesses, formerly endowed as chapels by various families; two of these now form the consistorial court and the vestry; and under the arches separating the aisles from the choir are galleries, for the corporation and the officers of the garrison. At the communion-table is a modern Gothic screen. Among the numerous monuments, besides those of several prelates, the most remarkable is the splendid tomb of Donogh, the great Earl of Thomond, on the north side of the choir; it is composed of three compartments, of marble of different colours, is surrounded and supported by pillars of the Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite orders, and decorated with his arms and various trophies. There is also a fine monument of the Galway family. Some of the unsightly old houses that surrounded the cathedral have been recently pulled down; the approaches have been widened, and handsome iron railings, and a pair of gates opening into Quay-lane and fronting the New bridge, have been added.

The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacon, and the 11 prebendaries of St. Munchin, Donoughmore, Ballycahane, Kilpeacon, Tullybracky, Killeedy, Disert, Ardcanny, Croagh, Athnett, and Effin. The corps of the deanery consists of the rectory of St. Mary, the rectories and vicarages of St. Nicholas and Cappagh, and the rectories of Cahirnarry, Bruree, and Mungrett. The deanery lands comprise 80½ statute acres, let on lease at a rent of £88. 2. 5. and an annual renewal fine of £13. 16. 11.; the gross annual income, including these lands, is £1176: the deanery-house is in the city. The dean enjoys the right of presentation to the vicarages of Mungrett and Bruree, and to the perpetual cure of Cahirnarry. The corps of the precentorship consists of the rectories and vicarages of Kilfenny and Loughill, the rectories of Nantinan, Shanagolden, Knocknagaul, and Dromdeely, and the vicarage of Morgans; the precentor has the right of presentation to the vicarage of Dromdeely. That of the chancellorship consists of the rectory of Rathkeale, the rectories and vicarages of Kilscannell, Clounagh, Clounshire, and the entire rectory of Dundonnell; of the treasurership, the rectories of St. Patrick and Cahirvally, the rectory and vicarage of Emlygrenan, and the chapelry of Kilquane; and of the archdeaconry, the rectories of St. Michael and Ardagh, and the entire rectory of Kildimo. The economy fund of the cathedral arises from the tithe of the union of Kilmallock, and the rents of several very valuable glebes; amounting on an average to £1200 annually. A diocesan schoolhouse was erected in 1611, in the city; but having fallen into decay some years since, it was sold by the Board of Education, and the proceeds, with the addition of £400 presented by the corporation, were expended in the purchase of a new site. In 1823, the diocesan schools of Killaloe and Kilfenora were united with that of Limerick, and the income augmented to £150 per annum. The total number of benefices in the diocese is 61, of which 13 are unions, 3 without provision for cure of souls, and the remainder single parishes. The total number of churches is 42, with 2 chapels of ease, besides five places of worship in school-houses or other buildings licensed for divine service: the number of glebe-houses is 28.

In the Roman Catholic divisions the see is a separate diocese, being one of 7 suffragan to the Archbishop of Cashel, and comprising 39 parochial benefices or unions, containing 78 chapels; the spiritual duties are performed by 37 parish priests, two administrators of the bishop's mensals, 54 coadjutors or curates, and 2 supernumeraries, besides whom there are 4 superannuated, sick, or unemployed clergymen. The bishop's parishes are those of St. John and St. Patrick, both in the ancient county of the city; his residence is Park House, near the city. The cathedral is the church of St. John.

The PARISHES within the bounds of the late county of the city were those of St. Michael, which comprehends all the New Town; St. Mary, St. Nicholas, St. John, St. Munchin, and St. Laurence, in which the Old Town, with the suburb of Thomond-gate, is included; and Cahirnarry, Cahirvally, Derrygalvin, Donoughmore, Killeely, Kilmurry, and St. Patrick, together with parts of those of Abington, Carrigparson, Crecora, Kilkeedy, Kilnegarruff, Knocknegaul, Mungrett, and Stradbally, in the rural district of the city; besides which was the extra-parochial district of St. Francis's Abbey. The arrangements for local taxation in the county of the city, prior to the passing of the Municipal Corporations' act, were somewhat peculiar. The parish of St. Michael, or New Town of Limerick, being exempt from the payment of grand jury cess, two local acts were passed for its interior regulation, in the 47th and 51st of George III., under which the sum of £461. 10. 9. was annually raised towards defraying the expenses of the City Gaol, Fever Hospital, and House of Industry; being, in fact, in aid of the grand jury cess of the county of the city. The Old Town, though containing 29,000 inhabitants, paid to this tax no more than £35, which, as it was the only local assessment, indicates the degree of poverty that prevails there. The remainder of the grand jury cess, amounting on an average to upwards of £6000 per annum, used to be levied entirely off the agricultural districts by a tax of from 7*s.* to 8*s.* per acre, being about twice as much as the assessment on the adjoining lands in the county at large. Under the act of the 51st of George III., besides the payment of the sum above mentioned, rates were levied on the New Town for paving, lighting, watching, and cleansing that part of the city, to the extent of 3*s.* in the pound on inhabited houses above the value of £10 per annum, and of 4*d.* in the pound on uninhabited houses and stores: houses under the value of £10 were exempt. A sum of about £65 was also raised for the purpose of burying paupers and taking care of foundlings. The number of houses assessed in 1835 was 914, valued at £28,766, at the rate of 2*s.* 3*d.*; the number of stores was 146, valued at £10,257, at the rate of 3½*d.* The assessment amounted to £3388. The commissioners for the tax, twenty-one in number, were inhabitants of the city, and seven of them retired every second year.

The present county of the city, agreeably with the provisions of the Municipal Corporations' act, comprises the parish of St. Mary, and part of the parishes of Killeely, St. John, St. Laurence, St. Michael, St. Munchin, St. Nicholas, and St. Patrick: the area is 2618 statute acres. Killeely and St. Patrick's are separately described. The living of ST. MICHAEL'S is a rectory, united, from time immemorial, to the rectory of Kildimo and the rectory of Ardagh, the three parishes constituting the union of St. Michael and the corps of the archdeaconry of Limerick, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £67. 10. per annum: the gross income of the archdeaconry, including the rent of a small glebe, before the passing of the Rent-charge act was £620. 17. 8. per annum. The church was destroyed in the siege of 1651 and no parish church existed until very recently, when one was completed agreeably with an act of parliament passed in 1843. There is a chapel of ease, called St. George's, built and endowed in 1789 by the Pery family: it is a plain commodious edifice; its east window, which is very lofty, formerly belonged to the old Franciscan abbey. The minister is appointed by the Earl of Limerick. An Episcopal chapel, in connexion with the Blind Asylum, was erected in this parish, in 1834, by subscriptions exceeding £5000, raised in England and Ireland by the personal exertions of the Venerable Edward N. Hoare, Archdeacon of Ardfert, now Dean of Achonry, who was the first chaplain and is one of the trustees. St. George's parochial schools are in connexion with the Kildare-place Society, but are chiefly supported by voluntary subscriptions and the sale of needlework; they afford instruction to 214 children. There are also schools in connexion with the London Hibernian Society, and the Wesleyan Methodists: very large schools for males and females have just been erected from a bequest by Mrs. Villiers. The Limerick Academy, in Cecil-street, founded and conducted by Messrs. Brice and Brown, was opened in 1836. It consists of a commodious house for the accommodation of resident pupils, and two spacious class-rooms; its object is to afford the means of a complete education from the earliest infancy to the higher departments of collegiate study, based on the principle of exercising the understanding as well as the memory. At present, the system of education comprises the usual branches of an English course, combined with classic literature and science. The diocesan school is also in this parish.

ST. MARY'S parish is a rectory entire, united from time immemorial to the rectories and vicarages of St. Nicholas and Cappagh, and the rectories of Cahirnarry, Bruree, and Mungrett, constituting the corps of the deanery; it is in the patronage of the Crown. The cathedral is considered to be the church of this parish, and of that of St. Nicholas. The Blue-coat hospital, situated near the cathedral, was founded in 1717, by the Rev. J. Moore, who bequeathed some property in Dublin for its support; about the same time the corporation aided it by an annual grant of £20, and in 1724 Mrs. Craven bequeathed several houses in Limerick for the same purpose. After having fallen into decay, it was revived in 1772 by the bishop and dean, the latter of whom has the management of it. It supports 15 boys, who wear a uniform of blue and yellow. ST. NICHOLAS'S parish, a rectory and vicarage, united to St. Mary's, contains 1888 statute acres: the tithe rent-charge is £162. 14. The church was destroyed in the siege of 1651, since which time service has been performed in the cathedral. A school for the education of 20 boys and 20 girls is maintained under a bequest of Dr. Jeremiah Hall, in 1698, for children of poor Protestant parents in St. Mary's and St. Nicholas's parishes. ST. MUNCHIN'S parish, situated partly in the King's Island, partly in the ancient North liberties, and partly in the county of Clare, contains 4584 statute acres: the living is a rectory, united from time immemorial to the rectory and vicarage of Killonchan, and the rectory of Drehidtarsna, the three parishes constituting the corps of the prebend of St. Munchin in the cathedral of St. Mary, Limerick, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £207. 14., and of all the parishes in the union £349. 12. The church, which stands on the north side of the city, is inclosed on the north by the old town-wall, along which is an elevated terrace commanding a fine view over the Shannon: it was rebuilt in 1827, at an expense of £1460, of which £900 were a loan from the Board of First Fruits; and is a handsome edifice, with a lofty square tower embattled, and crowned with pinnacles. This church is said to have been founded by St. Munchin, and was the cathedral until the building of St. Mary's. A school for boys, and another for girls, of this and the adjoining parishes, were founded by a bequest of Mrs. Villiers in 1819. ST. LAURENCE'S parish is a rectory entire, till lately in the patronage of the Corporation: it is of small extent, having no church, and the tithe rent-charge is only £18. 15. The three parishes of St. Mary, St. Munchin, and St. Nicholas, form the English Town. ST. JOHN'S parish is a vicarage, in the patronage of the Earl of Limerick. The vicar derives his income from an assessment on the houses, which originally produced £160 per annum; but owing to the removal of the principal inhabitants it sunk to about £50, and has been augmented by a grant of £25 per annum from Primate Boulter's fund. There is a glebe-house, erected by a gift of £369. 4. and a loan of £240 from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1828. The church is an ancient edifice, comprising a nave, with a north and south aisle extending the whole length of the building; it has been repaired by a grant of £185. 19. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. This parish forms the Irish Town.

In the ROMAN CATHOLIC arrangements the ancient county of the city is divided into the parishes or districts of St. Mary, St. John, St. Michael, St. Patrick, and St. Lelia. St. Mary's parish comprises the whole of the King's Island, the English Town, and the Little or Sluice Island; thus embracing the whole of the Protestant parish of St. Mary, parts of St. Munchin's and St. Nicholas's, and the extra-parochial district of St. Francis. The chapel is a large plain cruciform edifice, built in 1749, on the Sluice Island; the altar exhibits three styles of architecture finely combined, and has a good copy of Michael Angelo's picture of the Crucifixion. A female school established in this parish, some years since, by the religious sisterhood of St. Clare, was adopted, after the departure of that body from Limerick, by the sisterhood of the Presentation convent; and on the breaking up of that establishment in 1836, the National Board of Education granted £40 towards its support, and it was placed under the charge of the Rev. Dr. Hanrahan, P.P. It is still held in the convent, under the superintendence of two of the lay-sisters of St. Clare; affords instruction to 400 children; and is supported by subscriptions and charity sermons. St. John's parish comprises the Protestant parish of St. Laurence, and that part of St. Michael's known by the name of the Assembly Mall; this is the bishop's parish, and the church is therefore called the cathedral. It is a large cruciform building, erected in 1753: the altar, which is very splendid, has a picture of the Crucifixion by Collopy, a native artist. St. Michael's parish is coterminous with the Protestant parish of the same name, with the exception of the Assembly Mall. The chapel, situated near the cornmarket, was built in 1779, and was then surrounded by open fields: it was considerably enlarged in 1805, and is now the largest and finest in the city; it can accommodate 2500 persons. In this parish are three orders of friars. The Dominicans have their house and chapel in Glentworth-street; the latter, a large edifice in the early Gothic style, built in 1815, is enriched with a painting of the Crucifixion: the community consists of a prior and four friars. The Augustinians, whose community consists of a prior and two friars, have their house and chapel in St. George's-street: the chapel was built for a theatre, and was purchased by the friars in 1824; the boxes and galleries are still preserved as seats for the congregation. It is lighted from the dome: the altar, supported by Corinthian pillars, is enriched with a picture of the Ascension by Collopy. The Franciscans, whose community consists of a prior and two friars, have their house and chapel near Wellesley-bridge: the latter is a large edifice in the Gothic style, comprising a centre and wings, with a handsome gallery; the altar is very fine, and has a splendid painting of the Madona. The brothers of the Christian Schools, six in number, have a school in this parish and another in St. John's, in which about 600 children are educated; the funds are raised by collections made every Saturday throughout the city by the brethren. A female school, established by the late Rev. Dr. Hogan, P.P., in 1822, was chiefly supported by him, and a new school-house capable of containing 200 girls was built at his expense. Adjoining the parochial chapel is a school founded and endowed by Mrs. Meade, for the education of children of Roman Catholic parents. St. Patrick's parish is in the ancient liberties: the church, built in 1816, is on the Dublin road; it is in the form of the letter T, and is small but neatly fitted up; the building was much improved in 1835. This parish, with those of Kilmurry and Derrygalvin, with which it is united, forms the bishop's mensal. St. Lelia's parish is composed of the parishes of St. Munchin and St. Nicholas within the old liberties north of the river, and that of Killeely in the county of Clare. The chapel, situated at Thomond-gate, is a large plain cruciform edifice, built in 1774; it was the first Roman Catholic place of worship publicly erected in Limerick after the Revolution. In this parish is a school established by the Rev. P. Walsh, P.P., in which 380 children are educated; it is supported by subscriptions and charity sermons.

The Presbyterians in connexion with the Synod of Munster have a small but very elegant meeting-house in the New Town. Here, also, the Society of Friends have a neat meeting-house; near which is a large place of worship, of the Gothic style without, and the Grecian within, belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists; and not far from it another, in the mixed Gothic style, of the Primitive Wesleyan Methodists. The Independents have a plain meeting-house.

The County Hospital was founded in 1759 by the exertions of the late Rev. Deane Hoare, vicar-general, and of Mr. Vandeleur, surgeon, aided by the Pery and Hartstonge families. The present building on the new Cork road, which was completed in 1811, at an expense of £7100, has a front of 114 feet, and contains 10 wards for males and 6 for females; the number of patients admitted in a recent year was 632, at an expense of £1520. Barrington's Hospital, called by the act of the 11th of George IV. the "City of Limerick Infirmary," was founded in 1829 by Sir Joseph Barrington, Bart., and his sons, Matthew, Daniel, Croker, and Samuel. This hospital, built on George's-quay at an expense of upwards of £4000, contains six large wards, capable of holding 60 beds; the number at present is 35. It was given by the founders to the city, and opened under the new arrangement in Nov. 1831; it is supported by voluntary subscriptions and a grant from government. Attached to the institution is a good medical library: a wing was lately built for a lying-in hospital, and another for a fever hospital. St. John's Fever and Lock Hospital was founded in 1781 by Lady Hartstonge: in a recent year it had 1601 patients; the expenses were £1520. 10. The Lying-in Hospital, opened in Nelson-street in 1812, under the control of a board of trustees, is supported by subscriptions and the interest of a bequest of £1000 from Mrs. White: upwards of 400 patients have been annually admitted into it since its establishment. There is also a dispensary in Limerick. The District Lunatic Asylum, for the counties of Limerick, Clare, and Kerry, is a very extensive edifice on the New Cork road, completed in 1826: it is 429 feet by 314; the centre forms an octagon, from which four wings diverge, containing cells for patients. It was originally intended only for 150 curable lunatics; but an additional building has been erected for those considered incurable. There are 19 acres of land, in the cultivation of which many of the inmates are beneficially engaged. The system of management, which is confined to moral treatment, excluding all coercive or severe measures, is extremely judicious. The total cost of the buildings, exclusive of the purchase of land, was £35,490. The late House of Industry, founded in 1774 by grand jury presentments on the county and city, to which were added £200 by the late Dr. Edw. Smyth, of Dublin, towards providing thirteen cells for the insane, was at first calculated to accommodate 200 inmates: the number, prior to 1823, was augmented to 380; a wing was then added for the accommodation of seventy infirm women, and two work-rooms for spinners and weavers.

The oldest ALMSHOUSE is that of Dr. Hall, founded about the commencement of the last century. The present neat and convenient edifice, erected in 1761, contains apartments for thirteen men and twelve women, who receive each £5 a year; also schoolrooms, and an Episcopal chapel. The annual income is £304, part of which is applied to the use of Hall's school, already noticed, and to some minor endowments. The Corporation almshouse, erected soon after the siege of Limerick, on ground anciently occupied by St. Nicholas's church, is adapted to the reception of 22 reduced widows, each having 40 shillings a year and the use of a garden. The corporation also pays certain annuities to the widows of aldermen and burgesses. St. George's Parochial Asylum, instituted by the late Rev. W. Deane Hoare, accommodates 14 Protestant widows. Mrs. Villiers' almshouse, erected a few years ago, in pursuance of the will of Mrs. Hannah Villiers, is a handsome Gothic structure of stone, forming three sides of a square; and is for 12 Protestant or Presbyterian widows, each of whom receives £24 Irish per annum: a preference is to be given to any descendant of the testatrix who may apply for admission. The widow of Alderman Craven founded an almshouse for poor Protestant widows: the building has been taken down; but 50 widows of the parishes of St. Mary, St. John, and St. Munchin, annually receive £4 each; the remainder of the endowment is divided at Christmas among the poor. The same lady left £60, the interest of which is given to confined debtors and the poor of the city parishes. The widow of George Rose, Esq., deposited £800 in the hands of the dean and chapter, the interest to be distributed every Christmas equally among sixteen widows. The interest of divers sums given at various periods by the members of the Pery family, amounting to £17 per annum, is distributed among the poor of St. John's parish. St. John's parochial almshouse for seven Protestant widows is supported by subscriptions, and by bequests of Mrs. Craven, Mrs. Crone, and the Earl of Ranfurly. Mrs. Banks having bequeathed the sum of £8768. 12. 8. to trustees for charitable purposes, it was apportioned to the Fever Hospital, the Female Orphan Asylum, the Lying-in Hospital, the House of Industry, the County Infirmary, and the Dispensary.

The Charitable Loan Fund, formed in 1770, chiefly by subscriptions of the Pery family, has afforded accommodation to many thousands by loans of three guineas each. In 1810, the inhabitants subscribed the Jubilee Loan Fund, amounting to £1200, which has since accumulated by the addition of interest: about £120 are lent weekly, in sums of not more than £4 each, which are repaid by instalments. The Fund for the Encouragement of Industry was established in 1822, out of the surplus fund subscribed in England for the distressed Irish; the loans being limited to £6: the sums so issued in a recent year amounted to £4200. 10., and the amount repaid with interest during the same period was £4500. A Charitable Pawn-office, under the title of the "Mont de Piété," similar to establishments of the same name throughout the continent, was lately instituted by Matthew Barrington, Esq., with the view of allowing the poor small loans at low interest: the capital was raised by debentures, to be repaid with interest; and the profits of the institution were to be applied towards the support of Barrington's Hospital. It has, however, been broken up. The building, which adjoins the hospital, is nearly circular, with a piazza, surmounted by a lofty and elegant dome and cupola, and was erected at the sole expense of the founder. A company for granting annuities to widows, settlements for wives, and endowments for children, on payment of an annual premium, was established in 1806, under the title of the Munster General Annuity Endowment Association. An Asylum for the Blind, the house and chapel for which were built in 1834, accommodates 5 men and 12 women; a Magdalene Asylum, conducted by a committee of ladies, has been established on a small scale; a Mendicity Association is supported by voluntary contributions; and, in 1826, an Institution for the Relief of Sick and Indigent Room-keepers was formed by a subscription of several hundred pounds. There are also a Savings' Bank, and a Mechanics' Institute. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 11¼ acres held at a rent of £70, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £10,000, and will contain 1600 paupers.

Limerick anciently contained two Augustinian monasteries, one of Regular Canons, and the other of hermits: the Regular Canons had another house in the contiguous parish of Mungrett, which was destroyed by the Danes in 1107. In 1227, a Dominican friary was founded in the city by Donogh Carbragh O'Brien, Prince of Thomond, which became a place of great magnificence, and was the burial-place of various prelates and other eminent men: part of the walls still exists, and the cemetery formed the garden of the late Presentation convent. There were also a Franciscan convent, founded by William Fion de Burgo; a house of canonesses of the order of St. Augustine, founded in 1171, by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick; and a house of the Knights Templars; but no remains of these buildings are now discernible. The military antiquities consist of the ruins of the fortress called King John's Castle, at the end of Thomond-bridge, comprehending the great gateway, defended by two massive round towers, and the outer walls, having similar defences, and presenting a fine relic of the military architecture of that remote period; of dilapidated portions of the walls and towers of the citadel nearly contiguous, in which the Castle barracks have been erected; of various portions of the town walls; and of some of the outworks, especially a fort on the King's Island, north of the Old Town. There are also some remains of the celebrated Black Battery, close to which was the breach defended so heroically against William's army. In the rural parishes of the ancient liberties are the ruins of several forts.

Of eminent NATIVES were three prelates named Creagh, in the fifteenth century; Richard Creagh, D.D., Roman Catholic archbishop of Armagh, in the reign of Elizabeth, who died in the Tower of London, in 1585; James Arthur, D.D., professor of divinity at Salamanca; James Nihell, M.D., author of various medical treatises of considerable repute, born in 1705; John Fitzgibbon, Esq., an eminent lawyer, born at Ballysheeda, within the old liberties, in 1731; the Rev. James White, parish priest of St. Mary's, who published a short description of the county at large in 1764, and also compiled annals of the city, which were never published; John Martin, M.D., author of an essay on the Castle-Connell spa; Daniel Hayes, Esq., who died at an early age in 1767, after displaying considerable poetic ability; Charles Johnston, who distinguished himself in the department of polite literature; the Rev. Joseph Ignatius O'Halloran, D.D., professor of philosophy and divinity in the Jesuits' College at Bourdeaux; Sylvester O'Halloran, Esq., the historian, his brother; Peter Woulfe, Esq., an eminent chymist and naturalist of the last century; Viscount Pery, who had, when a commoner, filled the speaker's chair in the commons' house of parliament in Ireland; the Right Hon. John Fitzgibbon, Earl of Clare, and Lord High Chancellor of Ireland; John Ferrar, a bookseller and printer of Limerick, who was author of several respectable topographical works concerning Limerick, Dublin, and Wicklow; Timothy Collopy, distinguished as an historical and portrait painter; William Palmer, who also rose to some eminence as an artist, under Sir Joshua Reynolds, but died at an early age; and Edward Fitzgerald, Esq., for some time editor of the Pilot newspaper, in London. Limerick confers the titles of Earl and Viscount on the family of Pery.

LIMERICK, LITTLE, county of WEXFORD.—See KILKEVAN.

LISBELLAW, a village, in a detached portion of the parish of CLEENISH, (called Cleenish East, and separated entirely from the main parish by Lough Erne,) union of ENNISKILLEN, barony of TYRKENNEDY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Enniskillen, on the road to Clogher; containing 60 houses, and 260 inhabitants. Tradition states, that on a hill above the village, a battle was fought between some of the troops of King William and James II., when the latter were defeated. The Lisbellaw estate, or manor of Carrick, was the property of the Earl of Rosse, on whose demise in 1764, the title (revived in 1806) became extinct, and the property passed to the family of the Rev. Grey Porter, the present proprietor. The village is picturesquely situated amidst conical-shaped hills and singular rocks, in a highly cultivated district, and in the vicinity of Lough Erne: it has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Enniskillen. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in weaving linen and making matting from bulrushes; stone-breaking affords much employment to the infirm; and there are a spade-mill, and corn-mills with drying-kilns attached. Fairs are held on May 11th, June 20th, July 20th, Aug. 18th, Oct. 12th, Nov. 11th, and Dec. 23rd, chiefly for cattle and pigs; those in May and November are much frequented for hiring servants. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays; and a baronial court was formerly held, but is at present discontinued: here is a station of the constabulary police. The railways from Dungannon to Lough Erne, and from Enniskillen to Newry and Dundalk, will skirt the village. The church, or chapel of ease to the parochial church of Cleenish, is a neat edifice, built in 1764 by Lord Rosse, who was interred in a vault beneath; it has been recently considerably enlarged. The Roman Catholic chapel is a large plain building, attached to the district of Enniskillen. Here are also a meeting-house for Presbyterians, built on a site given by the late Sir R. Hardinge; and a small meeting-house for Methodists. A male and female school, formerly in connexion with the Kildare-place Society, but now under the National Board, is held in a commodious house, which also contains apartments for the master. There are a dispensary, a fever hospital, and a loan fund. In the vicinity of the village are several ancient raths or forts; and on a finely wooded island in Lough Erne, connected by a causeway with the main land, is Bellisle, the ruined seat of the Earl of Rosse.

LISBUNNY, or LISBONEY, a parish, in the union of NENAGH, barony of UPPER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 1 mile (S. E.) from Nenagh, and on the road from Dublin to Limerick; containing 1141 inhabitants, and comprising 4394 statute acres. Here is an extensive flour-mill worked by superior machinery, the produce of which is in great demand. Lisbunny is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Kilmore: the tithe rent-charge is £242. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Nenagh. There are some remains of the church, adjacent to which are the ruins of a castle.

LISBURN, an unincorporated borough, a market-town, a parish, and the head of a union, partly in the barony of UPPER MASSEREENE, county of ANTRIM, and partly in the barony of UPPER CASTLEREAGH, but chiefly in that of LOWER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Belfast, and 73 (N.) from Dublin; containing 15,015 inhabitants, of whom 7524 are in the borough. This place was in the reign of James I. (and long after) called Lisnegarvey, and, though now a populous and flourishing town, was at that time a very inconsiderable village. Its rapid increase in population and importance may be attributed to Edward, Viscount Conway, to whom, in 1627, Charles I. granted the remainder of the manor of Killultagh (a portion of which had been given by James to the viscount's ancestor, Sir Fulk Conway), and who, on obtaining possession of this property, built a castle, which became the head of a manor. The same grant conferred the privileges of courts leet and baron, view of frank-pledge, manorial courts for debts not exceeding £2, a court of record every three weeks for sums not exceeding £20, a weekly market, and two annual fairs. Soon after the erection of the castle, some English and Welsh families were induced by the proprietor to settle here, and a town consisting of more than fifty houses arose.

On the breaking out of the war in 1641, a body of 1000 men assembled here, and preserved the town for some time from the attempts of the insurgents, whose detached parties were held in check; but on the 28th of November in that year, the garrison consisting only of five newly raised companies and Lord Conway's troop of horse, the insurgent army commanded by Sir Phelim O'Nial, Sir Conn Magennis, and General Plunket, on their march to Carrickfergus, advanced to attack the town. Sir Arthur Tyringham, however, arriving with a small reinforcement, and being aided by Sir George Rawdon, repulsed the columns of the enemy as they successively advanced to the assault, and, by a galling fire from the streets, committed great slaughter among them. At nightfall, further reinforcements arrived from Carrickfergus and Belfast; and the insurgents, despairing of success, set fire to the town, which in a few hours was reduced to ashes; a sanguinary conflict being maintained in the burning town till nearly midnight, when the insurgents were finally put to flight, leaving behind them a number of slain equal to three times the entire number of the garrison, of whom only from 20 to 30 were killed. In 1644, General Monroe made an attempt to obtain possession of the town, but was frustrated by the vigilance and resolution of the garrison; and on the 6th of December, 1648, that general, with the Scottish forces under his command, was signally defeated on the plains of "Lisnegarvey," by Colonel Venables and Sir Charles Coote, two of Cromwell's commanders; to the former of whom the castle was surrendered in 1650. On the landing of the Duke of Schomberg, near Bangor, in 1689, a considerable body of forces in the interest of James II. assembled at this place; but they afterwards abandoned it without any attempt for its defence, and William III. passed through the town shortly before the battle of the Boyne. Charles II., to reward the fidelity of the inhabitants to his father and to himself, had erected the church of Lisburn into a cathedral for the united dioceses of Down and Connor, and had granted the townsmen the privilege of sending two representatives to the Irish parliament; but what more especially contributed to the improvement and commercial importance of the town was the settlement here, after the revocation of the edict of Nantz, of many Huguenot families, who introduced the manufacture of linen, and brought with them improved machinery from Holland. The skill and industry of these foreigners were liberally encouraged by the government, which granted large sums of money for the erection of suitable buildings for carrying on the manufactures, &c.; and, by giving an example to others engaged in the same trade, the new settlers soon raised the quality of the manufactures to a degree of excellence previously unknown. In 1707, the town and castle were burned to the ground; the latter has never been rebuilt, but the present town soon arose from the ruins of the former, and gradually increased in extent. It has been greatly improved at various times, especially within the last few years by the spirited exertions of the agent of the Marquess of Hertford, who is owner in fee of the whole town, and of a considerable part of the surrounding country; and Lisburn is now one of the handsomest inland towns in Ulster.

The TOWN is situated on the north-western bank of the river Lagan, which separates the counties of Antrim and Down, and on the high road from Dublin to Belfast: it consists principally of one long irregular line of street, extending nearly from east to west, from which several smaller streets branch off; and contains, according to the last census, 1001 houses, of which the greater number are roofed with slate, and the remainder with thatch. All the houses in the principal streets are well built, and amply supplied with excellent water conveyed by pipes from works in the neighbourhood; the lighting of the town is under the management of commissioners appointed agreeably with the act 9th George IV., cap. 82, which was adopted by the inhabitants in 1837. The great terrace of the castle, which is still remaining, has been made an agreeable promenade; it is sheltered from the north by Castle-street, and is kept in the best order at the expense of the Marquess of Hertford. On the opposite side of the river is a small suburb, not included in the ancient limits of the borough, but within the parish and the new electoral boundaries. A line of road has been made at a great expense at the entrance from Dublin on the south-west, and also at the entrances from Belfast and Armagh; by which the town has been much improved. The MANUFACTURE of linens and cambrics, which are sold in their brown state every market day at the linen-hall, a neat and commodious building erected for the purpose, is still carried on to a considerable extent, maintaining its high reputation for the superior quality of the articles; and the diapers and damasks of this place have long been distinguished for their unrivalled beauty of pattern and fineness of texture. On a small island in the river Lagan are extensive chymical works for the preparation of acids, chlorides, &c., for the supply of the several bleach-yards, of which some of the largest in the kingdom are adjacent to the town, the principal being at Lambeg, Colin, Seymour Hill, Suffolk, and Chrome Hill, where 189,000 pieces are annually bleached and finished, principally for the London market. There are also establishments for the printing, bleaching, and dyeing of muslins; and, near the town, an extensive thread manufactory and a large flour-mill. The trade is much facilitated by the Lagan navigation from Lough Neagh; this, a little above the town, joins the river Lagan, by which, with the aid of several collateral cuts, the navigation is continued to Belfast. The Ulster railway has also proved of great benefit to the place. In the excise arrangements, Lisburn gives name to, and is the head of, a district comprising the towns of Larne, Carrickfergus, Belfast, and Lisburn, in the county of Antrim; and Newtown-Ards, Downpatrick, Castlewellan, Saintfield, Hillsborough, and Banbridge, in the county of Down. A branch of the Northern Bank has been opened. The market is on Tuesday, and is the largest and best in this part of the country for every description of provisions; it is also much frequented on account of the quantities of linen and other articles which, in addition to its supply of provisions, are brought for sale: there is a cattle-market on the same day. The fairs are annually held on July 21st and Oct. 5th, and are chiefly for horses, cattle, sheep, lambs, and pigs, the supply of which is very large. The market-house is a handsome building surmounted by a cupola, and, in addition to the accommodation it affords to the market, contains a suite of assembly-rooms. There are also very extensive shambles, corn-stores, sheds, and weigh-houses, erected by the proprietor of the town; and well-inclosed market-places for cattle, sheep, and pigs.

By the charter of Charles II. conferring the ELECTIVE FRANCHISE, the inhabitants not being a body corporate, and consequently having no municipal officer, the seneschal of the manor of Killultagh was appointed returning officer for the borough. The right of election was vested in the inhabitants generally, every pot-walloper being entitled to vote; but by an act of the 35th of George III., cap. 29, it was restricted to the £5 householders, of whom, previously to the late act for amending the representation, there were only 141, and of these only 81 were qualified to vote. By the 2nd of William IV., cap. 88, the right of election was confirmed in the £5 householders; and the boundary of the borough, which was very indistinct, was enlarged and clearly defined, and made to comprise an area of 1325 acres. The number of voters registered in 1841 was 203; the seneschal is still the returning officer. Manorial courts are held by the seneschal every third Wednesday, at which debts to the amount of 40*s.* are recoverable; and there is a court of record, with jurisdiction to the amount of £20 late currency. Courts lect are also held, twice in the year, when a leet grand jury is sworn, by whom a petty-constable is appointed for each of the 17 constablewicks into which the manor is divided: presentments for payment of salaries, repairs of roads, and other works, are made; and other municipal functions of the borough are exercised. Petty-sessions are held in the town every Tuesday; and here is a station of the constabulary police. A large and handsome edifice now used as the court-house of the manor, and for holding the petty-sessions and public meetings, was originally built and supported by government as a chapel for the Huguenot emigrants, whose descendants having attached themselves to the Established Church, the minister's stipend has been discontinued, and the building appropriated to the above purposes. The manor gaol of the borough, under the custody of the marshal of the manor court, has, since the 7th of George IV., been disused as a place of confinement, and is now used as a place of custody for goods attached by the court, till bailed.

The parish, which is also called Blaris, comprises 10,697 statute acres; 2827¼ are in the barony of Upper Massereene, county of Antrim, and 3064 in Upper Castlereagh, and 4805¾ in Lower Iveagh, county of Down. The lands are very fertile, and the system of agriculture is highly improved; for the last thirty years, wheat has been the staple crop, and oats, formerly the principal produce, are now grown only for the sake of a due rotation. The Maze race-course, described in the article on Hillsborough, near which town it is situated, is in this parish; and the surrounding scenery is enlivened by numerous gentlemen's seats, among which are Ballymacash, Brookhill, Larchfield, Lambeg House, Seymour Hill, Chrome Hill, Ingram Lodge, Suffolk, and Colin; besides many other elegant houses near the town. The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Hertford. The tithe rent-charge is £525: there is a glebe-house, erected in 1784 by the then incumbent; but no glebe attached to the living. The church is a spacious and handsome building, with a tower, to which an octagonal spire was added in 1807, at the expense of the second Marquess of Hertford: a fine organ was presented to it by the late marquess; and in its improvement considerable sums have been expended, including a grant of £256 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It contains a monument to Lieutenant Dobbs, a native of the town, who was killed in an engagement with Paul Jones off this coast; and an elegant monument recently erected at the expense of the bishop and clergy of the diocese, to the memory of the celebrated Dr. Jeremy Taylor, Bishop of Down and Connor, who died here in 1667, and was buried in a vault in the church of Dromore, which he had built. In the churchyard are monuments to many of the Huguenots who settled here under the patronage of William III. and Queen Anne. This is the cathedral of the united dioceses of Down and Connor; the visitations are held in it, and all the business belonging to the see is transacted in the town. There are no chapels of ease within the parish; but divine service is performed in the school-houses of Newport, Maze, and Broomhedge, in rotation. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, sometimes called Blaris, comprising Lisburn, Hillsborough, and Magheramesk, in the two former of which are chapels. There is a meeting-house for Presbyterians of the General Assembly; also two for Wesleyans, and one for the Society of Friends.

To the north of the town is the Ulster Provincial School for the Society of Friends, founded in 1794 by Mr. John Handcock, who bequeathed a sum of money for the erection of the premises: 50 children, who are eligible at eight years of age and remain till fourteen, are boarded, clothed, educated, and apprenticed; each scholar pays £3. 12. per annum, and the remainder of the expense, which averages about £14 per annum each, is defrayed by contributions from the society. A free school for boys was founded in 1810, and aided by the Association for Discountenancing Vice; and there is a similar school for girls, built and supported by subscription: the late George Whitla, Esq., bequeathed £100 to each, the interest of which is applied in procuring clothing for some of the poorest children. There are two other schools for both sexes, one of them aided by the same society, and the other supported by subscription. An infants' school, also supported by subscription, was established in 1832, and a building was erected for its use at an expense of £120, towards defraying which the late Marquess of Hertford contributed £50. An almshouse for eight poor women was founded under the will of Mr. Williams, in 1826; and six almshouses, for as many widows, were founded by a member of the Trail family, and are now wholly supported by William Trail, Esq.: they were rebuilt on a more convenient site in 1830, at the expense of the marquess. The several charitable bequests amount in the aggregate to £2750, invested in government securities; the interest is distributed in winter among the poor, according to the wills of the respective donors. A Humane Society for the restoration of suspended animation has been established here; and in an airy part of the town is situated the County Infirmary, supported equally by subscriptions and grand jury presentments. The workhouse of the union, on a site of six acres purchased for £742, was completed in 1840, at an expense of £6200, and with all necessary accommodation affords admission to 800 paupers. On the White Mountain, about two miles to the north of the town, are the ruins of Castle Robin, erected by Sir Robert Norton in the reign of Elizabeth; the walls now remaining are 84 feet long, 36 feet wide, and 40 feet high, and near them is a large mount. Among the distinguished individuals born here may be noticed Dr. Edward Smith, Bishop of Down and Connor, in 1665. Lisburn confers the titles of Earl and Viscount on the family of Vaughan.

LISCANOR, a village, in the parish of KILMACREHY, union of ENNISTYMON, barony of CORCOMROE, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (W.) from Ennistymon, and on the northern side of the bay of the same name, on the western coast; containing 85 houses, and 562 inhabitants. The bay of Liscanor being exposed to the violence of the Atlantic, and having a rocky and dangerous shore, a pier was built a few years since, by the late Fishery Board, for the protection and encouragement of the small craft employed in the fishery of the bay, to which, as well as to vessels engaged in general trading, it affords great shelter and accommodation, although it has been several times injured by the sea. Excellent lobsters, small turbot, and a variety of other fish, are taken. Here are a constabulary police station, and a detachment from the coast-guard station at Freagh Point. Over the estuary of the river Inagh, in the vicinity of the village, a handsome bridge was lately built, consisting of three elliptic arches, each of 45 feet span, connected by a causeway or embankment 160 feet in length, with three smaller arches on the south side for the passage of superfluous water; the total length of the roadway, including an embankment at each end of the bridge, is 507 feet. Of the expense, £4200, the Board of Public Works, under whose superintendence it was erected, contributed £2222, the remainder being defrayed by the county. In the Roman Catholic divisions, this village gives name to a district, which comprises the parishes of Kilmacrehy and Killaspuglenane and contains the chapels of Liscanor in the former and Cahirgal in the latter parish; that of Liscanor is a large plain building. Near the village are the ruins of an ancient castle, consisting of a square tower; it was of great strength, and was the residence of the O'Conors.—See KILMACREHY.

LISCARROL, a parish, in the union of MALLOW, barony of ORRERY and KILMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4½ miles (W. N. W.) from Buttevant, on the road to Newcastle; containing 2249 inhabitants, of whom 750 are in the village. This place is distinguished for the remains of its ancient castle, the foundation of which is by some attributed to the followers of Strongbow, and by others to John, Earl of Morton, afterwards King of England. In 1641, the castle was garrisoned by Sir Philip Perceval, and so strongly fortified, that it maintained a resolute defence for thirteen days against General Barry, by whom it was besieged with an army of 7000 foot and 500 horse, with a train of artillery, and to whom it surrendered on honourable terms. The delay occasioned by the siege allowed Lord Inchiquin to assemble a force of 2000 foot and 400 horse, with which he attacked and defeated the Irish in the neighbourhood of the castle, which was retaken and restored to Sir Philip. In 1644, the Irish having made prisoners several of the garrison who were without the walls, threatened to put them to death unless the fortress surrendered, on which Raymond, the constable, sallied out with a party of his men, put the Irish to flight, and recovered the prisoners; but the castle, though well prepared for defence, surrendered in the year following to Lord Castlehaven without making any resistance. The VILLAGE is pleasantly situated in a valley, and contains 130 houses, mostly thatched. A barrack for two officers and sixty-four non-commissioned officers and privates, was built in the vicinity, in 1821; the establishment was kept up for about four years, but the buildings are now occupied by labourers. Fairs are held on the 25th of March, 1st and 31st of May, Aug. 31st, Oct. 21st, and Nov. 29th, chiefly for cattle and pigs. A constabulary police force is stationed here: manorial courts are held occasionally, with jurisdiction extending to 40s.; and petty-sessions on alternate Thursdays.

The parish comprises 4028 statute acres; the land in general is good, and chiefly in pasture. Limestone is quarried both for agricultural purposes and for building. The principal seats are, Altamira, a handsome mansion in an extensive and richly planted demesne; and High Fort, the residence of the Purcell family, distinguished for the gallant defence made by its then proprietor, Sir John Purcell, against a midnight attack by nearly 20 robbers, whom, though armed only with a case knife, he entire repulsed; in consideration of which intrepid conduct, he obtained the honour of knighthood. Sally Park is now in ruins. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, united to that of Kilbrin, together forming the union of Kilbrin or Liscarrol, in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £190. 10., which is equally divided between the impropriator and the vicar; the vicarial tithe rent-charge of the whole benefice amounts to £410. 5. The church is at Ballygraddy, on the border of Liscarrol, and in the parish of Kilbrin. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a union, comprising also the parish of Churchtown or Bruhenny: the chapel here, an old building, was lately repaired and enlarged; there is also a chapel at Churchtown. There are very considerable remains of the ancient castle, which was a quadrangular building, 240 feet long and 120 feet wide, inclosed with walls 30 feet high and defended with two square and four round towers of great strength, parts of which are still remaining. Near the barracks are some remarkable fissures in the limestone rock; about a mile from the town is a fissure of great depth, called Kate's Hole, which is now closed up; and at Coolbane, to the west of it, is a large rath, neatly planted, where it is said seventeen of the relatives of Garret Fitzgerald, of the house of Desmond, killed in the siege of the castle, were interred.

LISCARTIN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of LOWER NAVAN, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Navan; on the river Blackwater, and on the road from Dublin to Enniskillen; containing 318 inhabitants. It comprises 1303½ statute acres, of good quality, and chiefly in tillage. Liscartin Castle, supposed to have been originally a monastic building, was the birth-place of the first Lord Cadogan, to which family it still belongs; part of it now constitutes the residence of Mr. Gerrard: the outworks of the castle were considerable, and a gateway still remains, about 60 yards distant from the main building. Bachelor's Lodge, a neat residence, is also in this parish. Liscartin is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Ardbraccan; the tithe rent-charge is £51. 18. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Ardbraccan, also called Bohermeen.

LISCLEARY, or LISLEY COLERIGGE, a parish, in the union of KINSALE, barony of KERRICURRIHY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2½ miles (W.) from Carrigaline, and on the south side of the river Awinboy; containing 1432 inhabitants. It comprises 4305 statute acres, and is divided into two parts by the intervening parish of Carrigaline. The surface is undulating, and the soil in general good; besides lime, sea-weed and sand brought from Carrigaline are used for manure, and the system of agriculture is gradually improving. Limestone exists near the border of the adjoining parish of Killanully, but lies too deep for profitable working, especially as an abundant supply is obtained from that parish. The seats are Ballea Castle and Rathfeen House. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork; the rectory constitutes the corps of the prebend of Lisclеary in the cathedral of Cork, and the vicarage is held in sequestration by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £157. 10., five-ninths are payable to the prebendary and the remainder to the commissioners. Divine service is regularly performed in the parochial school-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballygarvan and Douglas. The school is partly supported by the prebendary, and partly by the Cork Diocesan Association. A chalybeate spa here has been found efficacious in cases of dyspepsia, and is exceedingly valuable as a tonic diuretic.

LISCOLEMAN, a parish, in the union and barony of SHILLELAGH, county of WICKLOW, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Tullow, and on the confines of the county of Carlow; containing 639 inhabitants. It comprises 2483 statute acres, including a small portion of bog: the state of agriculture is improving. The seats are Rath and Knocklow. It is an impropriate cure, in the diocese of Leighlin, forming part of the union of Aghold; the rectory is appropriate to the dean and chapter, and of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £112. 10., two-thirds are payable to the lessee of the dean and chapter, and the remainder to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Clonmore.

LISDEEN, a village, in the parish of KILFIERAGH, union of KILRUSH, barony of MOYARTA, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (E.) from Kilkee, near the road from that place to Kilrush. Fairs are held on May 7th, July 13th, Sept. 8th, and Dec. 17th. Here is the old Roman Catholic chapel for the parish of Kilfieragh; and in the vicinity is a chalybeate spring, occasionally used for medicinal purposes.

LISDOONVARNA, CLARE.—See KILMOON.

LISDOWNEY, a village, in the parish of AHARNEY, barony of GALMOY, union and county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Durrow, on the road to Kilkenny; containing 28 houses, and 134 inhabitants. It is situated on the confines of Queen's county, and contains the chapel giving name to the Roman Catholic district, which comprises the parishes of Aharney, Sheffin, Balleen, and Coolcashin, and parts of Rathbeagh and Grange.

LISGENAN, or GRANGE, a parish, in the union of DUNGARVAN, barony of DECIES-within-DRUM, county of WATERFORD, and province of MUNSTER, 5 miles (E.) from Youghal; on the river Licky, and near the coast; containing 3527 inhabitants. It comprises 5710 statute acres: sea-weed, which is obtained in great abundance at the Cove, is used for manure. In the cliffs are some remarkable caves, and off the shore is Goats' Island; at Whiting bay is Grange Lodge, a marine villa, the occasional residence of Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart. The parish is a vicarage, in the diocese of Lismore, forming part of the union of Kinsalebeg; the rectory is impropriate in the Duke of Devonshire, and of the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £450, two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lisgenan forms part of the district of Ardmore, and has a small chapel.

LISGOOLD, a parish, in the union of MIDLETON, barony of BARRYMORE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 6¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Rathcormac, and on the road from Midleton to Fermoy; containing 969 inhabitants. It comprises 3154 statute acres; the soil is poor, and the state of agriculture rather backward. The beautiful glen of Bally-Edmond contains some fine plantations, and is traversed by the river Curra in its course to Midleton. Fairs are held at Lisgoold on May 1st, June 24th, Nov. 1st, and Dec. 21st. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, united prior to any existing record to the rectories and vicarages of Ballintemple and Imphrick, the rectory of Ballycaraney, and two-thirds of the rectory of Kilcreden, together constituting the union of Lisgoold and the corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of Cloyne, in the gift of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in G. Lukey, of Midleton, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £151. 6. 6., of which £89. 0. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent; the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £732. 18. There is a glebe of 11 acres, but no glebe-house. The church, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits contributed £500, was built in 1789. With the exception of Lisgoold and Ballycaraney the parishes of the union are detached, at a considerable distance from each other. In the Roman Catholic divisions Lisgoold gives name to the district, which also comprises the parishes of Ballycaraney, Templeboden, and Templeneарrigy; the chapel is at Lisgoold.

LISGRIFFIN.—See BUTTEVANT.

LISHEEN, a village, in the parish and barony of MOYARTA, poor-law union of KILRUSH, county of CLARE, and province of MUNSTER; containing 26 houses, and 140 inhabitants.

LISKEEVY, a parish, in the poor-law union of TUAM, barony of DUNMORE, county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 6¾ miles (N. W.) from Tuam, on the road to Claremorris and Mayo; containing 3118 inhabitants. It comprises 7206¾ statute acres, including a large quantity of bog, the whole of which is easily reclaimable, from the abundance of limestone-gravel in the vicinity. The river Clare runs through it, and in some places has a depth of 40 feet. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Tuam, forming part of the union of Tuam; the rectory partly constitutes the corps of the deanery, and is partly appropriate to the chapter of Tuam. The tithe rent-charge of Liskeevy is £110. 17. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Adregoole, and has a chapel at Milltown.

LISLEE, a parish, in the union of BANGOR, barony of IBANE and BARRYROE, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 10 miles (S. W.) from Bandon, and on the southern coast; containing, with the village of Court-M'Sherry (which is separately described), 5211 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises 6302 statute acres, is situated on the western side of the harbour of Court-M'Sherry; the land is in general good and under tillage, and, from the great facility of procuring seamanure at the "Broad Strand," is in some parts well cultivated. At Dunworley is a small bog overflowed by the sea; there are some quarries of slate of an inferior quality, and in the vicinity of Court-M'Sherry slate of superior quality and colour is obtained. The seats are, Court-M'Sherry, beautifully situated on the harbour, and sheltered by a well-planted eminence; Sea Court; and Butlerstown. The seneschal of the Earl of Shannon has the power of holding a court baron here for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s. late currency, which has merged into that of Timoleague, where the courts are now held.

The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ross, episcopally united in 1705 to the rectory of Kilsillagh, together constituting the union of Lislee, in the patronage of the Bishop: the rectory here is impropriate in the Earl of Shannon. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £561. 17., of which £152. 15. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the entire tithe of the incumbent's benefice amounts to £441. 2. 9. The glebe comprises 42 acres, of which 32 were purchased by the late Board of First Fruits; the glebe-house was built in 1813, by a gift of £100 and a loan of £750 from the same Board. The church is a neat edifice in the early English style, with a square tower, erected in 1830 at the expense of the parish, aided by a loan of £900 from the Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish forms part of the district of Abbeymahon; the chapel, a large plain building, is at Butlerstown. Of seven schools in the parish, the parochial schools at Barreragh are partly supported by the vicar, and, together with a school at Court-M'Sherry, built by the vicar and supported by the Ladies Boyle, and a Sunday school, are under his superintendence; there is a school held in the chapel-yard at Butlerstown, under the patronage of the Roman Catholic clergy: the remainder are private schools. There are several ancient circular mounds, or raths; that from which the parish is said to derive its name, Lis-lee, is a little to the west of the church, but the most extensive is on a hill about half a mile to the south. On a small peninsula in the bay of Dunworley, are the ruins of the castle of that name, having a very narrow entrance similar to that of the strong castle of the O'Driscols on Cape Clear; and on the cliffs called the "Seven Heads" is an old signal tower. Near Dunworley is a spring of very pure water, dedicated to St. Anne; and in several parts of the parish are springs strongly impregnated with iron. A little south of the Broad Strand are lofty cliffs composed of several distinct strata; the fourth from the surface is a soft ferruginous yellow rock, in which masses of iron-ore are found, varying in size from 4oz. to nearly 1 cwt.

LISLIVANE, a village, in the parish of Abbeymahon, union of Bandon, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, county of Cork, and province of Munster; containing 25 houses, and 121 inhabitants.

LISMAKEERY, or Lismacdiry, a parish, in the union of Rathkeale, barony of Lower Connello, county of Limerick, and province of Munster, 2 miles (S.) from Askeaton; on the road to Newbridge, and on the western bank of the river Deel; containing 1056 inhabitants. It comprises 3032 statute acres, chiefly of a light soil interspersed with limestone crags, and much encumbered with loose stones, presenting an uneven surface and bleak appearance; but is nevertheless generally productive, and on the banks of the Deel is even fertile. Altavilla, a handsome residence surrounded by a well-planted demesne, is finely situated on this river, at the south-eastern extremity of the parish. Lismakeery is a rectory, in the diocese of Limerick, forming part of the union of Askeaton: the tithe rent-charge is £135. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish is included in the union or district of Askeaton. On an eminence near Altavilla are the ruins of the church.

LISMALIN, a parish, in the union of Callan, barony of Slievardagh, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 4½ miles (S. W.) from Callan; containing 1417 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the confines of the county of Kilkenny, comprises 4242 statute acres; and was anciently distinguished for its castle, of which there are still some portions remaining. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, united to the prebend and vicarage of Crohane, and the rectories and vicarages of Modeshill and Mowney, together constituting the corps of the archdeaconry of Cashel, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the union is £785. 7. 6.: there is neither glebe nor glebe-house. The church is a neat edifice.

LISMATEIGUE, a denomination or reputed parish, in the union of Waterford, barony of Knocktopher, county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, 3 miles (S.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Waterford to Kilkenny; containing 545 inhabitants. It anciently formed part of the possessions of the abbey of Jerpoint; and comprises 1643½ statute acres, of which the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £75, is payable to the rector and vicar of Burnchurch, in the diocese of Ossory.

LISMORE, a market and post town (formerly a parliamentary borough), a parish, the head of a union, and the seat of a diocese, partly in the barony of Condons and Clongibbons, county of Cork, but chiefly in that of Coshmore and Coshbride, county of Waterford, and in the province of Munster, 34 miles (S.S.W.) from Waterford and 109½ (S. W. by S.) from Dublin, on the coach-road from Waterford to Cork; containing, with the post-town of Cappoquin (which is separately described) and the parish of Mocollop, 21,552 inhabitants, of whom 3007 are in the town of Lismore. This place, called anciently Dunsginne, from an old fortification to the east of the town (now termed the Round Hill), to which, on his expulsion from Rathenin by King Blathmac, in 631, St. Carthagh fled for shelter, derived its present name, signifying "a great house or village," from a monastery founded here by that saint, which subsequently became a celebrated seat of learning and the head of a diocese. St. Carthagh, who died in 638, and was interred in his own church, was succeeded by St. Cataldus, afterwards bishop of Tarentum, in Italy, whose successors were indifferently styled abbots or bishops; and the school, which was attended by numbers not only from the neighbouring districts, but also from remote countries, was in the zenith of its reputation about the commencement of the 8th century. The establishment continued to flourish; and such was the fame of the place, that not less than 20 churches were founded in its immediate vicinity; but in 812 it was plundered by the Danes, who, from that period till 915, five times repeated their devastations. In 978 the town and abbey were burned by the Ossorians; in 1095 the town was destroyed by an accidental fire; and in 1116, 1138, and 1157, both the town and the monastery suffered from conflagration.

Henry II., after landing at Waterford, marched to this place, where he was met by the chiefs of Munster, who, with the archbishops, bishops, and abbots of Ireland, swore allegiance to him, and gave him a charter confirming the kingdom of Ireland to him and his heirs for ever. While here, the king chose a site, and gave the necessary orders for the erection of a fortress for its defence. In 1173, Raymond Le Gros, with the English army, marched to Lismore with the plunder he had taken in Ophaly; and, after ravaging the city and neighbourhood, proceeded on his route to Dungarvan. A CASTLE was erected here, in 1185, by John, Earl of Morton, and Lord of Ireland. Four years afterwards it was taken by the Irish, who put Robert de Barry, the commander, and the whole of the garrison, to the sword; it was, however, soon rebuilt by the king, and for many ages continued to be the residence of the bishops of the see, till Miler Magrath, Archbishop of Cashel and Bishop of Lismore, in 1518 granted the manor and other lands to Sir Walter Raleigh, from whom, with the rest of his possessions, they were purchased by Sir Richard Boyle, afterwards created Earl of Cork. The castle was greatly strengthened and improved by the earl, who built three other forts in the neighbourhood, one of which was at the Park, one at Ballygarran, and the third at Ballyinn; he also obtained a charter of incorporation for the town, and the grant of a market and fairs.

At the commencement of the war in 1641, the castle was besieged by a force of 5000 Irish under Sir Richard Belling, but was bravely defended by the earl's son, Lord Broghill, who compelled them to abandon the attempt. In 1643, a party of 200 insurgents, in retaliation for the destruction of Clogheen by the garrison of this place, entered the town and burned most of the thatched houses and cabins, killed 60 of the inhabitants, and carried off several prisoners. In July of the same year Lieutenant-General Purcell, commander-in-chief of the insurgent forces, at the head of 7000 foot and 900 horse, with three pieces of artillery, marched to Cappoquin, where he remained for four days, laying waste the adjacent country; and being there joined by Lord Muskerry, he advanced to besiege the castle of Lismore. After a week's siege, a cessation of arms was mutually agreed on, and the assailants immediately retired; but the castle suffered great injury during this war, and in 1645, being burned by Lord Castlehaven, it was reduced almost to a ruin, and the town became a neglected village, consisting only of a few miserable cabins. In 1686, the Earl of Clarendon, on his progress through Munster, passed a night in this castle, which was also visited by James II., in 1689; and in 1785 the Duke of Rutland, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, held a council in the castle, from which he issued several proclamations. The castle, with all its lands and other property, descended from the Earls of Cork and Burlington, by marriage, to the ancestor of his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, who is the present proprietor.

The TOWN, which has been greatly improved by the late and present duke, is romantically situated on the summit of a steep eminence rising to the height of 93 feet from the southern bank of the river Blackwater, over which is a fine bridge of stone, erected by the late duke of Devonshire at an expense of £9000, and of which the central arch has a span of 100 feet. Some new streets have been made: the total number of houses, in 1841, was 352, several of which are neat and well built; the place has a cheerful and thriving appearance. The CASTLE, restored by the late duke in 1812, forms an imposing object, rising majestically from the elevated bank of the river, and occupying the verge of a precipitous cliff, partly clothed with wood and towering above the foliage which conceals its base. The approach is through an outer gateway, called the Riding House, from which a long avenue of stately trees, flanked with high stone walls, leads to the principal entrance through a lofty gateway-tower, over which are the arms of the first earl of Cork, into the square of the castle. Several of the towers are still in their original state, though other portions of the building have been restored and embellished in a more modern style. The state apartments are spacious, and very elegantly fitted up; the drawing-rooms are hung with splendid tapestry, and paintings by the first masters. From the summits of the tower, and the flat roofs of the building, are magnificent views of the surrounding country: in front is the lofty mountain of Knockmeledown, rising above the range of hills extending eastward, and from which a deep ravine thickly wooded, and alternated with projecting masses of rugged rock appearing through the foliage, descends to the vale immediately below it; the vale is embellished with handsome residences and rich plantations; and near its apparent extremity is seen the town of Cappoquin, with the spire of its church, and its bridge of light structure over the river. In the grounds are some remarkably fine yew-trees of great age, forming an avenue, and assuming the appearance of cloisters. The TRADE is very inconsiderable; but on the river, immediately below the castle, is an extensive salmon-fishery, and during the season great quantities of fish are taken, which are packed in ice, and exported to Liverpool and to other distant ports. The Blackwater affords facility of commerce with the port of Youghal; the navigation was extended from the point to which the tide reaches, about a mile to the east, up to the bridge, by a canal constructed at the expense of the late duke, by means of which corn and flour are exported, and timber, iron, coal, and miscellaneous articles are imported, in lighters plying between this place and Youghal. In the excise arrangements Lismore is within the district of Waterford. There are no stated market days: the fairs are on May 25th, Sept. 25th, and Nov. 12th; and here is a constabulary police station.

By charter of James I., granted in 1613 to Sir Richard Boyle, first earl of Cork, the town, with the circumjacent lands within a mile and a half round the parish church, was made a free BOROUGH; and the corporation was directed to consist of a portreeve, free burgesses, and commonalty. The charter also invested the corporation with the privilege of returning two members to the Irish parliament, which they continued to exercise till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised, and the £15,000 awarded as compensation were paid to the trustees under the will of the Earl of Cork and Burlington, whose seneschal was the returning officer. Whether the officers of the corporation, nominated in the charter, were ever regularly chosen, cannot be ascertained; but it appears that few municipal functions were exercised, except by the seneschal of the manor. He still holds his court, at which debts not exceeding £10 are recoverable every third week; but since the Union the corporation has become virtually extinct. Petty-sessions are held on alternate Wednesdays: the sessions-house is a spacious building, and there is also a bridewell.

The PARISH of Lismore and Mocollop contains 64,037 statute acres. The soil is in general fertile, and the lands alternately arable and pasture, with very little waste, except roads and river, and a small quantity of bog; the system of agriculture is improved. Limestone abounds in the southern parts of the parish, and towards the north is found in strata of great depth. Slate of good quality for roofing is quarried on the north side of the Blackwater and at Glenribben, and there are several other quarries, one of which near the bridge of Lismore has been worked for a long time: there is slate also on the side of Knockmeledown; and coarse clay-slate, silicious rock, conglomerate, and sandstone are found in various parts. Iron, copper, and lead ores are frequently discovered, and were formerly worked, but discontinued for want of fuel; a lead-mine was discovered in 1836, a little below Cappoquin, near the navigable part of the Blackwater, but it is not yet worked. The scenery abounds with features of grandeur and beauty; on the north, towards the county of Tipperary, the parish is bounded by a mountainous ridge, the highest point of which is the conical summit of Knockmeledown, 2700 feet above the level of the sea, commanding a magnificent and extensive prospect, embracing the Rock of Cashel and its cathedral church, and the ocean, with the bays of Youghal and Dungarvan. On the summit of this mountain, Mr. Eccles, a writer on electricity, was buried in 1781, at his own request. Some very rich scenery is also observable on the roads to Clogheen and Cappoquin, about two miles distant; in various places deep ravines intersect the range of hills, and the whole of the adjoining district presents features of interest and variety. The principal seats are, Tourin, the residence of Sir R. Musgrave, Bart., composed partly of an ancient castle, and commanding an extensive and picturesque view; Ballysaggartmore, an ample and tastefully planted demesne near the river, also commanding some fine views; Flower Hill, a beautiful residence in the cottage style, surrounded by richly diversified scenery; Fort William, a demesne on the opposite side of the Blackwater, in which a new house has been erected by the proprietor; Glencairne, a handsome residence beautifully situated; Ballygally; Glanbeg; Tourtain; Ballyinn; Ballyrafter; and Salterbridge, beautifully situated in thriving plantations. At Ballyinn are some flour-mills.

The SEE of LISMORE, soon after the arrival of the English, was enlarged by the annexation of the ancient see of Ardmore. Bishop Felix, who succeeded to the prelacy in 1179, gave the church of St. John to the abbey of Thomas-Court, near Dublin; and from this time, fierce disputes were carried on between the prelate of this see and the Bishop of Waterford, which were frequently renewed and continued by several of his successors, till 1358, when, during the prelacy of Bishop Reve, the two sees were united. They continued to be held as one by Le Reve, Bishop of Lismore and Waterford, and by his successors till the passing of the Church Temporalities' act, in the 3rd and 4th of William IV., when, on the decease of Dr. Bourke, both were annexed to the see of Cashel, and their temporalities became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Lismore is one of the sixteen dioceses which constitute the ecclesiastical province of Dublin: it includes the greater part of the county of Waterford, and part of Tipperary, extending 38 miles in length and 37 in breadth, and comprising an estimated superficies of 323,500 acres, of which 92,000 are in Tipperary and the remainder in Waterford. The lands belonging to the see, and its gross revenue, are comprised in the return for the see of Waterford. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, archdeacon, and the prebendaries of Tulloghorton, Dysart, Donoughmore, Kilrossanty, Modeligo, Kilgobinet, Seskinan, and Clashmore. There are five vicars-choral, who were first instituted by Bishop Christopher about the year 1230, and are all appointed by the dean, who has a peculiar jurisdiction over the parishes of Lismore, Tallow, and Mocollop during eleven months of the year, till inhibited by the bishop, a month before the episcopal visitation; he has also a right to appoint a registrar, and can grant licences under his own consistorial seal: the deanery, it is said, may be held by a layman. There are comprehended in the see the rural deaneries of Lismore, Whitechurch, Dungarvan, Carrick, Clonmel, and Cahir. The number of parishes in the diocese is 76, comprised in 43 benefices, of which 23 are unions of two or more parishes, and 20 single parishes; of these benefices, 6 are in the patronage of the Crown, 26 in that of the Bishop of Cashel, and the remainder in lay patronage. There are in the diocese 36 churches, and one other episcopal place of worship; and 15 glebe-houses.

In the Roman Catholic divisions the diocese is united with that of Waterford, together forming one of the seven bishoprics suffragan to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel: it contains 65 chapels; the number of parochial benefices and clergy is stated in the account of the see of Waterford.

The CATHEDRAL church, dedicated to St. Carthagh, the only one remaining of the numerous ancient churches of this place, and now used as the parochial church, was, after being almost destroyed in the reign of Elizabeth by Edmund Fitzgibbon, called the "White Knight," restored in 1663 at the expense of the Earl of Cork. It is a handsome structure, chiefly in the later English style, with a square tower surmounted by a light and elegant spire, which were added to it some few years since, when extensive alterations and repairs were made. The entrance is at the extremity of the south transept, under a pure Norman arch of elegant design : the choir, in which the parochial service is performed, is embellished with windows of stained glass, executed by the late George M'Allister, of Dublin; and the bishop's throne and prebendal stalls are of oak richly carved. The only ancient monument now remaining is one to the family of Mac Grath, dated 1548, and very richly sculptured; there are some handsome tablets to the memory of Dean Scott, Archdeacon Ryan, J. H. Lovett, Esq., and the families of Musgrave, Chearnley, and others. The economy fund, on an average of three years ending May, 1831, amounted to £823. 10. 8. per annum, arising from the tithes of the parishes of Lismore and Mocollop : it is appropriated to the payment of two preachers in the cathedral, who have respectively stipends of £80 and £65; to the curate of Cappoquin, whose stipend is £90; and to the payment of salaries to the cathedral officers, and of repairs.

The rectory of Lismore has been united from time immemorial to that of Mocollop, and both are appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral; the vicarage is also united to that of Mocollop, and both are appropriate to the vicars-choral, who have cure of souls. The tithe rent-charge is £1476. 18. 6. for both parishes, which, with the exception of four townlands in the county of Cork, comprise 62,744 statute acres; there is no glebe-house, but a residence for the archdeacon. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel here is a large and neat edifice, and there is a chapel also at Ballyduff. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and for Wesleyan Methodists. Of several public schools, the classical school was endowed with a house and £30 per annum by the late Earl of Cork; two are partly supported by the dean and chapter and vicars-choral, one of which is aided by a bequest of £17 per annum from Mr. Magner, of Boston, in the United States; two are aided by Sir R. Musgrave and Captain Bushe, and one by the Duke of Devonshire. Six almshouses were founded and endowed by the first earl of Cork for decayed Protestant soldiers; and there are a fever hospital, and dispensary. Mr. Lovett, in 1805, bequeathed £500 to the poor. The union workhouse, on a site of four acres held at a rent of £10 per annum, was completed in 1841, at an expense of £5500, and is constructed to contain 500 paupers.

At Kilbree are some remains of a castle built by King John, situated on an eminence commanding the Blackwater. There are vestiges of a double and single trench in the parish; the former, called Rian-Bo-Padruic, extending eastward from Knockmeledown, and twice crossing the river in its line towards Ardmore; and the latter stretching from Cappoquin, along the side of the mountains, into the county of Cork. Halfway between Lismore and Cappoquin is a weak chalybeate water, and there is another between Lismore and Knockmeledown; also a very strong chalybeate spring near Glenmore. Near the church are two small caves, and in the grove near the castle is a third; there is also a cave at Ballymartin, through which flows a rivulet.

Numerous circular intrenchments still remain in the parish, especially on both sides of the high road to Dungarvan and the mountains. Roger Boyle, first earl of Orrery, and fifth son of Richard, first earl of Cork, an eminent statesman and soldier; Robert Boyle, his brother, the celebrated natural philosopher; and Jonathan Henry Lovett, distinguished by his attainments in the Persian, Hindostanee, and Arabic languages, and who died off the Cape of Good Hope, in 1805, on his voyage from India, in the 25th year of his age; were natives of this parish. Lismore gives the titles of Baron and Viscount to the family of O'Callaghan.

LISMULLEN, a parish, in the union of NAVAN, barony of SKRYNE, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Navan, and on the road from Dublin to Enniskillen; containing 150 inhabitants. A house for Augustinian nuns was founded here in 1240 by Alicia, sister of Richard de la Corner, bishop of Meath, and existed until the Reformation : in the reign of Edward VI., the buildings and part of the estates were granted to Thomas Cusack. The parish comprises 938¾ statute acres of land, about two-thirds of which are in tillage : good gritstone is quarried here for building, and copper is supposed to exist but has not yet been worked. Here is a station of the constabulary police. Lismullen Park is the seat of Sir Charles Drake Dillon, Bart., on whose ancestor, John Dillon, and his heirs male, the dignity of a free baron of the Holy Roman Empire was conferred by the Emperor Joseph II., in 1782; the demesne, which comprises about 200 plantation acres, contains some fine old timber. The parish is a chapelry, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Skryne : the tithes are included in the rent-charge for Templecarn. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, Lismullen forms part of the union or district of Skryne or Skreen.

LISNADILL, a parish, in the union of ARMAGH, partly in the baronies of ARMAGH and UPPER FEWS, but chiefly in that of LOWER FEWS, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S. E.) from Armagh, on the road to Newtown-Hamilton; containing 9895 inhabitants. This parish comprises 18,556½ statute acres, of which 4468½ are in the barony of Armagh, 5824 in Upper Fews, and 8264 in Lower Fews. The land is remarkably good, and the system of agriculture in a very improved state; limestone of excellent quality is quarried in several parts, chiefly for agricultural purposes. The principal seats are Beech Hill, Ballyards, and Ballier. The weaving of linen for the manufacturers and bleachers of the surrounding district, affords employment to many of the inhabitants; and there are two very extensive bleach-greens, in which, on an average, 56,000 pieces are annually finished for the English markets. The LIVING is a rectory and perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Armagh; the rectory forms part of the union of Armagh, and the perpetual curacy was instituted under the provisions of an act of the 7th of George III. The tithe rent-charge is £487. 10., and the stipend of the curate is £100, paid by the rector of Armagh, who is the patron; the curate has also the glebe-house, a handsome residence built by Primate Robinson, and 62 acres of glebe, purchased by the primate for the endowment of the living. The church is a spacious edifice in the later English style, with a square embattled tower erected by Primate Robinson in 1772, and has the arms of the founder over the entrance. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district called sometimes Ballymacnab and Kilcluney, comprising the parishes of Lisnadill and Kilcluney, part of Mullaghbrack, and the district of Armaghbreague; there are chapels at Ballymacnab and Granemore, and a spacious and handsome chapel lately erected in the parish. The parochial school is endowed with 7 acres of land assigned by Primate Robinson, who also built the school-house. The ancient church was destroyed in the war of 1641, but its extensive cemetery is still used. At Corran, in 1833, was found a cylindrical case of gold, containing many antique gems and ornaments, among which was a necklace of jet richly carved.

LISNAKILL, a parish, in the barony of Middlethird, union and county of Waterford, and province of Munster, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Waterford; containing 674 inhabitants. It comprises 2534 statute acres; the soil is various: in the north-western extremity, slate of good quality for roofing was formerly quarried. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Waterford, united to part of the rectory of Kilmeaden, together constituting the corps of the treasurership of Waterford, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £120, and the glebe comprises rather more than $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres; there is neither church nor glebe-house. At the time of the Down survey there was an ancient castle at this place; and in a Danish fort, at no great distance, have been found two curious earthen vessels, in one of which was a golden bracelet. At Whitfield, in a vast heap of stones, are two conical apartments built of stone, and supposed to have been used as tombs.

LISNARRICK, a village, in the parish of Derryvullen, union of Lowtherstown, barony of Lurg, county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Kesh, on the road to Enniskillen; containing 204 inhabitants. It consists of three rows of irregularly built houses, disposed in a triangular form; and has fairs on Jan. 12th, on the 22nd of Jan., Feb., and March, April 5th, May 9th and 23rd, 22nd of June and July, and Oct. 15th, for general farming stock.

LISNASKEA, or Lisneskea, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of Aghalurcher, barony of Magherastephana, county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, 9 miles (S.E.) from Enniskillen, and 71 (N.E.) from Dublin, on the road to Enniskillen; containing 156 houses, and 915 inhabitants. It consists chiefly of comfortable residences and shops; and contains a handsome market-house, corn and butter stores, a savings' bank, and a large hotel. From its proximity to Lough Erne, which reaches to Lake Head, within a quarter of a mile of the town, great facility is afforded for the conveyance of corn, butter, linen, and yarn, of which considerable quantities are supplied from the thickly inhabited islands on the lake, and sold in this market: it is stated that a short canal could be constructed at a moderate expense, that would enable boats to come up to the town. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the Monday before Easter, April 13th, Monday after Ascension, June 1st, and Oct. 10th, for general farming stock. The church, or chapel of ease to Aghalurcher, was rebuilt in 1814, at an expense of £369 British, defrayed by the parishioners; and in 1829 the late Board of First Fruits gave £450, and lent £50, for the erection of a glebe-house in the vicinity. The curate, who is appointed by the rector of Aghalurcher, has a stipend of £73. 16. 8., exclusively of the marriage fees, and the glebe-house, which is valued at £20 per annum. The Roman Catholic chapel, called the Moate Chapel, stands on a hill near the town; it was built in 1814, at an expense of about £700: attached is a national school. In the town is a meeting-house for Primitive Methodists; also a school endowed by Major Leslie with three acres of land and £14 per annum, an infants' school, and a dispensary. In the vicinity are, Green Hill, the residence of the Irvine family; Snow Hill, Fairview, The Hill, and the ruins of Castle-Balfour. The workhouse of the union, on a site of $6\frac{1}{2}$ acres purchased for £336, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £5442, and is constructed to contain 500 paupers.—See Aghalurcher.

LISRONAGH, a parish, in the union of Clonmel, barony of Iffa and Offa East, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 4 miles (N.) from Clonmel, on the road to Fethard; containing 928 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Anner, and comprises 3046 statute acres. Quarries of limestone are worked, chiefly for agricultural purposes and for repairing roads, but from one of them large blocks are raised for building. Here is Kilmore, the old residence of the Bagwell family, now in a dilapidated state; the estate, and the greater part of the parish, are the property of John Bagwell, Esq., of Glenconner. Lisronagh is a station of the constabulary police. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Lismore, and in the patronage of Lord Ormonde. The tithe rent-charge is £173. 1. 6.; there is no glebe-house, but there is a glebe of $15\frac{3}{4}$ acres. The church, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits lent £900, is a neat edifice, completed in 1831. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Kilgrant, or Powerstown, and contains a chapel.

LISSAN, or Lisane, a parish, in the poor-law unions of Magherafelt and Cookstown, partly in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone, and partly in that of Loughinsholin, county of Londonderry, and province of Ulster, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Cookstown; on the road to Moneymore, and on that from Omagh to Belfast; containing 6282 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the mountain of Slieve Gallion, comprises $24,684\frac{1}{2}$ statute acres, including $147\frac{3}{4}$ in Lough Fea, and of which $12,917\frac{1}{2}$ are in the county of Tyrone. The greater portion is in the manor of Ardtrea, belonging to the see of Armagh; part is in the manor of Moneymore, and the property of the Drapers' Company, of London. In the war of 1641, the castle, which at that time was the property of the Staples family, to whom it had been granted on the plantation of Ulster, was seized by Nial O'Quin for Sir Phelim O'Nial, who plundered the house of Sir Thomas Staples while rendezvousing at Moneymore Castle, and compelled the men employed in Sir Thomas's iron-works on the Lissan water to make pikes and pike-heads from the stores of their master. The land is mountainous and boggy; about one-third, however, is under tillage, producing excellent crops, and the remainder affords good pasture: the system of agriculture is improved, and much of the bog is of valuable quality. Limestone abounds, and is extensively quarried for agricultural uses. The mountain of Slieve Gallion has an elevation of 1730 feet above the level of the sea; the surrounding scenery is strongly diversified, and in some parts very picturesque. The principal seats are, Lissan Park, the residence of Sir Thos. Staples, Bart., a noble mansion in an extensive demesne embellished with thriving plantations, an artificial sheet of water with cascades, and a picturesque bridge built by the celebrated Ducart; Muff House, and Crieve. The linen manufacture is carried on to a great extent by the whole of the population, who combine it with agricultural pursuits.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £375. The glebe-house was built at an expense of £1313. 14. 5., of which £100 were a gift and £650 a loan from the late Board of First Fruits, in 1807, and the remainder was paid by the incumbent; the glebe comprises 87¼ statute acres, valued at £67. 10. per annum. The church is a plain and very ancient structure, with an east window of stained glass. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also part of the parish of Desertlyn; the chapel is a neat edifice. The parochial school built by the Rev. J. M. Staples at an expense of £500, and a school at Grouse Lodge built by Mrs. Wright, who endowed it with an acre of land, are both supported under the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity; a school at Crevagh was built and is supported by Sir T. Staples, and one at Donaghbreaghy is aided by the Drapers' Company.

LISSELTIN, a parish, in the union of LISTOWEL, barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 6 miles (N. W.) from Listowel, and on the road from Tarbert to Ballybunnian; containing 2221 inhabitants. The parish comprises 6882 statute acres, of which only 300 acres are arable; of the remainder, 1860 consist of coarse pasture, and 1744 of bog and mountain. It is in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe: the rectory is impropriate in Thos. Anthony Stoughton, Esq., and the vicarage forms part of the union of Aghavallin, also called the union of Listowel; the tithe rent-charge, amounting to £90, is payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. The church, one of four in the union, was erected in 1815 by a loan of £650 from the Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, which comprises the parishes of Lisseltin, Killeheny, and Kilconly, and the greater part of Galey, and contains the chapels of Lisseltin and Ballybunnian.

LISSONUFFY, a parish, in the union, barony, and county of ROSCOMMON, and province of CONNAUGHT, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Strokestown, on the road to Lanesborough; containing 4832 inhabitants. It comprises 11,655¼ statute acres; the land is chiefly in tillage, and tolerably well cultivated. The village of Erra is situated on the river Shannon (by which the parish is bounded on the east), and is nearly surrounded by an extensive tract of bog. Stone is found in the parish, peculiarly adapted for millstones, of which a considerable number are made for supplying the adjoining counties; and specimens of coal and iron-ore are found on the surface of the mountain of Slievehawu, on the western side of the parish, but no attempt has been made to discover any veins. Mount Dillon, a seat on an isolated hill, forms a conspicuous object in the scenery. Lissonuffy is in the diocese of Elphin; the rectory forms part of the corps of the prebend of Kilgoghlin in the cathedral of Elphin, and the vicarage part of the union of Bumlin: the tithe rent-charge is £193. 17., of which £80. 6. are payable to the rector, and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Carraghroe, which comprises the parishes of Lissonuffy and Clonfinlogh, and part of Bumlin, and contains two chapels, one at Carraghroe in this parish, the other at Caranaskagh in Clonfinlogh; that of Carraghroe is a very neat edifice, of recent erection. There are some remains of the church, the burial-ground attached to which is still used; also the ruins of an ancient abbey, containing a beautiful pointed window and doorway, and some monuments to the O'Conor family.

LISTEELY, or KILTEELY, a parish, in the union of TIPPERARY, partly in the barony of SMALL COUNTY, but chiefly in that of COONAGH, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S. W.) from Pallas-Greine, on the road to Bruff; containing 2049 inhabitants, of whom 143 are in the village of Kilteely. This parish comprises 3184 statute acres: the land is in general good, and chiefly in tillage; the substratum is limestone, occasionally alternating with basalt, which latter in several parts rises to the surface. The system of agriculture is improving. Fairs, chiefly for horned-cattle and pigs, are held in the village of Kilteely on Feb. 1st, June 1st, and Oct. 25th; and there is a constabulary police station. The parish is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Emly, forming part of the union of Ballybrood and corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of Emly; the tithe rent-charge is £213. 4. 8. The church is a ruin. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, called Kilteely, comprising also the parish of Liscormuck and part of Dromkeen, and containing two chapels, one in Listeely, the other in Dromkeen; the former, in the village of Kilteely, is a large cruciform edifice, erected in 1816, and has a painting of the Crucifixion over the altar. On an eminence near the village are some remains of the church of Kildromin, founded by the Knights Templars in 1291.

LISTERLING, a parish, in the union of NEW ROSS, partly in the barony of KNOCKTOPHER, but chiefly in the barony of IDA, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Inistioge; containing 1565 inhabitants. The parish is intersected by the Argala, a small mountain river, and is only half a mile from the river Nore: it comprises 5432¾ statute acres, more than two-thirds of which are in pasture; the remainder, with the exception of a small portion of meadow, is under tillage. The soil is in general argillaceous, on a basis of brittle clay-slate, which is quarried on the lands of Listerling and Brownstown; and a vein has been discovered in the former towoland containing lead-ore, copper, and silver, but it has not been worked. In consequence of the small quantity of bog, the principal supply of fuel is obtained from the neighbouring parish of Burnchurch. The village, which contains 25 houses, is a station of the constabulary police; and fairs are held on Jan. 4th, May 6th, June 6th, Sept. 17th, Oct. 24th, and Dec. 5th. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Ossory, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £193. 17. The glebe-house was erected in 1821, by aid of a gift of £300 and a loan of £500 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe comprises 10¼ acres. The church was built in 1796, by aid of a gift of £500 from the same Board, and has been repaired by a grant of £207 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Rosbercon. There are several raths in different parts; and at Listerling is a mount surrounded by a fosse, from which the spot is supposed to derive its name, originally perhaps Lis-Easterling, or "the abode of the Ostmen;" near it has been found a small artificial cave, and it is traditionally stated that St. Mullen formerly resided at or near the moat.

LISTOWEL, a post-town and parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of IRAGHTICONNOR, county of KERRY, and province of MUNSTER, 17½ miles (N. E.) from Tralee, and 134 (S. W. by W.) from Dublin, on the road from Tralee to Tarbert; containing 5934 inhabitants. This place, according to some authorities, derives its name, originally Lis Tuathal, or "the castle of Tuathal," from Tuathal, one of the earliest kings of Ireland; and according to others, from an old Danish fort in the immediate vicinity of the town. The castle was the last that held out for Lord Kerry against the troops of Elizabeth during the Desmond insurrection; in 1600 it was assaulted and taken by Sir Charles Wilmot, who put all the garrison to the sword. Upon its surrender, the eldest son of Lord Kerry, then five years of age, was carried away privately by his nurse, who contrived to make her escape; but they were discovered in their retreat, and the child was sent by Sir Charles to the Lord-President. The TOWN is situated on the right bank of the river Feale, over which is a handsome stone bridge of five arches, each of 50 feet span: it consists of a spacious square, in the centre of which is the church, and of one principal street, from which some smaller streets branch off. The total number of houses, in 1841, was 407, many of them well built and of respectable appearance; several new houses have been recently built, and there are two good hotels. Fairs are held on alternate Wednesdays, and also on the 13th of May, July 25th, and Oct. 28th, chiefly for cattle, sheep, and pigs. Salmon is very plentiful. The river Cashen is navigable for boats of 15 tons' burthen within 2½ miles of the town; a canal with four locks would extend the navigation to the bridge. Behind the castle, on the river Feale, are extensive flour-mills producing annually about 8000 barrels; and there are smaller mills at Island Gariff, also on the Feale. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Tralee. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town; a manorial court is held by the seneschal of Listowel every third Tuesday, and petty-sessions every Thursday. There is a neat bridewell containing six cells, two day-rooms, and two yards; and it is in contemplation to erect a court-house.

The PARISH comprises 8302 statute acres; it is completely encircled by a large tract of bog and morass, which might easily be reclaimed by lowering the bar at the mouth of the river. The soil is remarkably fertile, and the neighbourhood celebrated for producing wheat of superior quality; the system of agriculture is greatly improved; and limestone is found in several parts, and quarried, chiefly for burning. The principal seats are Tullamore House, Gurtinard, Dromin House, Greenville, Bedford House, and Ennismore. Ballinruddery, the seat of the Right Hon. Maurice Fitzgerald, Knight of Kerry, is partly within this parish, but chiefly in that of Finuge, under which head it is described. A new road to Abbeyfeale and Newmarket was completed in 1829, under the superintendence of Mr. Griffith, the government engineer; it has been productive of great benefit to the district through which it passes, and, in conjunction with the government roads recently completed on the confines of the counties of Kerry, Cork, and Limerick, will contribute much to the improvement of this neighbourhood.

Listowel is a vicarage, in the diocese of Ardfert and Aghadoe, forming, with the vicarages of Lisseltin, Kilelehenny, Galey, Murhir, Kilnaughten, Dysart, Finuge, Knockanure, and Aghavallin, the union of Listowel: the rectory is impropriate in Thos. Anthony Stoughton, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £148. 3., one-half payable to the impropriator and the other to the vicar; and the entire rent-charge of the union, payable to the incumbent, is £581. 3. 5. There are several glebes in the union, but all in the possession of the impropriator. The church, which is the principal one in the union, is a handsome structure in the later English style, with a square tower surmounted by a neat spire, and is strengthened with buttresses terminating in pinnacles; it was erected by aid of a gift of £500 and a loan of £1000 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1819: the area surrounding the church is inclosed by a neat iron railing, and planted. There are churches at Lisseltin, Kilnaughten, and Aghavallin. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district comprising also portions of the parishes of Finuge, Galey, Dysart, Duagh, and Kilshinane: the chapel was built at an expense of £2000, on a site at the south-western angle of the square, given by the Earl of Listowel; it is a spacious cruciform structure, with a good portico, and the altar-piece is richly embellished. There is a dispensary in the town. The union workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £444, was completed in 1842, at a cost of £5980, and is constructed for 700 paupers.

Some very interesting portions still remain of the ancient castle, the front of which occupies part of the western side of the square and formerly extended to the river; the rear, which contained some noble apartments, was taken down several years since. The two square towers in the front are, near their summits, connected by an arch, which, from its great elevation, has a very imposing effect; and in the wall is a projecting stone with the remains of a sculptured face, supposed to have been a portrait of McElligot, the architect. The castle formerly belonged to the family of Fitzmaurice, of Duagh, to whose ancestors it was granted by Henry II., together with the lands of Lixnaw and Clanmaurice; the manorial rights were purchased from the Earl of Kerry by the father of the first earl of Listowel. The ruins of the old church, and the burial-ground, adjoin the Tarbert road, in the vicinity of the town.

LITTER, or CASTLEHYDE, a parish, partly in the barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, but chiefly in that of FERMOY, union of FERMOY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Fermoy, on the road to Mallow; containing 1951 inhabitants. This parish, anciently called Carrigneady, is situated on the river Blackwater, by which it is divided into two nearly equal parts; and comprises 5405 statute acres. The land is in general good, and chiefly under tillage: the state of agriculture has of late years been much improved, chiefly through the exertions of the family of Hyde; there is but little waste land, and no bog. A substratum of limestone extends to the north, and one of a brown or greyish kind of stone to the south, of the river; both are worked either for building or for repairing the roads, and the limestone is also extensively burnt for manure. On the south side of the Blackwater, is a flour-mill worked by a mountain stream which runs through a finely-wooded glen. A court for the manor of Castlehyde is occasionally held by the seneschal, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s., late currency. The principal seat is Castlehyde, a spacious and handsome mansion, beautifully situated on the northern margin of the Blackwater, in the midst of a highly picturesque and richly-wooded demesne extending on both sides of the river, of which it forms one of the most attractive scenes. Within the demesne (which spreads into the adjoining parish of Fermoy) are the ivied ruins of the ancient castle, which, at a former period, gave name to the parish; and the river was here formerly crossed by a wooden bridge, in lieu of which there is now a ferry a little to the east of its site. The other seats are Creg and Templenoe.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne: part of the rectory is in the gift of J. Hyde, Esq., the remainder being impropriate in John Nason, Esq.; the vicarage is in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £510. 15., of which £216 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent: there is no glebe-house or glebe. The church, a small but handsome structure with a tower and spire, stands in the demesne of Castlehyde, of which it is an interesting feature: it was built in 1812, on the site of the ancient edifice, partly at Mr. Hyde's expense, aided by a gift of £400 and a loan of £363 from the Board of First Fruits, and has since been much improved from a design by Mr. G. R. Pain, of Cork; the interior is embellished with a richly groined ceiling, and most of the windows are of stained glass. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish, with the exception of the village of Templenoe, which is within the district of Ballyhooley, forms part of the district of Fermoy. At Creg are the ruins of a castle said to have been built by the Condons, consisting of a lofty square tower, still nearly entire; and near the border of Killathy parish are the ruins of the castle of Bally-Mac Philip.

LITTERLUNA.—See LETTERLUNA.

LITTERMORE, an island, in the parish of KILLANIN, barony of MOYCULLEN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 24 miles (W. N. W.) from Galway, and on the western coast: the population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the eastern side of the bay of Kilkerrin, and at the extremity of that of Greatmans; and comprises about 500 acres, of which 80 consist of arable land, and the remainder of bog and pasturable mountain: the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fisheries. Here are a signal tower, and a coast-guard station belonging to the Galway district.

LITTERMULLIN, an island, in the parish of KILCUMMIN, barony of MOYCULLEN, union and county of GALWAY, and province of CONNAUGHT, 22 miles (W.) from Galway, and on the western coast: the population is returned with the parish. It forms one side of Kiegall bay, and its northern end part of the shore of Casheen bay; it comprises about 250 acres of arable and pasture land. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the herring and cod fisheries on this coast, and in the collection of sea-weed for manure; in which several boats are employed.

LITTLE ISLAND.—See BEG-ERIN.

LITTLE ISLAND, a parish and island, in the barony of BARRYMORE, union and county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Cork; containing 1069 inhabitants. It is situated on the estuary of the Lee, and comprises 1692 statute acres, chiefly under tillage and in a high state of cultivation; there is no waste land or bog. About 20 acres were lately reclaimed from the slab of the river by the Rev. R. Bury, and brought into cultivation. Limestone abounds, and is worked to a considerable extent for agricultural and building purposes, and as ballast for vessels sailing without cargoes from the port of Cork, for which latter purpose a contract has been entered into by Mr. J. Cantillon, jun., with the Ballast Board. The island is separated by a branch of the river Lee from the parish of Cahirlag, with which it communicates by a handsome causeway of hewn stone and a metal spring bridge, constructed in 1833 by Silver C. Oliver, Esq., for his own private use; a similar bridge was formed by the late Phineas Bury, Esq., also a private one. There is likewise a communication, farther eastward, by a bridge of old standing, for the use of the inhabitants.

Little Island is embellished with several handsome seats, the principal of which are, Wallingstown House, the residence of Phineas Bury, Esq., the principal proprietor, containing within the demesne the ruins of the ancient church (the island having been an ecclesiastical parish of itself, called Sancti Lappani de insula parva), and of the castle of Wallingstown; Sun Lodge, formerly the seat of the Right Hon. Silver Oliver, and now of his grandson, Silver Oliver, Esq.; Flaxforth; Rockfarm; Castleview; and Carrigrenan, situated on a small undulating peninsula tastefully laid out, and commanding a variety of interesting views of the river and its highly cultivated shores. The pure atmosphere, fertile soil, and sylvan scenery, have induced several wealthy individuals to settle on this beautiful island. It is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union of Rathcoony, formerly Cahirlag; the tithe rent-charge is £135. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Glauntane, or New Glanmire. The latter name, New Glanmire, is by some given to Glauntane, simply as more euphonious: it is derived from an Irish word signifying, the glen, mah, of the plain, d'ahoir, of the father, and referring to a Druidical settlement in which the river Glanmire springs; this name is suitable to Upper and Lower Glanmire, through which flows the beautiful river that gives them its name, but Glauntane is in no way connected with them. The only remains of antiquity are, the church, and the ruined tower of Wallingstown Castle, before mentioned; they are situated nearly adjoining each other under some aged trees, whose gloom finely contrasts with the verdure of the adjacent lawn and shrubbery.

LITTLETON, a post-town or village, in the parish of BORRISLEIGH, union of THURLES, barony of ELIOGARTY, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 4 miles (E.) from Thurles, and 79 (S.) from Dublin, on the road by Cashel to Cork; containing 80 houses, and 356 inhabitants. This place is of modern date, having been chiefly erected by the late Rev. Thomas Grady, who expended considerable sums on its buildings, and in the ornamental improvements of the vicinity. Here are a station of the constabulary police; a public dispensary; and the parochial church, a handsome structure with a tower and spire.

LIXNAW, or LISANAW, a village, partly in the parish of KILTORNEY or KILTOOMY, but chiefly in that of KILCARRAGH, union of LISTOWEL, barony of CLANMAURICE, county of KERRY, and province of LEINSTER, 5½ miles (S. W.) from Listowel, and near the high road from Tralee to Tarbert; containing 262 inhabitants. This place was once the seat of the earls of Kerry, by whom the castle of Lixnaw was erected; and the old bridge was built, and the town much improved, by Nicholas, the third baron of Lixnaw, so early as 1320. The castle was garrisoned in 1600 by Sir Charles Wilmot's forces, who took it by surprise just when it had been undermined for demolition: they made it the centre of operations in this district until it was taken by Lord Kerry, who here kept Sir Charles Wilmot's forces at bay, but at length entrusted its defence to his brother Gerald, who was compelled to surrender from want of water. The VILLAGE is situated near the river Brick, over which, at a short distance from each other, are two stone bridges; it consists of two streets of tolerably good houses, and contains a spacious Roman Catholic chapel, and a school supported by subscription. A court for the manor of Lixnaw is held every three weeks, on Monday, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40*s.* late currency. A patent exists for four fairs, but they are not at present held. Limestone of superior quality, in some places approaching to marble, is found in the vicinity, and worked both for useful and ornamental purposes; and sea-weed and sand for manure are brought in boats up the river Cashen, and thence by the Brick to the town. It is stated that these rivers might be made navigable for larger vessels at a very moderate expense; and Mr. Nimmo, the government engineer, many years since, suggested a plan for that purpose, and for draining and bringing into cultivation the extensive tracts of marsh and bog in the neighbourhood. The Roman Catholic district of Lixnaw comprises the parishes of Kilcarragh and Kiltoomy, and the greater portions of Dysert, Kilshinane, and Kilfeighny; and contains the chapels of Lixnaw or Ballinageragh, and Evimore. The former, which was erected in 1805, has a painting of the Crucifixion over the altar, executed in a superior style by an Italian artist. Adjoining the village are the ruins of a church, and the extensive remains of the ancient castellated mansion of the earls of Kerry; and on a mount at a short distance to the north-east is a monument, or mausoleum, of John, the third earl, of a circular form, resting on a square base and terminating in a dome; whence an extensive view of the surrounding country is obtained. Lixnaw gives the inferior title of Baron to the Marquess of Lansdowne.

LOBBINSTOWN.—See KILLEARY.

LOCKEEN, or LOUGHKEEN, also called LOUGHCAYNE, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of LOWER ORMOND, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3½ miles (S. W.) from Parsonstown, on the road to Nenagh; containing 3191 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Brosna, which forms the boundary between this and King's county; and comprises 10,661 statute acres: the greater portion of the land is arable, and the system of agriculture is improving, green crops being now partially cultivated. Limestone is found, adapted for building. At Carrig are flour-mills. The seats are Tinnakilly, Riverstown, Wingfield, Gurteen, Ivy Hall, Elm Hall, and Lacka. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory forms the corps of the prebend of Lockeen in the cathedral of Killaloe, also in the Bishop's patronage. The tithe rent-charge is £250, of which about two-thirds are payable to the prebendary, and one-third to the vicar. The glebe-house is a handsome building, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits gave £400, and lent £200, in 1829. The church, a neat edifice, was built by a gift of £900 from the same Board, in 1822. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Birr, or Parsonstown, and has a chapel at Carrig. At Glahaskeen are the ivied ruins of an old castle, and at Castletown those of another; there are also some remains of the old church.

LOGHAN, or LOUGHAN, a parish, in the union of KELLS, partly in the barony of CASTLERAHAN, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, but chiefly in the barony of UPPER KELLS, county of MEATH, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N. W.) from Kells, and on the road from Dublin by Kells to Enniskillen; containing 4495 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Castlekeiran and Tristelkerin, comprises 8727½ statute acres; contains the villages of Rathendrick, Derver, and Castlekeiran; and is situated on the river Blackwater, near its source in Lough Ramor. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, entirely impropriate in the Marquess of Headfort: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10. The impropriator allows £10 per annum to the curate of Mounterconnaught parish, for performing the occasional duties of that part of Loghan which lies in the county of Cavan, and of which the Protestant inhabitants attend Virginia church: those of the Meath portion attend the church of Kells. In the Roman Catholic divisions Loghan forms part of the district of Carnacross, or Dulane. On the banks of the river are the remains of a small church dedicated to St. Kieran, with a large and richly sculptured stone cross in the cemetery; here is also a holy well, much resorted to by the peasantry on the first Sunday in August.

LONDONDERRY (County of), a maritime county of the province of ULSTER, bounded on the south and south-west by the county of Tyrone; on the west, by that of Donegal; on the north-west, by Lough Foyle; on the north, by the Atlantic Ocean; and on the east, by the county of Antrim. It extends from 54° 37′ to 55° 12′ (N. Lat.), and from 6° 26′ to 7° 18′ (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of 518,595 statute acres, of which 318,282 are arable land, 180,709 uncultivated, 7718 plantation, 1559 in towns and villages, and 10,327 occupied by water. The population, in 1821, was 193,869; in 1831, 222,012; and in 1841, 222,174.

The river Foyle appears to have been the Argita, and the Bann the Logia, of Ptolemy; and the intervening territory, constituting the present county of Londonderry, formed, according to this geographer, part of the country of the Darnii or Darini, whose name appears to be perpetuated in the modern designation of "Derry." The earliest internal evidence represents the district as being chiefly the territory of the O'Cathans, O'Catrans, or O'Kanes, under the name of Tir Cahan or Cathan-aght, signifying "O'Kane's country:" they were a branch of, and tributary to, the O'Nials, and their chief seat was at a place now called the Deer Park, in the vale of the Roe. When their country was reduced to shire ground by Sir John Perrot, in the reign of Elizabeth, it was intended that Coleraine should be the capital; and the county was therefore designated, and long bore the name of, "the county of Coleraine," although the ruins of the court-house and gaol then built for the county are at Desertmartin, 15 miles from the proposed capital. Derry was seized by the English towards the close of Elizabeth's reign, for the purpose of checking the power of O'Nial and O'Donnel; and when the earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel fled the country, in 1607, nearly the whole of six counties in Ulster were confiscated. At this period the southern side of the county appears to have been possessed by the O'Donnels, O'Conors, and O'Murrys: the O'Cahans were not among the attainted septs, and consequently, in the ensuing schemes of plantation, many of them were settled among the native freeholders by James I., though they afterwards forfeited their estates in the subsequent civil war.

King James, conceiving the citizens of London to be the ablest body to undertake the establishment of a Protestant colony in the forfeited territory, directed overtures to be made to the municipal authorities; and on Jan. 28th, 1609, articles of agreement were entered into between the Lords of the Privy Council and the Committees appointed by act of Common-Council. On the part of the citizens it was stipulated, that they should expend £20,000 on the plantation; while on the other hand, the crown was to assign to them entire possession of the county of Coleraine, and the towns of Coleraine and Derry, with extensive lands attached; excepting 60 acres out of every 1000 for church lands, and certain portions to be assigned to three native Irish gentlemen. To this extensive grant the king added the woods of Glenconkeine and Killetragh, and he ordained that the whole should be held with the amplest powers and privileges, such as the patronage of the churches, admiralty jurisdiction on the coasts, the fishery of the two great rivers and all other streams, &c. For the management of this new branch of their affairs, the Common-Council elected a body of twenty-six, consisting, as at present, of a governor, deputy-governor, and assistants; one-half of these retire every year, and their places are supplied by a new election. This company or court was incorporated in 1613, by royal charter, under its present style of "The Society of the Governor and Assistants of London, of the New Plantation in Ulster, within the Realm of Ireland;" but is commonly known as the "Irish Society;" and was invested with all the towns, castles, lordships, manors, lands, and hereditaments given to the city, which were erected by the charter into a distinct county, to be called "the County of Londonderry."

The sum of £40,000 having now been expended on the plantation, it was deemed most advantageous to divide the territorial possessions of the Society into twelve equal portions, which were appropriated by lot to each of the twelve chief companies of the city; and so many of the smaller companies joined as made by their total contributions a twelfth of the entire sum. The twelve chief companies were the Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant-Tailors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers; and in their respective proportions is now included the chief part of the county. The houses and lands in the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine, with their woods, fisheries, and ferries (except the ferry at the estuary of the Foyle, connecting the county with that of Donegal, which belonged to the Chichesters), not being susceptible of division, were retained by the Society, who were to receive the profits, and account for them to the twelve chief companies. In 1616, information was received by Sir Thomas Philips, of Newtown-Limavady, of a design formed by the Irish to surprise Londonderry and Coleraine, which being made known to the Irish government, effectual measures were adopted for its prevention. On the communication of the intelligence to the Irish Society, instructions were immediately issued by it to the twelve companies to furnish arms and accoutrements to be transmitted by the keeper of Guildhall for the better defence of the plantation; the prompt execution of which, preserved the colony, and gave new vigour to the exertions to stock it with English and Scotch settlers. About the same period, directions were issued to the companies to repair the churches, to furnish each of the ministers with a Bible, common-prayer book, and communion-cup, and to send thither a stipulated number of artizans; the trades thus introduced were those of weavers, hat-makers, locksmiths, farriers, tanners, fellmongers, ironmongers, glassblowers, pewterers, fishermen, turners, basketmakers, tallowchandlers, dyers, and curriers. The Salters' Company erected glass-houses at Magherafelt; and iron-works were opened on the Mercers' proportion, near Kilrea, which were carried on until timber failed for fuel.

Notwithstanding the disbursement of large sums of money, at length amounting to £60,000, continued dissatisfaction was expressed by the crown at the mode in which the stipulations of the society were fulfilled: in 1632, the whole county was sequestrated; and in 1637, the charter was cancelled, and the county seized into the king's hands. Parliament, however, decreed the illegality of these proceedings; Cromwell restored the society to its former state; and on the Restoration, Charles II. granted it a new charter, nearly in the same words as that of King James, under which its affairs have ever since been conducted. Of the twelve principal companies, all retain their estates except four, viz., the Goldsmiths, Haberdashers, Vintners, and Merchant-Tailors, who at various periods disposed of their proportions to private individuals. The Goldsmiths' share was situated mostly within the liberties of Derry, south-east of the Foyle; that of the Haberdashers was around Aghanloo and Bovevagh. The Vintners had Bellaghy, and the Merchant-Tailors' proportion was Macosquin. These proportions are now held in perpetuity by the Marquess of Waterford, the Richardsons, the Ponsonbys, the Alexanders, and the heirs of the late Right Hon. Thomas Conolly. Of the estates belonging to the other eight companies, the Mercers have Kilrea and its neighbourhood; the Grocers, Muff and its dependencies: Moneymore, and its rich and improved district, belong to the Drapers; the Fishmongers have Ballykelly; Dungiven belongs to the Skinners; Magherafelt to the Salters; Aghadowey to the Ironmongers; and Killowen, forming part of the borough of Coleraine, to the Clothworkers. All are under lease, except those of the Drapers, Mercers, and Grocers, which are managed by agents, deputed by the respective companies. The first intimation of the intended insurrection in 1641 came from Moneymore, in this county, through Owen O'Conolly, an Irish Protestant, in time to save Dublin, but not to prevent the explosion of the plot in the north. On the first day of the explosion, Moneymore was seized by the Irish; and Maghera, and Bellaghy, then called Vintners'-town, were burned, as were most of the other towns and villages throughout the county. On the termination of the war, the county and the city fell under the dominion of the parliament, and Sir Charles Coote and Governor Hunks ruled here with great severity. From the Restoration to the Revolution, the county affords few materials for history; the siege of Londonderry, one of the most striking events of the latter period, properly belongs to the history of the city.

The county is chiefly in the diocese of Derry, with some portions in those of Armagh and Connor. For the purposes of CIVIL JURISDICTION it is divided into the city and liberties of Londonderry, the town and liberties of Coleraine, and the baronies of Coleraine, Tirkeeran, Kenaught, and Loughinsholin. It contains the city of Londonderry; the borough and market town of Coleraine; the disfranchised borough, market, and post town of Newtown-Limavady; the market and post towns of Castle Dawson, Dungiven, Draperstown-Cross, Moneymore, Garvagh, Magherafelt, and Maghera; and the post-towns of Bellaghy, Kilrea, and Tubbermore. The principal villages are Articlave, Ballykelly, Claudy, Muff, Port-Stewart (each of which has a sub-post), Ballyronan, Desertmartin, and Swattragh. It sent eight members to the Irish parliament; two for the county, two for the city, and two each for the boroughs of Coleraine and Newtown-Limavady. Since the Union it has sent only four to the Imperial parliament, namely, two for the county, one for the city, and one for the borough of Coleraine; those for the city and county are elected in the city of Londonderry. The county constituency, as registered in 1841, amounted to 1718, of whom 1212 were freeholders, 494 leaseholders, and 12 rent-chargers. Londonderry is included in the North-West circuit: the assizes are held in the city; and quarter-sessions are held there, and at Coleraine, Newtown-Limavady, and Magherafelt. The county gaol and court-house are in Londonderry, and there are court-houses and bridewells at each of the other sessions towns. The local government is vested in 20 deputy-lieutenants, and 62 other magistrates; besides whom there are the usual county officers, including three coroners. Of its civil jurisdiction it is remarkable that, like the county of Middlesex, its sheriffs were till lately those elected by the citizens of its capital, who served for the whole, excepting the liberties of Coleraine: the town-clerk of Londonderry, also, is the clerk of the peace for the county at large. There are 19 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, 4 sub-inspectors, 5 head-constables, 10 constables, and 80 sub-constables, with six horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £5071, defrayed by grand-jury presentments and by government. The District Lunatic Asylum, and County Infirmary, are in the city of Londonderry; and there are dispensaries at Londonderry, Bellaghy, Tamlaght O'Crilly, Port-Stewart, Dungiven, Magherafelt, Maghera, Glendermot, Lower Cumber, Newtown-Limavady, Coleraine, Upper Cumber, Agherton, Ballykelly, Banagher, Claudy, Muff, Magilligan, Moneymore, Aghadowey, Ballynascreen, and Garvagh, which are supported equally by grand jury presentments, and by subscriptions from the Irish Society, the London companies, the landed proprietors, and other private individuals. For the convenience of holding petty-sessions, the county is divided into the districts of Coleraine, Garvagh, Iunisrush, Maghera, Moneymore, Magherafelt, Kilrea, Inver, city of Londonderry, Newtown-Limavady, Muff, Dungiven, and Claudy. The amount of grand jury presentments for the county and city, for the year 1844, was £32,943. In the military arrangements the county is in the Belfast district.

In shape the county approaches to an equilateral triangle: its greatest length is from the point of Magilligan, at the mouth of Lough Foyle, nearly southward, to the vicinity of Coagh, a distance of $32\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Although by no means distinguished for picturesque beauty, its surface presents many varieties of form, from the flat alluvial lands along its rivers to the wildest MOUNTAINS. The latter form its central portion, extending in various chains, covered chiefly with heath, from near the sea-coast to the southern limit. Sawel mountain, in the south, attains an elevation of 2236 feet: Slieve-Gallion rises to the height of 1730 feet; Carntogher, near the source of the Roe, 1521 feet; Donald's Hill, east of the same river, 1315 feet; Benyevenagh, forming the termination of that range towards the sea, 1260 feet; and Legavannon, between the Roe and the Faughan, 1289 feet. Even in these wild regions there are secluded vales, called by the inhabitants "slacks," in which are often found charming spots of fertile soil and romantic scenery. The principal of these are, Faughanvale, where are some good waterfalls; Muff-glen, which, with the beautiful glen of the Ness, affords mountain passes from the Foyle to the Faughan; Laughermore, between the Roe and the Faughan, which commands various fine prospects, and has in its vicinity numerous traces of ancient forests; Lissane, with some deep romantic glens; Feeny, between the higher parts of the Roe and the Faughan, into which several other glens open, the most beautiful being Fin-glen; the neighbouring slacks of Moneyniceny and Carntogher; that of Ballyness, leading into the wild district of Glenullen; that of Dunmore, between Coleraine and Newtown-Limavady; and that of Druimna-Gullion, to the north. The most extensive and diversified view in this part of Ireland, is from the summit of Benyevenagh, near the mouth of the Roe, from which mountain the huge masses of fallen strata form successive terraces descending to the sandy flats bounded by Lough Foyle and the ocean.

The great natural divisions of the PROFITABLE LANDS are the rich and fertile vales of the Roe, the Faughan, the Foyle (with the liberties of Londonderry), and the Moyola; the shores of Lough Neagh; the half valley of the Bann (with the liberties of Coleraine); and the sea-coast, with the flats of Lough Foyle. The longest of the vales opening from the mountains is that of the Roe, environed by hills appropriated as sheep-walks, and in many places having midway up their declivities a sort of natural terrace, frequently two or three hundred yards in breadth. To the west is the nearly parallel vale of Faughan, which, next to those of the Roe and the Moyola, displays (from Clondermot to the coast of Lough Foyle) one of the most delightful tracts in the county; a considerable portion, however, is occupied by rough though valuable turbaries, while other parts are clothed with natural wood: in the higher part the scenery is frequently romantic, and in other places is improved by round alluvial hills. The vale of the Foyle is highly improved, and comprises the western extremity of the county, in which stands the city of Londonderry. The vale of Moyola extends from the eastern side of the mountains of Ballynascreen, towards Lough Neagh, being bounded on the south by Slieve-Gallion. The borders of Lough Neagh form a low tract which presents a rich landscape, its surface being composed partly of gentle swells, and its fertility broken only by some extensive bogs. Around Ballinderry are considerable steeps, and at Spring Hill and over the town of Moneymore is a beautiful range of high land: beyond this, extends a low tract called "the Golden Vale of Ballydawley." Lough Neagh bounds the county for nearly six miles, when the Bann, issuing from it, immediately falls into Lough Beg, the Londonderry shore of which is five miles in extent. The half valley of the Bann is composed of bleak ridges or tummocks of basalt, with a few more favoured spots near the streams, but accompanied by a series of scattered bogs, bordering the course of the river. These sometimes comprise high and barren swells, with lakes and small bogs intervening. About Tubbermore, Fort-William, and Maghera, however, is a pleasing and more fertile tract; and the interior of the district bordering on the Bann is greatly enlivened by the woody scenery around Garvagh. The Sea-coast, formed by the Atlantic for 12 miles from Portrush to Magilligan Point, and thence for 16 miles by Lough Foyle, exhibits a succession of varied and interesting scenery. Commencing with Portrush it presents a number of creeks and inlets, of which the most remarkable is Port-Stewart, whence to the mouth of the Bann is a strand of great extent and beauty, succeeded by a range of cliffs rising boldly from the sea, on the summit of one of which are the mansion of Down Hill and the Mussenden Temple, built by the Earl of Bristol, Bishop of Derry. From Down Hill to Magilligan Point, a distance of 7 miles, is a strand extending a mile in breadth from the base of the mountains to the water's edge, and on which the whole army of Great Britain might be reviewed. Thence the coast turns nearly due south to the mouth of the Roe, presenting a dreary expanse in which are seen only a deserted house half covered by drifted sand, and a martello tower; after which, a varied tract of highly improved land continues to the mouth of Londonderry harbour.

The SOIL is of great variety. The vale of the Roe chiefly consists of gravelly loams of different degrees of fertility; the levels on the banks of the river are very rich, and though the higher grounds are sometimes intermingled with cold clays, there is scarcely any unproductive land in the vale. In the vale of Fanghan, good loams are found in the lowest situations: Bond's glen, which joins it, and rests on a limestone base, is one of the most fertile spots in the county. The valley of the Foyle is also a strong loam below, declining in fertility and depth towards the heights. In the vale of Moyola are levels of the richest quality, but liable to great ravages by floods. In the district bordering on Loughs Neagh and Beg are found sharp gravelly soils of decayed granite, with some moorland, and then extensive swells of sandy loam with intervening flats of great fertility and some bog. Along the sea-coast the soil is an intermixture of silicious and calcareous sand, occasionally covered with peat. At the mouth of the Bann these sands form hillocks, kept from shifting by the roots of bent-grass, and available only as rabbit-warrens: nearly the whole of Magilligan strand is warren, followed by sandy hills covered with bent, and extensive tracts of bog. Beyond Walworth, along the shores of Lough Foyle, the beach is covered with herbage, forming salt marshes greatly esteemed for grazing horses. [Lough Foyle is a large gulf, which, communicating with the Atlantic by a very narrow mouth, opens into a fine expanse, extending 15 miles into the country to the city of Londonderry, and being 7 miles across where broadest. Though there are shifting sand banks in some parts, the largest vessel may ride in safety in it in all weathers.] The principal part of the mountain soils is based on basalt, generally presenting nothing to the view but bleak knolls rising out of the bog and covered with heath or marshy plants. In some more favoured situations the soil, though poor and loose, produces herbage greedily depastured by sheep; and in the slacks or glens are found loams of better quality, varying in texture according to the soil of the hills from which they have been deposited.

The fertile soils are chiefly under TILLAGE, in farms varying in size from 2 to 200 acres and averaging eight acres. Though wheat is cultivated on some of the richest soils, barley is grown to a far more considerable extent, especially in the districts bordering on Lough Neagh, and around Myroe and Coleraine; the other crops most extensively raised are oats, potatoes, and flax: barley is said to pay the summer's rent and flax the winter's. Beans were formerly grown in vast quantities in Aghanloo and Myroe, and rye in some of the lower districts; but both are now uncommon. Four kinds of wheat, red, white, plain, and bearded, are sown: the produce of wheat varies from twelve to twenty barrels per acre; of barley, which is all of the four-rowed kind, called bere or Scotch barley, from eight to fourteen barrels of 21 stone (one-half more than the wheat measure); and of oats, of which the brown Poland, lightfoot, blantire, and potato-oat are commonly sown, from 30 to 70 bushels per acre. Potatoes yield from 200 to 800 bushels per acre. An acre of good flax will produce twelve stooks, each yielding seventy-two pounds of clean scutched flax; but the common produce is one-third less. Turnips are grown by all the gentry and leading farmers, and mangel-wurzel is a favourite crop with some; but its cultivation is yet imperfectly understood. The principal artificial grass in the county is clover, to which the annual and perennial ray are sometimes added: the seeds, when employed, are generally sown as the last crop of a course; but the common farmers seldom sow any, trusting to the powers of the soil and the humidity of the climate to restore the herbage. The prevailing kind in marshy situations is the fiorin, or jointed grass, which produces crops of amazing weight and good quality.

Of manures, lime, which can be procured in almost every part of the county, is in most extensive use, that of Desertmartin being esteemed the best; the contiguous marl is also used, especially at Cruintballyguillen, or the Leck. In the maritime districts, and from six to ten miles inland, a favourite manure is sea-shells brought by boats from islands in Lough Foyle: the shells are chiefly oyster, muscle, and cockle; from 30 to 60 barrels are spread on an acre. Shelly sand is also gathered from the coast, and from the shores of the Bann: trenching and throwing the mould on an unturned ridge, and the burning of peat for the ashes, are likewise practised. The breeds of cattle of every kind are much improved by judicious crossing. Derry not being a sheep-feeding county, the attention of the farmers has been less turned to this species of stock; yet some of the gentry have large flocks. Pigs are to be found in almost every house and cottage; they are usually slaughtered at home, and the careasses sent to market for the supply of the provision-merchants of Belfast, Londonderry, and Coleraine. Of the horses, one breed is the active, hardy, mountain garran, of a bay or sorrel colour, and slight make: the Scottish Highland horses are likewise in great request, and, together with a cross with the sinewy draught-horse, are in common use. A cross with the blood-horse has also been introduced. Myroe is famous for good cattle. All the improved agricultural implements are in general use; the advances made in every department of rural economy have been considerably promoted by the exertions of the North-West Farming Society, which holds its meetings in Londonderry and receives an annual donation of ten guineas from the Irish Society of London. Among wild-fowl, one species is very remarkable, the barnacle, which frequents Lough Foyle in great numbers, and is much esteemed for the sweetness of its flesh, as at Wexford and Strangford, though elsewhere rank and unsavoury: the difference here arises from its feeding on the fucus saccharinus. The ancient abundance of timber is evinced both by tradition and public documents; also by the abundance of pine found in all the bogs, of yew at Magilligan, and of fossil oak and fir in the mosses, even in the most exposed situations: but the woods have been wholly demolished by the policy of clearing the country, the lavish waste of fuel, the destruction made by exporting staves (once the staple of the county), and the demand for charcoal for smelting lead and iron. Coal, chiefly from Lancashire, is the principal fuel of the respectable classes in Londonderry and its vicinity; English, Scotch, and Ballycastle coals are used at Coleraine. But almost the universal fuel of the county is turf; in the fertile and thickly inhabited districts many of the bogs are exhausted, and recourse has been had to those of the mountains.

Geologically, the county is composed of two great districts, divided into two nearly equal portions by the course of the Roe. The western is the extensive mountain tract reaching from that river to Strabane, in which mica-slate predominates in such proportions as to compose nine-tenths of the whole; it is accompanied by primitive limestone in the lower districts, especially in those bordering on the vale of the Roe. On the eastern bank of the river this system of mountains is succeeded by a range of secondary heights, reposing on and concealing the mica-slate, which dips under them eastward. On these is piled a vast area of basalt, forming the basis of almost the entire country between the Roe and the Bann. These basaltic strata dip with the fall of the hills towards the north-east, to meet the opposite dip of the strata on the other side of the Bann, forming the other half of this extensive basaltic tract. The covering of basalt appears to acquire its greatest thickness on the north, where, as in the cap of Benyevenagh, it is more than 900 feet thick. Between the basalt and the subjacent mica-slate, are found, in close succession, many of the most important formations which occupy a great part of the southern and eastern counties of England. Next to the basalt (descending westward towards Lough Foyle and the vale of the Roe, and to the rich lands in the vale of Moyola and its vicinity) is found chalk, in beds of an aggregate thickness of about 200 feet, analogous to the lower beds of the English chalk formation, and therefore approaching in character to white limestone, being used and commonly designated as such. Even in its fossils and organic remains, this chalk is perfectly identified with that of England. Next is seen mulatto, precisely analogous to the green sandstone formations of England: the mulatto rests immediately on a lias limestone, blue and argillaceous, disposed in small beds alternating with slate-clay, and distinguished by ammonites, gryphites, and other fossil remains. The lias, in turn, reposes, as in England, on beds of red and variegated marl, containing gypsum, and even distinguished by numerous salt springs; and this marl is underlaid by a thick deposit of red and variegated sandstone, containing clay galls, and incumbent on the mica-slate formation. Sometimes, however, the mulatto and lias are entirely wanting; and the chalk may be seen immediately resting on the sandstone, both of which are constant and continuous. The deep valleys separating the detached eminences of the basalt region, afford abundant evidence of their formation in excavations of part of the solid strata by some vast convulsions or operations of nature. North-east of the source of the Roe is a small detached district of mica-slate, nearly surrounded by the basaltic ridges of Benbradagh and Cragnashoack, and forming the entire mass of the mountain of Coolcoscrahan. The mountain limestone, which is micaceous and granular, occurs to the most remarkable extent on the north-west side of Carntogher mountain, in Bennady glen, near the old church at Dungiven, at Banagher, near Claudy, near Newtown-Limavady, and on Slieve-Gallion mountain, where it contains crystallised hornblende in abundance. Hornblende slate occurs in Bennady glen, Aglish glen, and the bed of the Roe river near Dungiven, where it is contiguous to the primitive limestone. Porphyry is the fundamental rock on the east side of Slieve-Gallion, and one variety resembles sienite, with which it is in connexion. Transition trap also occurs on Slieve-Gallion.

The transition limestone, intervening in a few places between the primitive formations and the sandstone, is of the same kind as that which occupies so great a portion of the central counties: it is of a smoke-grey colour, and contains two sorts of terebratulites, and nodules of glassy quartz, which render it dangerous to blast; but being, nevertheless, the best species in the county for manure and all ordinary purposes, it is most extensively quarried. The sandstone extends the entire length of the county, from its northern extremity near Down hill up the eastern side of the Roe, and surrounding Cragnashoack and Carntogher mountains, whence it stretches by the eastern declivity of Slieve-Gallion into the county of Tyrone. The upper strata of chalk are characterised by parallel beds of flinty nodules; and, at their junction with the basalt, these flints are found imbedded in the lowest member of the trap deposit: it is curiously affected by intersecting dykes filled with basalt. The only great geological phenomenon exhibited on the sea-coast is the gradual emergence of the chalk from under the trap beds. The basalt is chiefly tabular, with the varieties called greenstone, amygdaloidal wacké, &c. A laminated schist of the mica-slate formation is quarried between Derry and Newtown; there is a good quarry of lamellated schist between Bond's glen and Gossaden; gneiss occurs in the quarries of the mica-slate near the Faughan river; granite on the northern summit of Slieve-Gallion: the finest rock-crystals are to be met with in Finglen, Dungiven, Banagher, and in the primitive mountains near Learmount; and steatite is found in the basaltic region. Iron is disseminated through many of the strata of the county, and in the basalt is sometimes so abundant as to affect the needle. Ironstone, which exists in great abundance in Slieve-Gallion, was formerly worked, but the undertaking was abandoned on the failure of fuel. The metal is found in a mixed state with manganese; and in the mountain streams, mounds of it are observed in the character of yellow ochre. To the abundance of this metal in the peat-moss are owing the red colour and weight of the ashes. Coal, copper, and lead have been discovered in very small quantities.

The staple MANUFACTURE is that of linen, of which the raw material is grown here, chiefly from American and Riga seed, though partly from Dutch, which is most esteemed. The flax is spun by the rural population, and the weavers themselves are husbandmen; so that during seed-time and harvest the loom is abandoned. The flax is generally spun from three to four hanks in the pound weight, and the tow yarn is made into sacking for home use; the coarser yarn is mostly carried to Londonderry to be exported to Liverpool for Manchester, and to Scotland, the finer being disposed of at Coleraine, Newtown, &c. The fabric made in Coleraine is the finest, and all webs of the same texture, wherever manufactured, are called Coleraines. The fabrics of Londonderry are of two kinds; one only twenty-seven inches wide, and called Derry wrappers; the other thirty-two inches wide, and made of fine yarn. Considerable quantities of linen are exported unbleached; the coarse chiefly to Liverpool. The white linens are shipped from Londonderry or Coleraine to Liverpool or London. Coarse red pottery is made at Agivey, and at some other places; there are several distilleries and breweries, and numerous corn and flour mills. The coast abounds throughout with all the ordinary kinds of fish, which are taken for home consumption; but the principal fisheries are those of salmon and eels in the Bann, which are superior in extent to any others in Ireland, employing a great number of persons: almost the entire produce of salmon is exported. There are several other considerable fisheries along the sea-coast, and in the small rivers; but most of the salmon brought to the provincial markets comes from a distance of several miles, and is much inferior to that of the Bann. The commerce of the county centres in the city of Londonderry and the town of Coleraine, but chiefly the former. At Ballyronan, on Lough Neagh, vessels of sixty tons' burthen can unlade; and, though the exports are inconsiderable, timber, iron, slates, coal, flax-seed, hardware, and groceries are landed in large quantities.

The principal RIVERS are the Foyle, the Bann, the Roe, and the Faughan. The Foyle, which derives its name from the smoothness of its current, intersects the liberties of the city of Londonderry, in a majestic course north-eastward, having descended from Lifford, where, after the union of several important streams, it first obtains its name: at Culmore, six miles below the city, which it appears formerly to have insulated, it expands into the estuary of Lough Foyle. The Bann, or "White River," so called from the purity of its waters, intersects the liberties of Coleraine, within four miles of its junction with the ocean; but the navigation is greatly obstructed by shallows and a very dangerous bar, where the currents of the fresh water and the tide meet. The Roe, or "Red River," so called from the colour of its waters, receives at Dungiven the Owen-Reagh: in its course directly north, it is joined from the mountains on each side, by the Owen-Beg, the Gelvin-water, the Balteagh river, and the Castle and Curley rivers; and winding through the fertile flat by Newtown-Limavady, it falls into Lough Foyle at Myroe. The level country bordering the lower part of its course, is exposed to sudden and impetuous floods poured down from the surrounding mountains; many acres of the finest lands are with difficulty defended by embankments, and even with this protection the securing of the crop is never a matter of certainty. The deposits brought down by this river form many shifting banks in the lough, which prevent its mouth from becoming a convenient little port, although there is sufficient depth of water at high tides. The Faughan in its course receives many rills and streams from the heights, and falls into Lough Foyle; The Moyola is a considerable stream descending into Lough Neagh. The principal tributaries of the Bann are the Claudy, Agivey, and Macosquin streams. The roads are numerous and highly important: several very useful lines have been made, and others greatly improved, solely at the expense of the Drapers' Company; all the other roads are kept in repair by grand jury presentments.

In the original plantation of the county in 1609, and the subsequent years, the English settlers were located in the fertile tracts along the borders of Loughs Foyle and Neagh, and the banks of the Roe and Bann; the Scotch were placed in the higher lands as a kind of military barrier between their more favoured brethren of the south country and the Irish, who, with the exception of a few native freeholders, were removed to the mountain districts. The varieties of religion corresponded with those of country, the English being Protestants of the Established Church; the Scotch, Presbyterians, or other sects of Protestant dissenters; and the Irish, Roman Catholics. This arrangement of severance long prevented, and still in some degree continues to prevent, the amalgamation of the several classes. The Irish, shut up within their secluded mountain ravines, retain many of their peculiarities of language, customs, and religion; those of Glenullin, though near a large Protestant settlement at Garvagh, will admit none but members of their own church to reside among them, though in other respects they are on terms of great kindliness with their neighbours of a different creed, except when under the excitation of party animosity. The residences of many respectable gentlemen are in the cottage style, generally ornamented and surrounded with planting and gardens: the habitations of the rural population are of every description, from the slated two-story house of brick or stone, and the long narrow cottage with two or three partitions, to the cabin of dry stone or clay, without even a window. In the districts of Coleraine and Desertmartin, where lime is plentiful, the dwellings of the peasantry are neatly white-washed, and sometimes rough-cast; but in other parts they present a very sombre appearance.

Remains of its ancient inhabitants of every period are scattered over the county. There is a cromlech at Slaght-Manus, another at Letter-Shandenny, a third at Slaghtaverty, and others at Bally-na-screen: some were originally surrounded by a circle of upright stones. There are remains of sepulchral mounts or tumuli at Mullagh-cross, and a vast tumulus is seen at Dovine, between Newtown-Limavady and Coleraine; besides several of smaller dimensions. Numerous cairns are met with in every quarter, especially on the summits of the mountains. Near Dungiven is a very remarkable sepulchral pillar. Raths or Danish forts are likewise scattered, in chains, in every direction, each being generally within sight of two others: the most remarkable is that called the Giant's Sconce, anciently commanding the communication between the districts of Newtown and Coleraine. Ditches, inclosing spaces of from half a rood to several acres, are discernible contiguous to these forts. There is a curious mound surrounded with a moat on the road from Springhill to Lough Neagh; and another, of larger size, at Dungorkin, on the road from Cumber-Claudy through Loughermore. Ancient intrenchments of different character are seen at Prospect, and between Gortnagasan and Cathery. Various coins, pins, rings, and forks have been found about a moat near Lough Neagh; and, among other ancient instruments, quern-stones have often been discovered. Hatchets made of hard basalt, spears of grey granite, and barbed arrow-heads of flint (the last sometimes neatly executed, and vulgarly called elf-stones), are very frequently found. Sometimes gold and silver coins, fibulæ, and gorgets, with other ornaments, are dug up; but these are rare. There are many artificial caverns, which seem to have been designed for the concealment of goods, or for the refuge of families in case of sudden attack: the sides are built of common land stones without cement, and the roof is composed of flags, or long stones; but the vault is seldom high enough for the passage of a man in a stooping posture. They consist sometimes of different galleries, and the mouth was usually concealed by a rock or grassy sod.

Besides the remains of monastic institutions in the city of Londonderry, seventeen others appear to have existed within the limits of the county; there are still remains of those situated respectively at Camus, Errigal, Tamlaghtfinlagan, Domnach-Dola, and Dungiven, at the last of which are the most interesting of all the ecclesiastical ruins. Near the old church of Banagher, also, is a monastic building almost entire. There are a few castles of Irish erection: Bally-reagh, on a rocky cliff overhanging the sea, is said to have belonged to one of the Mac Quillans; and a castle which stood near the church of Ballyaghran is reported to have been the abode of the chief of that sept. Several English castles, with bawns and flankers, were built by the London companies, one at least in every proportion of allotment; but they are all in ruins except Bellaghy, which is still occupied.

LONDONDERRY, a city and port, and the head of a union, partly in the parish of Glendermot, but chiefly in the parish of Templemore, county of Londonderry (of which it is the chief town), and province of Ulster, 69¾ miles (N. W. by W.) from Belfast, and 118½ (N. N. W.) from Dublin; containing 15,150 inhabitants. It was originally and is still popularly called Derry, from the Irish Doire, which signifies literally "a place of oaks," but is likewise used to express "a thick wood." By the ancient Irish it was also designated Doire-Calgaich, or Derry-Calgach, "the oak wood of Calgach;" and Adamnan, abbot of Iona in the 7th century, in the life of his predecessor, St. Columbkill, invariably calls it Roboretum Calgagi. About the end of the 10th century, the name Derry-Calgach gave place to Derry-Columbkill, from an abbey for Canons Regular of the order of St. Augustine founded here by that saint; but when the place grew into importance above every other Derry, the distinguishing epithet was rejected: the English prefix, London, was imposed in 1613, on the incorporation of the Irish Society by charter of James I., and was for a long time retained by the colonists, but has likewise fallen into popular disuse. The city appears to be indebted for its origin to the abbey founded by St. Columbkill, according to the best authorities in 546, and said to have been the first of the religious houses instituted by that saint; but the exact period of its foundation, and its early history, are involved in much obscurity. In 783 and 812 the abbey and the town were destroyed by fire; at the latter period, according to the Annals of Munster, the Danes heightened the horrors of the conflagration by a massacre of the clergy and students. The place must have been speedily restored, as, in 832, the Danes were driven with great slaughter from the siege of Derry by Niall Caille, King of Ireland, and Murchadh, Prince of Aileach. In 983, the shrine of St. Columbkill was carried away by the Danes, by whom the place was also thrice devastated about the close of the 10th century: in 1095 the abbey was consumed by fire. In 1100 Murtagh O'Brien arrived with a large fleet of foreign vessels, and attacked Derry, but was defeated with great slaughter by the son of Mac Loughlin, Prince of Aileach. Ardgar, Prince of Aileach, was slain in an assault upon Derry in 1124; and on the 30th of March, 1135, the town with its churches was destroyed by fire, in revenge, as some state, of his death: it sustained a similar calamity in 1149. In 1158, Flahertagh O'Brolchain, abbot of the Augustine monastery, was raised to the episcopacy, and appointed supreme superintendent of all the abbeys under the rule of St. Columb, by a synodical decree of the Irish clergy assembled at Brigh-mac-Taidhg, in the north of Meath. O'Brolchain immediately commenced preparations for the erection of a new church on a larger scale; and in 1162 he removed more than 80 houses adjacent to the abbey church, and inclosed the abbey with a circular wall. In 1164 Temple More, or "the great church," was built, and the original abbey church was thenceforward distinguished as Duv Regles, or "the Black Church:" the new edifice was 240 feet long, and was one of the most splendid ecclesiastical structures erected in Ireland prior to the settlement of the Anglo-Normans; its site was near the Black Church, outside the present city wall, and is now chiefly occupied by the Roman Catholic chapel and cemetery. Both edifices were entirely demolished by Sir Henry Docwra, governor of Derry, in 1600, and the materials used in the erection of the extensive works constructed at that period; but the belfry or round tower of the cathedral served till after the celebrated siege, and has given name to a lane called the Long Tower.

In 1166 a considerable part of the town was burned by Rory O'Morna; and in 1195 the abbey was plundered by an English force, which was afterwards intercepted and destroyed at Armagh. In 1197, a large body of English forces, having set out from the castle of Kill-Sanctain, on a predatory excursion, came to Derry and plundered several churches; but were overtaken by Flahertach O'Maoldoraidh, lord of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, and some of the northern Hy-Niall; and a battle ensued on the shore of the adjoining parish of Faughanvale, in which the English were defeated with great slaughter. In this year, Sir John De Courcy came with a large army, and remained five nights; and in the following year also, having made an incursion into Tyrone to pillage the churches, he arrived at this place, and during his stay plundered Ennishowen and all the adjacent country: while thus engaged, he received intelligence of the defeat of the English at Larne by Hugh Boy O'Nial, which caused him to quit Derry. In 1203 the town was much damaged by fire; and in 1211 it was plundered by Thomas Mac Uchtry and the sons of Randal Mac Donnell, who came hither with a fleet of 76 ships, and afterwards passed into Ennishowen and laid waste the whole peninsula. This Thomas, and Rory Mac Randal, again plundered the town in 1213, carrying away from the cathedral to Coleraine all the jewellery of the people of Derry and of the north of Ireland. A Cistercian nunnery was founded on the south side of the city in 1218, as recorded in the registry of the Honour of Richmond; but from the Annals of the Four Masters it appears that a religious establishment of this kind had existed here prior to that period. Nial O'Nial plundered the town in 1222; and, in 1261, sixteen of the most distinguished of the clergy of Tyrone were slain here by Conor O'Nial, and the Kinel-Owen or men of Tyrone. In the year 1274 a Dominican abbey was founded on the north side of the city, of which even the site of the buildings cannot at the present time be accurately traced.

Edward II. granted the town to Richard de Burgo, Earl of Ulster, in 1311; but from this period till the reign of ELIZABETH, prior to which the English exercised no settled dominion in Derry, no event of importance connected with the place is recorded. In 1565 Edward Randolph arrived in the Foyle with seven companies of foot and one troop of horse, to repress Shane O'Nial, Earl of Tyrone, who had renounced his allegiance to the English crown; and a sanguinary engagement taking place on the plains of Muff, the Irish chieftain was signally defeated. An encampment was then formed by the English near the city; but in a sally against some of O'Nial's forces, who had ostentatiously paraded before it, the English general was slain by a party who had concealed themselves in an adjoining wood, and the command of the garrison was given to Colonel St. Lo. The English converted the cathedral into an arsenal, and on the 24th of April, 1566, the gunpowder blew up by accident, with so much damage as to render the place untenable; the foot embarked for Dublin, to which city also the horse returned, passing through Tyrconnell and Connaught to avoid O'Nial. In 1599 it was again determined to fortify Derry, a measure long deemed essential in order to divide and check the power of O'Nial and O'Donell, the accomplishment of which object was favoured by its situation and the friendship of O'Dogherty of Ennishowen. With that view Sir Henry Docwra, in 1600, entered the Foyle with a British force of 4000 foot and 200 horse, and landed at Culmore, at the mouth of the river, where he erected a fort. He soon obtained possession of the city, and constructed fortifications and other works for its defence; pulling down the abbey, cathedral, and other ecclesiastical buildings, for the sake of the materials. On the termination of the war at the commencement of 1603, the garrison was reduced to 100 horse and 150 foot under the governor, and 200 foot under Captain Hansard; while at Culmore were left 20 men. Sir Henry now directed his attention to the improvement of the place, and with so much zeal as to entitle him to be regarded as the founder of the modern city. A number of English colonists settled here on his invitation; he obtained grants of markets and fairs, and, in 1604, a charter of incorporation with ample privileges. But in 1608, after the flight and forfeiture of O'Nial and O'Donell, the growing prosperity of the new city was checked by the insurrection of Sir Cahir O'Dogherty, the young chief of Ennishowen, who took both Culmore Fort and Derry, at the latter of which Sir George Paulet (to whom Sir Henry Docwra had alienated all his interests) and his men were slain; as many of the inhabitants as could escape fled, and the town was plundered and burned.

A large part of Ulster having escheated to the crown on the attainder of the two above-named earls, proposals of colonization were made to the city of London, in which this place is described as "the late ruinated city of Derry, which may be made by land almost impregnable." In accepting the offers of the crown, the city agreed to erect 200 houses here, and leave room for 300 more; 4000 acres contiguous to the city were to be annexed to it in perpetuity, exclusively of bog and barren mountain, which were to be added as waste; convenient sites were allowed for the houses of the bishop and dean; the liberties were to extend three miles, or 3000 Irish paces, in every direction from the centre of the city; and the London undertakers were to have the neighbouring fort of Culmore, with the lands attached, on condition of maintaining in it a competent ward of officers and men. In 1613 the inhabitants having surrendered their former charter, were re-incorporated; and the name of the city was altered to Londonderry. The natives having conspired to take the town by surprise, a supply of arms was sent from London in 1615: an additional sum of £5000 was ordered for completing the walls; and, that it might not in future be peopled with Irish, the "IRISH SOCIETY" issued directions that a certain number of children from Christ's Hospital, and others, should be sent hither as apprentices and servants; and prohibited the inhabitants from taking Irish apprentices. Leases of most of the houses were granted for thirty-one years, and to each was allotted a portion of land according to the rent, with ground for gardens and orchards; 300 acres were assigned for the support of a free-school; and of the 4000 acres, the society allotted to the houses or granted to the mayor 3217, including a parcel of 1500 acres, which were set apart to support the magistracy of the city, and which subsequently became a source of contention between the society, the corporation, and the bishop. In 1618 we find the fortifications completed, at an expense of £8357; but notwithstanding the adoption of these and other measures of improvement, the increase of houses and inhabitants was very slow, and the operations of the society were made the ground of various representations to the crown respecting the non-fulfilment of the conditions of planting. In 1622, commissioners were appointed to inquire into the affairs of the plantation, to whom the mayor and corporation of Derry presented a petition complaining of many grievances resulting from the conduct of the society, one of the chief of which was the non-erection of the specified number of houses: this inquiry led to several sequestrations of the city and liberties until 1628, and for some time the rents were paid to the crown.

In the rebellion of 1641 the English and Scottish settlers received a considerable supply of arms and ammunition from London, and, having secured themselves within the walls, successfully defended the city from the attacks of the rebels under Sir Phelim O'Nial. In 1643 the inhabitants of Londonderry and Coleraine sent letters to the Lords-Justices, urging their impoverished condition and praying for relief. Sir John Vaughan, the governor, having died this year, Sir Robert Stewart was appointed to the command of the garrison, of which five companies aided in his defeat of Owen O'Nial at Clones, on the 13th of June. Towards the close of the year, the parliament having taken the covenant, the London Adventurers sent over an agent with letters desiring that it should be taken within their plantation; but in the year following, the mayor was ordered by the Lord-Lieutenant and Council to publish a proclamation against it. Colonel Audley Mervyn, who had been appointed governor by the Marquess of Ormonde, was nevertheless obliged from expediency to take the covenant: in 1645 he was displaced by the parliament, and was succeeded by Lord Folliott. Sir C. Coote, the parliamentary general, having, in 1648, treacherously seized the person of Sir Robert Hamilton, forced him to surrender Culmore Fort; by which the parliamentarians became masters of all the forts of Ulster, except Charlemont. The Marquess of Ormonde failing in his attempts to induce Sir C. Coote to join the king's cause, the latter was blocked up in Derry by the royalists; soon after the city and Culmore Fort were regularly besieged by Sir Robert Stewart, who was subsequently joined by Sir G. Monroe and Lord Montgomery with their respective forces, and CHARLES II. was proclaimed with great solemnity before the camp of Derry. The decapitation of the late king having excited horror among the majority of the people of the north, they rose in arms, and soon obtained possession of all the towns and forts of strength in that quarter, except Derry and Culmore. These two places, after a siege of four months, and when the garrison, consisting of 800 foot and 180 horse, was reduced to the greatest extremities, were relieved by Owen Roe O'Nial, to whom Sir C. Coote had promised a reward of £5000 for this service; and by the defeat of Ever Mac Mahon, the Roman Catholic general, the following year, at Skirfolas in Donegal, Coote finally reduced all Ulster under the power of the parliament. After the Restoration, Charles II., in 1662, granted letters-patent to the Irish Society, containing, with very little alteration, all the clauses of the first charter of James I.; this is the charter under which the society now acts. In 1684 the same monarch constituted a guild of the staple, with powers as ample as those enjoyed by any other city: in the following year, owing to the decay of trade, the corporation complained to the society that the government of the town was too expensive for the magistrates to sustain, and solicited an abatement of the rent.

This city became in 1689 the asylum of the Protestants of the north, who, in number about 30,000, fled to it for refuge before the marauding forces of JAMES; and is distinguished in the annals of modern history for the heroic bravery of its inhabitants amidst the extreme privations of a protracted siege. The chief governor having withdrawn the Protestant garrison, and steps being taken to introduce an undisciplined native force influenced by hostile prejudices, the young men of the city closed the gates against its admission; and the bulk of the inhabitants took up arms in their own defence. The magistrates and graver citizens endeavoured to palliate this ebullition of military ardour in their representations to the Lord-Lieutenant; but in the mean time the armed inhabitants applied to the Irish Society for assistance. Lord Mountjoy, a Protestant commander in the army of James, was, however, admitted, in a great measure from personal regard, but on condition that a free pardon should be granted within 15 days, and that in the interval only two companies should be quartered within the walls; that, of the forces afterwards admitted, one-half at least should be Protestants; that, until pardon was received, the citizens should guard the fortifications; and that all who desired it might be permitted to quit the city. By the advice of Mountjoy, who was obeyed as a friend and associate, the arms were repaired, money cheerfully subscribed, ammunition purchased in Scotland, and the agent despatched to England urged to procure supplies. He was succeeded in the command by his first lieutenant, Lundy, whom KING WILLIAM, on sending an officer with some military supplies, commissioned to act in his name; but the dissatisfaction of the citizens was excited by the vacillating character of this commander, who, on the approach of James to besiege the city in person, prepared to surrender it, notwithstanding the arrival of two English colonels in the river with reinforcements, which he remanded. The principal officers being about to withdraw, and the town-council preparing to offer terms of capitulation, the inhabitants rose tumultuously against the constituted authorities; received with enthusiasm a brave and popular captain who presented himself at the city gates with a reinforcement; and, rushing to the walls, fired upon James and his party advancing to take possession of the place. On deliberation, they suffered the timid to depart unmolested; Lundy first concealed himself, and afterwards escaped; and two new governors were chosen, one of whom was the celebrated GEORGE WALKER, rector of Donoughmore. Under their directions, the soldiers and able inhabitants were formed into eight regiments, numbering 7020 men, with 341 officers; order and discipline were in some degree established, and, notwithstanding partial jealousies, 18 Protestant clergymen and seven non-conformists shared in the labour and danger of the siege, and by their exhortations stimulated the enthusiastic courage of the defenders with the fervour of devotion. The operations of an army of 20,000 men were thus successfully opposed in a place abandoned as untenable by the regular forces, unaided by engineers or well-mounted guns, and with only a ten days' supply of provisions. An irregular war of sallies was adopted with such effect that James, who had hitherto remained at St. Johnstown, six miles distant, returned to Dublin, leaving his army to continue the siege.

The defenders had now to contend against the inroads of disease and famine; and the arrival of KIRKE with a fleet in the lough afforded but little prospect of relief, as he deemed it too hazardous an enterprise to sail up to the town in front of the enemy's lines. But, although thus apparently left to their own scanty resources, the brave garrison continued the defence with unabated heroism, making desperate and effective sallies even when too much enfeebled by hunger to pursue their success. To induce a surrender, Marshal Rosen, the besieging general, ordered his soldiers to drive round the walls of the town the helpless Protestant population of the surrounding district, of all ages, who were thus exposed to the horrors of famine for nearly three days before they were suffered to disperse; some of the ablest of the men, however, secretly joined their comrades in the town, and an effective body of 500 people were passed from it unperceived by the enemy. When even such miserable resources as the flesh of horses and dogs, hides, tallow, and similar nauseous substances, had failed for two days, two of Kirke's ships, laden with provisions and convoyed by the Dartmouth frigate, advanced up the lough in view both of the garrison and the besiegers, in a dangerous attempt to relieve the place, returning with spirit the fire of the enemy. The foremost of the provision ships came in contact with the boom that had been thrown across the channel, and broke it; but, rebounding with violence, ran aground, and for the moment appeared to be at the mercy of the besiegers, who with acclamations of joy instantly prepared to board her: the vessel, however, firing her guns, was extricated by the shock, floated, and triumphantly passed the boom, followed by her companions. The town was thus relieved, and the enemy retired; but of the brave defenders only 4300 survived to witness their deliverance, and of this number more than 1000 were incapable of service: those who were able immediately sallied out in pursuit of the enemy, who had lost 8000 men by the sword and by various disorders during the siege, which had continued 105 days. Culmore Fort was reduced to ruin, and was never afterwards rebuilt. The city itself sustained so much damage that the Irish Society deemed it necessary to appoint commissioners for its restoration: the twelve chief companies of London advanced £100 each; the society supplied timber for the public buildings, abatements were made in the rents, the terms of leases were augmented, and other measures for the accomplishment of this object were adopted.

In 1692, the corporation, failing to negotiate with Bishop King for a renewal of the lease of the quarterlands, reminded the society that the bishop's claims to this property were unsubstantial, and agreed to establish their right in consideration of £90. 10. per annum, which is still paid. In 1695 the society procured a resumption of the remainder of the 1500 acres comprised in their letters-patent, by an ejectment against the bishop, who, in 1697, appealed to the Irish house of lords, and obtained an order for their restitution; the sheriffs and some other inhabitants of Derry, opposing the order, were taken into custody, and conveyed to Dublin. Against this decision the society applied to the English house of lords; and in 1703 an act was passed establishing their right, not only to the 1500 acres, but also to the fisheries, which had previously been an object of dispute; subject to the payment of £250 per annum to the bishop and his successors, which is still continued, with a condition of exonerating him from rent or other demands for his palace and gardens. In 1721 a dispute took place between the corporation and the military governor, who refused to deliver the keys of the city gates to the new mayor, which by the charter he was bound to do; he surrounded the town-hall with troops, and prevented the members of the corporation from entering it, but was removed immediately after. A grand centenary commemoration of the shutting of the gates took place in 1788, and was continued with the utmost harmony for three days; in the month of August following, the relief of the city was commemorated.

The CITY is advantageously situated on the river Foyle, above five statute miles above the point where it spreads into Lough Foyle, and chiefly on the summit and sides of a hill projecting into the river on its west side, and commanding in every direction richly diversified and picturesque views of a well cultivated tract. This hill, or "Island of Derry," is of an oval form, 119 feet high, and contains about 200 acres. The ancient portion of the city occupies the higher grounds, and is surrounded by massive walls completed in 1617, at the expense of the society; they form a parallelogram nearly a mile in circumference, and in the centre is a square called the Diamond, from which four principal streets radiate at right angles towards the principal gates. Since the Union the city has considerably increased, particularly on the north along the shore of the river, where several warehouses, stores, and merchants' residences have been erected: on the west is also a considerable suburb, in which, within the last fifteen years, some new streets have been formed; and on the eastern bank of the river is another, called Waterside. The walls, which are well built and in a complete state of repair, are nearly 1800 yards in circuit, 24 feet high, and of sufficient thickness to form an agreeable promenade on the top. The four original gates have been rebuilt on an enlarged and more elegant plan, and two more added; but the only two that are embellished are Bishop's-gate and Ship-quay gate, the former built by subscription in 1788, being the centenary in commemoration of the siege. In 1628 the Irish Society were ordered to erect guard and sentinel houses, of which two are yet remaining: of the several bastions, the north-western was demolished in 1824, to make room for the erection of a butter-market; and in 1826 the central western bastion was appropriated to the reception of a public testimonial in honour of the celebrated George Walker. A few guns are preserved in their proper positions, but the greater number are used as posts for fastening cables and protecting the corners of streets. The houses are chiefly built of brick: the entire number in the city and suburbs, in 1841, was 2409. The city is watched, paved, cleansed, and lighted with gas, under the superintendence of commissioners of general police, consisting of the mayor and twelve inhabitants chosen by ballot: the gas-works were erected in 1829, at an expense of £7000, raised in shares of £11. Water is conveyed to the town across the bridge by pipes, from a reservoir on Brae Head, beyond the Waterside, in the parish of Glendermot, or Clondermot; the works were constructed by the corporation under an act of the 40th of George III., at a total expense of £15,500, and iron pipes have been laid down within the last few years.

The bridge, a celebrated wooden structure erected by Lemuel Cox, an American, in lieu of a ferry which the corporation held under the Irish Society, was begun in 1789, and completed in the spring of 1791. It is 1068 feet in length, and 40 in breadth. The piles are of oak, and the head of each is tenoned into a cap-piece 40 feet long and 17 inches square, supported by three sets of girths and braces; the piers, which are 16½ feet apart, are bound together by thirteen string-pieces equally divided and transversely bolted, on which is laid the flooring: on each side of the platform is a railing 4½ feet high; also a broad pathway provided with gas-lamps. Near the end next to the city, a turning bridge has been constructed in place of the original drawbridge, to allow of the free navigation of the river. On the 6th of Feb. 1814, a portion of the bridge extending to 350 feet was carried away by large masses of ice floated down the river by the ebb tide and a very high wind. The expense of its erection was £16,594, and of the repairs after the damage in 1814, £18,208, of which latter sum, £15,000 were advanced as a loan by government: the average annual amount of tolls from 1831 to 1834, inclusive, was £3693. Plans and estimates for the erection of a new bridge, nearly 200 yards above the present, have been procured; but there is no prospect of the immediate execution of the design.

A public library and news-room, commenced in 1819 by subscription and established on its present plan in 1824, by a body of proprietors of transferable shares of 20 guineas each, is provided with about 2660 volumes of modern works, and with periodical publications and daily and weekly newspapers. It is a plain building faced with hewn Dungiven sandstone, erected by subscription in 1824, at an expense of nearly £2000, and, besides the usual apartments, contains the committee-room of the Chamber of Commerce; the lower part is used as the news-room, to which all the inhabitants are admitted on payment of five guineas annually. A literary society for debates and lectures was instituted in 1834, and the number of its members is rapidly increasing. Concerts were formerly held at the King's Arms hotel, but have been discontinued; races are still held, on a course to the north of the town. Walker's Testimonial, on the central western bastion, was completed in 1828 by subscription, at an expense of £1200: it consists of a column of Portland stone, of good proportions, in the Roman-Doric style, surmounted by a statue of that distinguished governor by John Smith, Esq., of Dublin; the column is ascended by a spiral staircase within, and, including the pedestal, is 81 feet in height, in addition to which the statue measures nine feet. The city is in the Belfast military district, and is the headquarters of a regiment of infantry which supplies detachments to various places: the original barracks were intended for the accommodation of four officers and 320 men, with an hospital for 32 patients; but from their insufficiency a more commodious edifice has been erected, in the parish of Clondermot.

The MANUFACTURES are not very considerable. The principal is that of meal, for which there are several corn-mills; of these, one erected by Mr. Schoales in 1831, and worked by a steam-engine of 18-horse power, and another subsequently by Mr. Leatham, worked by an engine of 20-horse power, are the chief. The recent extension of this branch of trade has made meal an article of export instead of import, as formerly; in 1831, 553 tons were imported, while in 1834 6950 tons were exported. In William-street are a brewery and distillery: there are copper-works which supply the whole of the north-west of Ulster, and afford regular employment to 27 men; two coach-factories; two flax-spinning mills; some tanyards and rope-walks; a corn-mill and distillery at Pennyburn, and another at Waterside. A sugar-house was built in 1762, in what is still called Sugar-house-lane, but was abandoned in 1809; the buildings were converted into a glass manufactory in 1820, but this branch of business was carried on for a few years only.

This is the place of export for the agricultural produce of a large tract of fertile country, which renders the coasting TRADE very extensive, especially with Great Britain. The quantity of grain, &c., exported to England and Scotland alone, in the year ending Jan. 5th, 1835, was, 3680 tons of wheat, 1490 tons of barley, 10,429 tons of oats, 6950 tons of oatmeal, 3050 tons of eggs, 3654 tons of flax, 52,842 firkins of butter, 11,580 barrels of pork, 1900 bales of bacon, 590 hogsheads of hams, 1628 kegs of tongues, and 147 hogsheads of lard. Derry is still the market for a considerable quantity of linen, of which 9642 boxes and bales were exported in the same year. The number of vessels employed in the coasting trade, which entered inwards, in 1834, was 649, of an aggregate tonnage of 63,726; and which cleared outwards, 646, of an aggregate tonnage of 62,502; including steam-vessels, which ply regularly between this port and Liverpool and Glasgow. In 1844, the number inwards was 773, and outwards 722. The principal articles of foreign produce imported direct are, staves and timber from the Baltic; barilla from Spain; sugar and rum from the West Indies; wine from Spain and Portugal; tobacco from the United States, from which the ships come chiefly to take out emigrants, who resort to this port from the inland districts in great numbers; and flax-seed, the importation of which has much increased within the last few years, from Riga, America, and Holland. But the greater portion of foreign commodities comes indirectly, or coastwise. The number of vessels employed in the foreign trade, which entered inwards, in 1834, was 57, of an aggregate burthen of 10,406 tons; and that cleared outwards, 16, of an aggregate tonnage of 4869. In 1844, the number inwards was 56, and outwards 37. The gross estimated value of the exports, both to foreign and to British ports, in a recent year, was £1,040,918, of which £120,676 were for corn, meal, and flour; £328,660 provisions; £314,749 linens; £10,580 whisky and malt-liquor; £224,190 hides, feathers, flax, &c.; and the remainder unenumerated articles. The gross value of the imports, in the same year, amounted to £708,054, whereof £11,824 were coal, &c., £40,135 iron and other metals, £13,550 haberdashery, £23,256 spirits, £29,225 hides, &c., £80,399 tea, £8213 tobacco, £3364 wine, &c., besides various other articles.

The salmon FISHERY of the Foyle affords employment to 120 men, exclusively of the same number of water-keepers: the fish is shipped principally for Liverpool; some is also sent to Glasgow, and some pickled for the London market. The quantity taken annually on an average of three recent years was about 149 tons. The right of fishing in this river up to Lifford is vested by charter of James I. in the Irish Society, who by an act in the reign of Anne, are bound to pay the bishop £250 per annum, as compensation for his claim to some small fishings, and to a tithe of the whole; but at present the Marquess of Abercorn and the Earl of Erne hold fisheries below the town of Lifford. The fishery off the coast is precarious, and frequently yields only a scanty supply, from the danger in encountering a rough sea experienced by the boats employed in it, which are only indifferently built: yet at other times the market abounds with turbot taken near Innistrahull and on Hempton's Bank, about 18 Irish miles north of Ennishowen Head; with soles and haddock, taken in Lough Swilly and elsewhere; cod, mostly off the entrance to Lough Foyle; and oysters, taken in Lough Swilly from the island of Inch up to Fort Stewart, and in Lough Foyle from Quigley's Point down to Greencastle. A new and very important trade as connected with the port, is the herring-fishery; upwards of 5800 barrels were cured in a late year, at the Orkneys, by Derry merchants, and the total quantity imported exceeds 12,000 barrels, one-half of which are cured by vessels fitted out from this port. Large quantities of oysters have been taken in the river Foyle since 1829.

Derry is about 19 statute miles above the entrance to Lough Foyle, the approach to which is facilitated by a lighthouse on the island of Innistrahull; and by two others of late erection on Shrove Head, Ennishowen, intended to serve as guiding lights past the great Tun Bank lying to the east. The limits of the PORT extend to Culmore, a distance of three miles; the lough has been deepened under the direction of the Ballast Committee, in consequence of which, vessels drawing 14 feet of water can come close to the quays. At the entrance to the lough is a well-regulated establishment of pilots, under the superintendence of the Ballast Board. The Ballast Office was established by act of parliament in 1790, and remodelled by another act in 1833: the port regulations are under the control of a committee of this establishment, consisting of the mayor and seven other members, of whom the two senior members go out annually by rotation, and who have the power of making by-laws. The corporation alone possessed the right of having quays prior to 1832, when they lost their monopoly, and private quays were constructed: they disposed of their interest in the merchants' or custom-house quays, in Nov. 1831. There are now 21 sufferance or private wharfs or quays, including two at Waterside, in the parish of Clondermot. A patent-slip dock was constructed in 1830, at an expense of £4000, in which vessels of 300 tons registered burthen can be repaired: prior to that period most vessels were sent for repair to Liverpool or the Clyde, and several large brigs have been built here since that date. Naval stores are brought chiefly from Belfast, but sails are manufactured here.

In the excise arrangements Londonderry gives name to, and is the head of, a district which comprises the city of Londonderry; the towns of Omagh, Strabane, Newtown-Stewart, and Fintona, in the county of Tyrone; and Letterkenny, Buncrana, Ramelton, Raphoe, &c., in the county of Donegal. The custom-house, an inconvenient building, was built as a store in 1805, and since 1809 has been held by government on a permanent tenure, at an annual rental of £1419. 4. 6., at first as a king's store, and since 1824 as a custom-house: the premises comprise some extensive tobacco and timber yards, laid out at different periods, and extend in front 450 feet, varying in depth. Branches of the Bank of Ireland, and the Belfast, the Northern, and Provincial Banks, have been established. The MARKETS are generally well supplied. The shambles, for meat daily, and to which there is a weigh-house attached, are situated off Linen-hall-street, and were built in 1760, by Alderman Alexander and other members of the corporation: the tolls belong to Sir R. A. Ferguson, Bart., who in 1830 purchased the shambles, and the fish and vegetable markets, of the corporation. The linen-market, on Wednesday, is held in a hall occupying an obscure situation in a street to which it gives name, and built in 1770, by Frederick Hamilton, Esq., to whose descendant the tolls belong: it consists of a court measuring 147 feet by 15, and inclosed by small dilapidated houses; the cloth is exposed on stands placed in the court and under sheds; on the opposite side of the street is the sealing-room. The butter-market, in Waterloo-place, for butter and hides daily, and to which three weigh-houses are attached; the fish-market, off Linen-hall-street, daily; the potato-market, in Society-street, for potatoes and meal by retail daily, with a weigh-house attached; and the vegetable market, off Linen-hall-street, for vegetables, poultry, and butter daily; were all built in 1825, by the corporation, to whom the tolls of the butter and potato markets belong. The cow-market, for the sale of cows, pigs, sheep, and goats, every Wednesday, is held in a field to the south of Bishop-street, near the river, which was inclosed in 1832 by the corporation. There are also a flax-market in Bishop-street every Thursday, and a market for yarn in Butchers'-street every Wednesday. Six fairs are held annually, but only three are of importance, namely, those on June 17th, Sept. 4th, and Oct. 17th; the others are on March 4th, April 30th, and Sept. 20th. Custom was charged on every article of merchandise brought into the city prior to 1826, when it was abolished, except as regards goods conveyed over the bridge; and in lieu thereof, the corporation instituted trespass, cranage, storage, and other dues. The post-office was established in 1784. The revenue police force usually consists of a lieutenant and twelve men; and the constabulary, of a chief constable and twelve men. In 1845 an act was passed "for making a Railway from Londonderry to Coleraine, with a branch to Newtown-Limavady:" this remarkable undertaking consists of a main line of 32¼ miles, between Londonderry (where it is to join the line from Enniskillen) and Coleraine, and a branch of nearly 6¾ miles to Newtown-Limavady. The grand peculiarity is, that about 19 miles of the railway and branch will run upon embankments across Lough Foyle, by which it is proposed to reclaim 18,000 acres of land from the sea; in the remaining portion, the engineers propose to abandon part of the parliamentary plan, for the sake of obtaining a shorter and better line. The total length is 39 British miles, and the capital £500,000, with power to raise £166,000 additional by loan.

The MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT was, until 1840, vested in a mayor, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four burgesses, assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, and chamberlain; and the inferior officers of the corporation were a sword-bearer, mace-bearer, four town-serjeants, two sheriffs' bailiffs, &c. The mayor and sheriffs were elected by the common-council on the 2nd of Feb., the former from among the aldermen, and the latter from the burgesses, from whom also the aldermen were chosen; the burgesses were appointed from the freemen and inhabitants. The sheriffs exercised jurisdiction both over the entire county and the liberties of the city; and the town-clerk was generally clerk of the peace for the county. The freedom was inherited by the sons of aldermen and burgesses, and was obtained by marriage with their daughters, by apprenticeship to a freeman, and by gift of the corporation. The city at present is divided into three wards, and governed by a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors, elected under the provisions of the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108: a sheriff is appointed by the Lord Lieutenant; and there are also a town-clerk, clerk of the peace, and other officers. Derry returned two representatives to the Irish parliament till the Union, since which it has sent one to the Imperial parliament. The right of voting was formerly vested in the burgesses and freemen, in number about 450; but by the late enactments, under which a new electoral boundary was established, the former non-resident electors, except within a distance of seven miles, were disfranchised, and the privilege extended to the £10 householders. The number of registered voters in 1841 was 906, of whom 711 were £10 householders, and the remainder freemen. Under the old regime, the mayor, recorder, and all aldermen who had filled the mayoralty, were justices of the peace within the liberties, which comprised the city, and a circuit of three Irish miles measured from its centre; they also exercised jurisdiction by sufferance over the townland of Culmore. The mayor and recorder, or the mayor alone, held a court of record every Monday, for pleas to any amount; the process was either by attachment against the goods, or arrest of the person. The court of general sessions for the city was held four times a year: there is a court of petty-sessions weekly, held before the mayor, or any of the civic magistrates. The mayor also holds weekly a court of conscience, for the recovery of ordinary debts not exceeding £20 late currency or servants' wages to the amount of £6, and from which there is no appeal. The city is in the North-West circuit, and the assizes are held here twice a year: it is also one of the four towns within the county at which the general quarter-sessions are held; and the assistant barrister presides here in April and October.

The Corporation Hall, in the centre of the Diamond, and on the site of the original town-house built by the Irish Society in 1622, was erected by the corporation in 1692, and, till 1825, when it was rebuilt by the corporation, was called the Market-house or Exchange: the south front, in which is the principal entrance, is circular. The upper story contains a common-council room, an assembly-room, and an ante-chamber. On the ground floor, which was formerly open for the sale of meal and potatoes, but was closed in 1825, is a news-room established by the corporation in that year. The Court-house, completed in 1817 at an expense of £30,479. 15., including the purchase of the site and furniture, is a handsome building of white sandstone, chiefly from the neighbourhood of Dungiven, ornamented with Portland stone, and erected from a design by Mr. John Bowden. It measures 126 feet by 66, and exhibits a façade judiciously broken by a tetrastyle portico of the enriched Ionic order, modelled from that of the temple of Erectheus at Athens: over the pediment are the royal arms; and the wings are surmounted by statues of Justice and Peace sculptured in Portland stone by the late Edward Smith. The principal apartments are the crown and record courts, the mayor's public and private offices, the offices of the recorder, treasurer, and clerks of the crown and peace, the judges' room, and the grand-jury room: in addition to the assizes, sessions, and mayor's court, the county and other meetings are held in it. The Gaol, situated in Bishop-street, beyond the gate, was erected between the years 1819 and 1824, by Messrs. Henry, Mullins, and M'Mahon, at an expense of £33,718, late currency: the front, which is partly coated with cement and partly built of Dungiven stone, extends 242 feet; and the depth of the entire building, including the yards, is 400 feet. It is built on the radiating plan; the governor's house, which includes the chapel and committee-room, is surrounded by a panoptic gallery; and the entire gaol contains 179 single cells, 26 work and day rooms, and 20 airing-yards: apart from the main building is an hospital, containing separate wards for both sexes. The regulations are excellent: in 1835 the system of classification was abandoned, and the silent system introduced; the prisoners are constantly employed at various trades, and receive one-third of their earnings.

Arms of the Bishopric.

The Diocese of Derry originated in a monastery founded by St. Columb, about 545. Some of the abbots of this establishment, at a very early period, were styled bishops; but the title of Bishop of Derry was not fixed until 1158; or until even a century later, as the bishops, though the see was at Derry, were sometimes called bishops of Tyrone during the 12th and 13th centuries. The see first existed at Ardsrath, where St. Eugene, the first bishop, died about the end of the 6th century; it was subsequently removed to Maghera, whence it was transferred to Derry. It is called Darrich in the old Roman provincial, and Doire Choluim chille, or "Columbkill's Oak Grove," by ancient writers. The town is now called Londonderry, from a colony of settlers from London, (in the reign of James I.) by whom the present cathedral was built; but the bishopric retains its ancient name of Derry. The see was constituted at Derry in 1158, by a decree of the Synod of Brigth Thaigh, at which assisted Christian, Bishop of Lismore, the pope's legate, and twenty-five other bishops; and Flathbert O'Brolcan, Abbot of Derry, was promoted to the episcopal throne. In 1164, with the assistance of Mac Loughlin, King of Ireland, he built the cathedral; the altar was robbed in 1196, by M'Crenaght, of 314 cups, which were esteemed the best in Ireland, but they were recovered the third day after, and the robber executed. German, or Gervase, O'Cherballen, who succeeded to the bishopric in 1230, took the church of Ardsrath and many others in Tyrone from the Bishop of Clogher, and forcibly annexed part of the bishopric of Raphoe to his diocese. In 1310, Edward II. directed the bishop of Connor to inquire whether the king or any other person would be prejudiced by allowing Richard de Burgo to retain in fee the city of Derry, which the bishop, with the consent of the chapter, had conveyed to him. Prior to 1608, the bishop had one-third of the tithes of each parish; a lay person, called an Erenach, who was the bishop's farmer, had another third; and the remaining third was allowed for the incumbent: but Bishop Montgomery gave the bishop's share to the incumbents of parishes, on the grant by James I. of the termon or Erenach lands, amounting to 6534 acres, to the see in exchange. By an inquisition in 1622, the bishop was found to be entitled to fish for salmon on the Monday after the 4th of June, within the great net-fishery belonging to the London Society; also to half the tithe of salmon, &c., caught in the Bann and Lough Foyle. Bishop Hopkins, who died in 1690, was at great expense in beautifying the cathedral, and furnishing it with organs and massive plate, and is said to have expended £1000 in buildings and other improvements in this bishopric and that of Raphoe. Derry continued to be a separate bishopric until the death of Dr. Bissett, Bishop of Raphoe, in 1836, when that see, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities' act of the 3rd and 4th of William IV., was annexed to the see of Derry, and its temporalities became vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

This diocese is one of the sixteen that constitute the province of Armagh: it is partly in the counties of Antrim and Donegal, but chiefly in Tyrone and Londonderry, extending 47 miles in length by 43 in breadth, and comprehending an estimated superficies of 659,000 acres, of which 2500 are in Antrim, 139,300 in Donegal, 233,100 in Tyrone, and 284,100 in Londonderry. The lands belonging to the see of Derry comprise 77,102 statute acres, of which 39,621 are profitable land, and 37,481 unprofitable; and the gross yearly revenue derived from these lands and from appropriate tithes, on an average of three years ending Dec. 31st, 1831, amounted to £14,193. 3. Under the Church Temporalities' act an annual charge of £4160 is payable out of the see estates to the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners: this payment is made to diminish the excess of the revenue of this see above the other bishoprics, and is in lieu of the Ad Valorem tax imposed on all benefices in Ireland. The chapter consists of a dean and archdeacon, and the three prebendaries of Comber, Aghadowy, and Moville. To the dean belong, as the corps of the deanery, the rectories of Templemore, Faughanvale, and Clondermot, the tithes of which, under the Composition act, amounted to £3235. 7. per annum. The deanery lands, which are situated in the parishes of Clondermot and Faughanvale, consist of several townlands, comprising 2859 statute acres, let on leases at rents amounting to £176. 6. and renewal fines averaging £269. 15. annually; and the gross annual revenue of the deanery, as returned by the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Enquiry, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, amounted to £3710. 13. per annum. To the archdeacon belongs the rectory of Dunboe, the tithe rent-charge of which is £360 and the glebe lands comprise 420 statute acres; its gross annual value, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £700 per annum. The endowments of the prebends consist of the tithes and glebes of the parishes from which they take their names, and are detailed in the articles on those places. The cathedral has neither minor canons, vicars-choral, nor an economy fund. The diocesan school is connected with the free school of Derry, which was founded by the corporation of London in 1617. The consistorial court consists of a vicar-general, surrogate, registrar, deputy-registrar, and 11 proctors. The number of parishes in the diocese is 60, comprised in 57 benefices: the benefice which forms the corps of the deanery is a union of the three parishes of Templemore, Faughanvale, and Clondermot, and is in the patronage of the Crown; 36 are in the patronage of the Bishop, 3 in the gift of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, 8 in lay patronage, and the remaining 9, which are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the incumbents of the parishes out of which they have been formed. The number of churches is 62, and of school-houses and other places where divine service is performed, 11.

In the Roman Catholic divisions this diocese is a separate bishopric, and one of eight suffragan to Armagh. It comprises 36 parochial benefices or unions, containing 70 chapels, which are served by 81 clergymen, 36 of whom, including the bishop, are parish priests, and 45 coadjutors or curates. The parochial benefice of the bishop is Derry, or Templemore, where he resides.

The CATHEDRAL, which also serves as the parish church of Templemore, was completed in 1633; the former one, erected in 1164, having been destroyed by Sir Henry Docwra. The cost of the building, amounting to £4000, was defrayed by the corporation of the city of London. It is principally in the later English style, with various decorations since added, which do not harmonize with its prevailing character; and consists of a nave and aisles, separated by stone pillars and arches, with a tower at the west end surmounted by an elegant octagonal spire terminating in a cross and spear: on the east gable is a cross springing from the central battlement. The entire structure is 240 feet long, and 66 feet broad; the height of the tower and spire is 228 feet, from the churchyard. In 1778, the Earl of Bristol, then Bishop of Derry, completed a new spire of hewn stone, with open ornamented windows, and the old tower was raised 21 feet; but in 1802, owing to the dilapidated state of the tower, the spire was taken down and soon after rebuilt from a fund of £400, half of which was contributed by the Irish Society and half by Bishop Knox and the citizens. The society also contributed a sum for the embellishment of the cathedral in 1819; and in 1822 the old roof of lead was replaced by a slate roof. A new organ was erected in 1829 by subscription, to which Bishop Knox contributed £100, and Dean Gough and the corporation £50 each. On the north of the communion-table is a handsome monument of Italian marble, by Behnes, erected in 1834 to the memory of Bishop Knox, at an expense of £500, raised by subscription: on an elevated plinth is an inscribed tablet, above which is represented a tomb surmounted by a mitre, on the right of which is a full-length figure of Religion, and on the left one of Charity with a babe on her arm and two children of different ages standing at her knees. There are various other tablets, one of which, to the memory of the father of the Rev. William Hamilton, D.D., is inscribed with an epitaph by that distinguished naturalist. The Bishop's Palace, built about the year 1761, during the prelacy of Bishop Barnard, is a substantial and commodious building, occupying the site of the Augustinian convent; it was almost rebuilt by the Earl of Bristol, when bishop, and, after the damage which it sustained by being occupied as a barrack in 1802, was repaired by Bishop Knox. The gardens in the rear comprise nearly two acres, and extend to the city wall: having at the above period been appropriated as a parade, that designation is still applied to the adjacent part of the wall. The Deanery, a large unadorned edifice of brick, was built in 1833 by the Rev. T. B. Gough, the present dean, at an expense of £3421. 16., to be reimbursed by his successor.

Adjacent to the city wall on the west is a Chapel of Ease, a rectangular building, erected by Bishop Barnard, whose descendant, Sir Andrew Barnard, became the patron: the chaplain's original stipend of £50 is now paid out of the property of William J. Campbell, Esq., who claims the advowson. A Free Church was built on the north of the city by Bishop Knox, in 1830, at an expense of £760; and a gallery was erected in 1832, at a further expense, including the cost of a vestry-room and the introduction of gas, of £145, raised by subscription. The Roman Catholic Chapel occupies the site of the monastery of St. Columb, and is situated in a street called the Long Tower, from the lofty round tower which formed the belfry of the Dubh-Regles, the original church built by St. Columb. This chapel was completed in 1786, at an expense, including the cost of some additions in 1811, of £2700, of which £210 were contributed by the Earl of Bristol, and £50 by the corporation. The Presbyterian meeting-house, in Meeting-house-row, has a chaste and handsome front, of which the pediment and corners are of Dungiven freestone; it is supposed to have been built about the year 1750, at an expense of nearly £4000, and was repaired in 1828 at an additional cost of £700. The Primitive Wesleyan Methodist chapel, in the same street, was originally a store, which was used by Wesley on his visit to this city in 1763: his congregation built the Wesleyan Methodist chapel in 1783, but on the separation taking place the Primitive Methodists returned to their former place of worship; part of the building is still let for a store, and the chapel is used as a Sunday school between the intervals of divine service, for which the dean pays a rent of £20. The old Wesleyan Methodist chapel was vacated on the completion of a new chapel, built in 1835, at an estimated expense of £1100, raised by subscription, towards which the Irish Society contributed £100; the ground floor is used as a vestry-room and a schoolroom for 300 children. There are also a place of worship for Presbyterians till lately in connexion with the Seceding Synod, a plain building erected in 1783, at an expense of £450; one for Covenanters, built in 1810 at a like expense; and for Independents, built in 1824 at an expense of £500.

The Diocesan school, or FOYLE COLLEGE, was originally founded within the walls as a free grammar school, in the reign of James I., and was rebuilt on its present site to the north of the city in 1814, chiefly through the exertions of Bishop Knox, who gave £1000 towards the expense, which amounted to £13,714. 13., and was further defrayed by donations from the Irish Society and London Companies, sale of stock, and grand jury presentments. It is a simple but handsome edifice of stone, consisting of a centre and two wings, and pleasantly situated on the bank of the river. The building is sufficiently capacious to accommodate 80 boarders; there are at present about 30 boarders, and as many day-scholars, exclusive of 20 who are free: the day pupils not free pay £4. 4. per annum for mercantile, and £7. 7. per annum for classical, instruction. There is no endowment, but the Irish Society, the bishop, and the clergy of the diocese, subscribe annually to the amount of about £200; this, with the emoluments arising from the boarders and from the day scholars who are not free, constitutes the income of the master: the bishop and the dean and chapter are trustees. The school has deservedly been held in great estimation, owing to the high literary acquirements of the masters. Attached to the institution is an excellent library of works on divinity, collected by Bishop Hopkins, and purchased and presented by his successor, Bishop King; it has been augmented by a donation of £100 from James Alexander, Esq., of London, and is open to the clergy of the diocese at all times. The Parish School originated in an act of the 28th of Henry VIII., confirmed by one of the 7th of William III. The present building, situated without the walls, was erected in 1812 through the liberal contributions of Bishop Knox and the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, the latter of whom allow annually £30 for the boys', and £15 for the girls', school; and, in addition, the girls' school is aided by annual grants of £40 and £10 late currency from the Irish Society and the Bishop of Derry respectively. There are about 108 boys and 97 girls, who, except 20 of the boys who are free scholars, pay one penny each weekly.

In connexion with the Presbyterian meeting-house is a school established in 1820, in lieu of a blue-coat school which had existed upwards of a century; there are at present about 100 boys and 96 girls, who pay one penny each weekly. The boys' school is further supported by a subscription of £10 per annum from the congregation, and an annual grant of £20 by the Irish Society; and the girls' school by subscriptions among the ladies, aided by £10 per annum late currency from the Irish Society. The schoolrooms were built and enlarged by subscription at an expense of £450. St. Columb's School, founded in 1813 under the auspices of the Roman Catholic bishop and clergy, but for some time suspended from a difference which arose between the prelate and one of his curates, was finally established in 1825: the building, including the erection of a lofty inclosure, cost nearly £1000. It is in connexion with the National Board of Education, who grant £30 per annum for its support, which is further aided by £10 per annum from the Irish Society, and an annual collection in the Roman Catholic chapel amounting to £30; 143 boys and 166 girls are instructed. The London Ladies' Society School, in Fountain-street, was established in 1822; attached to it is a small library for the use of the poor. Guyn's Charitable Institution was founded by Mr. John Gwyn, a merchant of the city, who died in 1829; and was endowed by him with a bequest of £41,757, producing at present £1882 per annum, for boarding, clothing, and educating as many poor boys as the funds may admit of. This excellent school, which is under the management of 21 trustees, was opened on the 1st of April, 1833, in a hired house formerly the City hotel: the trustees subsequently purchased 10 statute acres of ground at the rear of the infirmary, where they have erected handsome premises capable of accommodating 200 pupils, at an estimated expense of £6000. There are at present nearly 100 boys in the school. A Sunday-School Union was formed in 1832, by which the liberties have been divided into six districts, each under the superintendence of one or two members; the number of schools in the parish at present in connexion with the union is 16, attended by 162 teachers, and the number of pupils on the books is 1726.

The Lunatic Asylum for the Counties of Londonderry, Donegal, and Tyrone, situated on rising ground to the north of the city, was commenced in June, 1827, and opened in 1829; the entire expense, including the purchase of the site and furniture, amounted to £25,678, advanced by government, and to be repaid by the three counties by instalments. The façade fronting the river consists of a centre with pavilions, from which extend wings with airing-sheds, terminating in angular pavilions, all of Dungiven sandstone; above the centre rises a turret, the upper part of which forms an octagonal cupola: in the rear are several commodious airing-yards, separated by ranges of brick building, including the domestic offices and workshops. The entire length of the front is 364 feet; the depth of the building, with the airing-yards, 190 feet; and the height to the eave, 25 feet. The grounds comprise eight acres, including a plot in front ornamentally planted, and a good garden. The asylum was originally intended for 104 patients only, but was some years ago enlarged so as to admit 150; and being still too small, from the cells being partially occupied by incurables, persons afflicted with epilepsy, and idiots, the accommodation has been just again increased. The average annual expenditure for the three years ending 1835 was £2554. 3.: the average number of patients discharged recovered in each year was 42; discharged relieved, 6; and incurable, 4; and the average number of deaths was 17 in each year: the number of patients at the commencement of 1836 was 155. The total number of patients in 1844 was 212, and the expenditure £2910: about 100 of the patients are constantly employed. The Infirmary and Fever Hospital for the City and County, on the north of the city, was built in 1814, in place of an old poor-house which previously occupied the site of the present fish and vegetable markets; and is supported by parliamentary grants, grand jury presentments, governors' subscriptions, and contingencies: it contains 120 beds. The average annual income is £1475. 15., and the expenditure, £1456. 10.; the entire number of patients deriving relief from the institution is 463. A Dispensary for the city and north-west liberties was established in 1819 by Bishop Knox and the inhabitants, and is supported by voluntary contributions, an annual grant of £30 by the Irish Society, and presentments by the grand jury; the number of patients relieved in that year was 920, and the expenditure £235. 8.

The Clergymen's Widows' Fund originated in voluntary subscriptions, to which Bishop Knox, a munificent benefactor to the charitable institutions of Derry, gave £1000, and most of the Protestant clergy of the diocese contributed: the widows now receive each £35 per annum, and the six senior widows have houses rent-free, called the Widows'-row, adjacent to the cathedral. The Charitable Loan Fund was instituted by Bishop Knox, and the corporation contributed to it £31. 10. per annum until the year 1829, from which period it was unsupported till 1833, when the Irish Society granted £10 annually towards the expense of management. The Ladies' Penny Society has an average income of about £200, including a bequest of £30 per annum, and an annual grant of £30 by the Irish Society; which is applied in distributing clothing, and a few articles of food, among the poor: the society has a branch called the flax fund, to which the Irish Society contribute £20 per annum, for the distribution of certain portions of flax among poor applicants, who are paid for spinning it into yarn. The Poor-shop, instituted in 1821, under the management of a committee of ladies, for providing the poor with clothes and bedding at first cost, on condition of their giving security for payment by weekly instalments at the rate of one penny in the shilling, is supported by subscriptions. A Mendicity Association was instituted in 1825, chiefly through the exertions of Bishop Knox; and a Penitentiary for reclaiming abandoned females, to which there is a school attached, was established in 1829. A Religious Tract Depository, in connexion with which is a religious, moral, and historical society, was established in 1822: the library formed by the society comprises about 500 publications, and at least one-half of the funds must be expended on works purely religious. The above and many other charitable institutions are in a great degree attributable to the indefatigable exertions of the late Lady Hill. Alderman Peter Stanley, in 1751, bequeathed £42 per annum late currency for 31 inhabitants of the city and liberties on the western side of the river; and in 1831, Margaret Evory gave £20 per annum for the poor of the entire parish. The Workhouse of the union, on a site of six acres purchased for £762, was completed in 1840, at a cost of £6780, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers.

In addition to the Ecclesiastical buildings already recorded, here was a Franciscan Mendicant friary of unknown foundation, with a churchyard containing about three acres, the site of which is occupied by Abbey-street and others; the foundations were discovered a few years ago by some workmen, but no vestiges of any of the buildings are now remaining. The only religious house preserved on the erection of the new city was the church of St. Augustine, which was repaired, and used prior to the erection of the present cathedral, after which it was known as "the Little church;" its site is now occupied by the bishop's garden. A small square tower was built by O'Dogherty for O'Donell, in the 15th or 16th century; but no vestige of it can now be traced. Near the Roman Catholic chapel, outside the walls, are St. Columb's Wells, originally three in number, and called by separate names, but of which one is dried up; the water, though considered in remote parts of the island a specific for diseases of the eye, is here held in little repute. In the centre of St. Columb's-lane, adjacent to the wells, is St. Columb's Stone, on each side of which are two oval hollows artificially formed, concerning which various legends are related; the water deposited by rain in these hollows is believed to possess a miraculous power in curing various diseases. The shutting of the gates by the apprentice boys on Dec. 7th, 1688 (O. S.), and the opening of them on Aug. 12th following, are annually commemorated, but the ceremony has been somewhat modified since 1832, in which year an act was passed declaring such a commemoration illegal; they have led to the establishment of three distinct clubs of apprentice boys, under different denominations. George Farquhar, the dramatic poet, was born here in 1678; and the Rev. William Hamilton, D.D., author of "Letters concerning the Northern Coast of the County of Antrim," and other productions on natural history, who was assassinated at the house of Dr. Waller, at Sharon, on March 2nd, 1797, was also a native of the place. Londonderry gives the titles of Earl and Marquess to the family of Stewart.

LONG.—See KNOCKLONG.

LONGFORD (County of), an inland county of the province of LEINSTER, bounded on the south and east by Westmeath, on the north by the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and on the west by that of Roscommon, from which it is separated by the Shannon and Lough Ree. It extends from 53° 30′ to 53° 54′ (N. Lat.), and from 7° 21′ to 7° 53′ (W. Lon.); and comprises an area of 269,409 statute acres, of which 191,823 are arable land, 58,937 uncultivated, 4610 plantation, 364 in towns and villages, and 13,675 under water. The population, in 1821, was 107,570; in 1831, 112,558; and in 1841, 115,491.

It appears uncertain, from Ptolemy's statement, what tribe inhabited this portion of the island in his time. It was afterwards known by the name of the Analè or Annaly, and was the principality of the O'FARRELS, or O'Ferrals, which family was subsequently divided into two main branches; O'Farrel Buy or the Yellow, which held the southern part of the county; and O'Farrel Ban or the White, which possessed the northern portion. The family of O'Cuin, also, had a small territory here, of which Rathcline Castle was the head-quarters and chief fortress. Feargal, chief of this country, was defeated in 960 by Mahon, Prince of Thomond, on the banks of the Inny, near its influx into Lough Ree, to which place the latter had ascended by the Shannon with a number of small vessels; but this event produced no territorial changes. Previously to the arrival of the English, Annaly was included in the province of Meath, and, as such, formed part of the grant made by Henry II. to Hugh de Lacy, who built castles and planted a colony of English there; but this remote part of his territory, although the English families of Tuite and Delamare succeeded in making a settlement in it, yielded him little more than nominal submission, as the O'Farrels held the chief power till the time of Elizabeth. On the division of Meath into two counties in 1543, the Annaly was considered to be a portion of the western division; and it was not formed into a separate county until the 11th of Elizabeth, when it was made shire ground by Sir Henry Sidney, lord-deputy, under the name of Longford, from its chief town, and was considered as one of the seven counties of Connaught. Notwithstanding this interference on the part of the English government, the O'Farrels were still recognised as chieftains until the 29th year of the same reign. Faghan O'Farrel then made a formal surrender of the territory to the queen, and next year obtained a re-grant, subject to the jurisdiction of the English law. But the authority of the English government had little influence during the subsequent reigns of James and Charles I., as is evident from the fact that no charter of incorporation was granted to any town in it by the former of these monarchs, by whom so many places in other counties were endowed with corporate rights; the earliest grant of this nature being that of St. Johnstown, in the beginning of the reign of Charles I., while the charters of the other borough towns, Longford, Granard, and Lanesborough, were not obtained until the middle of that of Charles II. From a remonstrance, also, purporting to be sent by the inhabitants of Longford to Lord Costello, to be presented by him to the Lords Justices in Dublin, dated Nov. 10th, 1641, in which they complain of the grievances under which they laboured as Roman Catholics, and petitioned for an act of oblivion and restitution, liberty of conscience in matters of religion, and a repeal of the statutes of Elizabeth against popery, it appears that the O'Farrel family still maintained almost the exclusive control over the county, as the 26 signatures affixed to the document are all of this name. Shortly after the breaking out of the war of 1641, Longford Castle was besieged and taken by the Irish for the O'Farrels, and the garrison put to the sword, notwithstanding it had surrendered on promise of quarter. Castle Forbes, the only other fortress in the county held for the government, also fell into the power of the insurgents. But the ultimate triumph of Cromwell's forces entirely reversed the fate of the country, and the O'Farrels lost both their property and influence, which have since been vested in other and various hands.

This county is partly in the diocese of Meath, but chiefly in that of Ardagh; and in the archdiocese of Armagh. For purposes of CIVIL JURISDICTION it is divided into the baronies of Abbeyshrule, Ardagh, Granard, Longford, Moydow, and Rathcline; and it contains the market and assize town of Longford, the market-towns of Granard and Lanesborough, the disfranchised borough of St. Johnstown (now a village), the market and post towns of Edgeworthstown and Ballymahon, the post-towns of Colehill and Newtown-Forbes, the villages of Bunlahy, Ballinamuck, Drumlish, Killashee, and Keenagh, and the episcopal town or village of Ardagh. The county sent ten members to the Irish parliament; two for the county at large, and two for each of the boroughs of Longford, Granard, Lanesborough, and St. Johnstown; but since the Union its sole representatives have been the two for the county, who are elected at Longford. The constituency, as registered in 1841, amounted to 1388, of whom 232 were £50, 126 £20, and 881 £10, freeholders; and 3 £50, 14 £20, and 132 £10, leaseholders. The shire is included in the North-West circuit: the assizes and general quarter-sessions are held at Longford, where the county gaol and court-house are situated; quarter-sessions are also held at Ballymahon and at Granard. The county is divided into eight petty-sessions' districts, namely, Ballymahon, Carrickboy, Edgeworthstown, Granard, Keenagh, Killashee, Longford, and Newtown-Forbes. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 12 deputy-lieutenants, and 20 other magistrates, together with the usual county officers. There are 27 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of one county inspector, 4 sub-inspectors, 5 head-constables, 23 constables, and 127 constables, with six horses; the expense of whose maintenance, in 1842, was £8506. The district lunatic asylum for this county, and the King's, Queen's, and Westmeath, is at Maryborough; the county infirmary is at Longford, and there are dispensaries at Ballymahon, Edgeworthstown, Granard, and Keenagh, supported equally by grand jury presentments and private subscription. The total amount of grand jury presentments, for the year 1844, was £16,503. In military arrangements the county is in the Athlone district; there are barracks at Longford for infantry and cavalry, and at Granard for infantry, together capable of accommodating 15 officers, 391 men, and 202 horses.

The general features of the SURFACE present little to attract the eye, or excite the imagination. It is for the most part flat, and in many places overspread with large tracts of bog: towards the north, where it borders on the county of Leitrim, it rises into bleak and sterile mountains. In its other extremity, however, the country improves very much, particularly on the banks of the Inny, where the land is more fertile and is well cultivated: near Ballymahon the scenery is varied and beautiful. Lakes are numerous in many parts, particularly in the baronies of Longford and Granard; the most extensive are, Lough Gownagh, in the northern extremity of the county, and Lough Kinale, near Granard, both of which contribute to form the boundary between this county and Cavan. In each are several islands, and each possesses considerable interest from the surrounding scenery, which is much heightened by young and flourishing plantations. The principal islands in Lough Gownagh are Innismore, Inchmory, Innisdavoge, and Jasper Island, each of which is fertile, planted or embellished with remains of ancient buildings. Those of Lough Kinale are Chapel Island and Bruree: the former has the ruins of an old church on it; the latter is planted. The other more remarkable lakes are Loughs Bon, Bonnow, Drum, Derry, Drumurry, Doogary, Gurteen, Tully, and Glin: the last-named, which is on the borders of the county eastward of Edgeworthstown, receives several streams from the north and west, and empties its waters by a winding river into Lough Iron, in the county of Westmeath. The Shannon is the boundary along the whole western verge of the county, separating it from Connaught, and for the greater part of its course presents more the appearance of a lake than of a river: near the north-western boundary of Longford is Lough Forbes, about five miles long by one broad; and at Lanesborough is the commencement of Lough Ree, a noble expanse of water extending from that town to the neighbourhood of Athlone. The islands of this latter lake are numerous, and some of them large; those which may be considered to belong to the county of Longford are All Saints, Inchban, Innisbofin, Innisclocran, Quakers' Island, and Inchynough.

The SOIL is exceedingly various, changing from a light thin mould to a deep loamy clay, without any apparent variation in the geological arrangement: much of the north is in a state of nature; and the practicability of reclaiming and cultivating there, to any profitable purpose, is exceedingly doubtful. Towards the south, the prevailing character is a rich vegetable mould resting on blue clay, very retentive of moisture, and based on a stratum of yellow marl, two or three feet thick, ultimately resting either on an excellent marl or on limestone-gravel. In this part of the county, every kind of grain and green crop may be cultivated to the greatest advantage. The barony of Granard is mostly good land, producing a short, close, and sweet herbage; the elevated district between Edgeworthstown and Longford has a soil which yields abundant crops of grain, but westward of the latter place, except in the immediate neighbourhood of Newtown-Forbes, the land is much encumbered with surface water, the injurious effects of which could be easily obviated by a judicious system of draining. The level parts of the county are mostly in pasture, producing great varieties of acidulous plants, occasioned by the overflowing of the rivers, or by the accumulation of surface water: these meadows, if properly drained and secured, would rank among some of the best in Ireland. Bogs are very numerous in many parts of the county, and every where capable of drainage and reclamation; but in consequence of the water being suffered to remain in them, numerous gullies or swallows are formed, which though always full never run over, although numerous small streams flow into them; whence it is evident that their waters must find a subterraneous passage to the Shannon, the Inny, or some other river, thus silently but forcibly pointing out the means by which the land may be made available to the service of man. The chief CROPS are oats and potatoes, but the sowing of wheat and barley is becoming more general; and flax, rape, clover, turnips, and vetches are sometimes sown. Rape thrives peculiarly well on boggy soil, and the produce is every where very great. The practice of laying down land with grass or clover seeds, is gaining ground every year. All the surplus grain is purchased in Longford and other markets, and sent down the Royal Canal to Dublin or Drogheda. The agricultural implements are of an inferior description, except with the gentry and wealthier farmers; one-horse carts are universal.

Great improvements have been made in the breed of CATTLE; the short-horned stock appears to be a decided favourite. A cross between the Durham and the long-horned native breed grows to a good size, and fattens well. Although this is not a sheep-feeding country, the breed of that useful and profitable animal has not been neglected; the New Leicester is a favourite with all the large landholders, but a cross between it and the small short-woolled sheep of the country suits the light and upland soils better. The horses are chiefly of a slight active breed, well adapted for light harness, but not equal as saddle-horses to those of Roscommon, Galway, and Sligo. Pigs are universally kept, and of every possible variety of breed; they are fattened for the merchants and curers of Longford, who ship great quantities of pork and bacon for Dublin, London, and Liverpool. Dairies upon an extensive scale are not very general, but great quantities of butter are made, and chiefly sold in Longford and Ballymahon for the English markets. The meadows in the lower districts produce hay in great abundance, but it is much mixed with rushes and other aquatic plants; it is every where cut too late in the season, the mowing seldom beginning till September, and is badly managed. WOODS are rare: the land is well adapted to the growth of timber, and in many places throws up shoots spontaneously, particularly of oak, hazel, alder, and birch, which only require the protecting hand of man to attain their full growth; but cattle are every where suffered to browse upon them, and hence nothing but brushwood and stunted bushes remain. There is some old timber at Castle Forbes, which, together with the plantations around Newtown-Forbes, shews to great advantage; also good plantations at Edgeworthstown, near Granard, on the shores of the lakes, on the road between Longford and Edgeworthstown, and in a few other places. The fences are generally good, being for the most part ditches faced with sods or stones, and having quickset hedges planted on the breast. Draining and irrigation appear to be quite unknown here, although no district in the province requires them more. The scented myrtle is found in all the bogs, which every where present an ample field for the pursuits of the botanist, as the plants are numerous and many rare species are found, particularly in the barony of Longford. Orchards and gardens are sometimes seen near the small farmhouses, and add greatly to their comfortable appearance.

The GEOLOGY of Longford may be briefly noticed. The northern boundary of the great limestone field of Ireland passes through this county, forming part of the hilly tract which, rising in the north-eastern part of it, proceeds into several of the northern counties. The line of division between the limestone and clay-slate proceeds from the Camlin river, near Longford, by St. Johnstown, between Lough Kinale and Lough Gownagh, to the head of Lough Sheelin. The portion of the county to the south of this line is based on limestone, the general range of which approaches to the east and west, with the dip towards the south. An isolated mass of sandstone forms within the limestone field the hill of Slieve Goldry, near Ardagh; and another at Ballymahon, extends on both sides to the Inny: this kind of rock may also be observed to the west of the clay-slate formation, in the north-western extremity of the county, occupying likewise, beyond its limits, a considerable space on both sides of the Shannon in the counties of Roscommon and Leitrim; and on the hill at Shroid, a little east of Longford, conglomerate of a compact structure crosses the country in a very extraordinary manner, rising in wavy undulations, frequently submerging, and again presenting itself on the surface. There are numerous escars in all the level districts, forming a portion of the great chain which passes from the coast of Killala bay, through the centre of the island, to Lough Neagh. Here, as in every other part of their course, they are formed of fragments of primitive and secondary rocks, evidently rounded by attrition; but the greater portion of nodules in the escars of this county are of limestone; and near the base, in almost every instance, are quantities of fine calcareous sand and marl, which are every where used as manure, and, on some kinds of land, are far more beneficial than lime. Notwithstanding the abundance of limestone, sandstone, and gravel, pure water is rather scarce. At Ledwithstown is a spring of excellent water gushing out of the marble rock in a copious stream, which is very highly esteemed.

The mineral treasures of Longford are few. Lead-ore has been found in several of the limestone-quarries, but no practical efforts have yet been made to trace out the vein; it has also been found in some of the mountain streams, and even turned up by the plough. Ochres of various colours are common. Near the shores of Lough Gownagh are extensive rocks of ironstone of a very superior kind, equal to the best Swedish ore; and the rocks seem to be inexhaustible, not being detached, or in thin layers like those of the Arigna district, but regular in formation and of a deep-red colour. Coal-shale appears in several places around Burlaghy, and near Lough Gownagh; but from the situation and arrangement of the contiguous strata, its continuation is doubtful. Near Ledwithstown, and in some other places, marble of a deep-grey colour is very abundant; it takes a high polish, and is worked into chimney-pieces and other domestic ornaments. An analysis of the blue marl that forms a bed more than ten feet thick under the bog near the Inny, gave, of carbonate of lime 44.4 parts, carbonate of magnesia 1.4, alumine 27.2, and silex 27.0. The white marl of the same district gave, of carbonate of lime 87.3 parts, bog-stuff and vegetable matter 10.7, alumine 1.0, silex 0.9, and oxyde of iron 0.1. The blue clay under the bog near the Shannon gave, of carbonate of lime 53.0 parts, alumine 36.0, silex 11.0.

Coarse linen-cloth, and linen-yarn, are manufactured to some extent, and sent to markets in other counties: the first earl of Granard took great pains to introduce this branch of manufacture among his tenantry at Newtown-Forbes. Flannels, friezes, and linsey-woolseys, chiefly for domestic consumption, are manufactured in several places. The RIVERS that water the interior of the county are the Camlin and the Keenagh. The source of the former is amid the numerous springs around Granard: its course is uncommonly winding, in consequence of the flatness of the valley through which it flows after quitting the hill of Granard, insomuch that the country is flooded to a great extent in winter; it runs westward, and joins the Shannon at Tarmonbarry. The latter rises in the south, and flows northward to the Shannon. The Fallen and Owenamount are insignificant streams. The Inny, which forms part of the southern boundary of the county, flows through a beautiful and rich country in a winding course, by Ballymahon, to Lough Ree: it contains salmon, trout, pike, perch, roach, tench, bream, and eels; the last are highly esteemed. It is said that since the introduction of perch, all other kinds of fish except eels have grown scarce both in Lough Ree and in the Inny. Few rivers present so many facilities as this for water-carriage; its course is very slow. The total fall from Finea to the Shannon is 90 feet; and the main obstructions to its navigation are a ridge of rocks between Newcastle and Ballymahon, and two shallows between the latter town and the Shannon. The Royal Canal enters the county from Westmeath, by an aqueduct over the Inny near Tenellick, passing westward by Ballymahon, Keenagh, and Mosstown, to Killashee, whence a branch leads northward to the town of Longford, while the main line from the junction continues westward until it joins the Shannon at Richmond Harbour, a mile below Tarmonbarry. This line of communication, through the heart of the country, is of the greatest advantage to commercial interests; boats of 20 tons convey bulky articles, and fly-boats, travelling at the rate of 7 miles an hour, ply constantly between Longford and Dublin. The Roads are numerous and well laid out, and the material of which they are made is abundant and of very good quality; but in general they are very wet throughout every part, a defect arising entirely from want of due attention to keep the water-courses open.

The REMAINS of remote ANTIQUITY are very few in number. A large rath, usually called the Moat of Granard, stands at one end of the main street of that town; another, called Lisardowlin, situated near the road from Longford to Edgeworthstown, is by the people of this country generally believed to be the centre of Ireland. Monastic institutions were numerous, and for the most part held in great veneration, and well endowed. Abbeyshrule belonged to the Canons Regular; Ardagh, to the Franciscans; and Lerha or Laragh, to the Cistercians: the wealthy abbey of Longford was founded by the O'Farrels; there were also abbeys or priories at Moydow, Clone, Clonebrone, Derg, Druimchei, and Killinmore, besides those on the islands of Innismorey, Innisbofin, Innisclora, and All Saints. Ruins of all the above still remain; but of the priories at Ballynasaggard, Kilglass, and St. Johnstown, no vestiges of the original buildings remain, and their actual site is matter of doubt. At Lanesborough are the ruins of a collegiate church, or preceptory, originally founded by the Knights Templars. The remains of ancient castles are not so numerous here as in most of the other level counties. Granard Castle is built on a hill rising to a considerable height above the town, and commanding an extensive view over all the flat country. Besides Castle Forbes, the Forbes family had a fortified mansion at Longford, which was burned by the O'Nials in 1605. At Tenellick is the ruin of a strong castle, and near Ballymahon are the remains of two others. There are still remains of Rathcline Castle, the chief residence of the O'Cuins; and, not far from it, the ruins of a very ancient church. At Ballymahon was a strong castle erected to defend the ford of the Inny, the only traces of which are the cellars, under a house built on its ruins. Barnacor Castle and Lot's Castle, on the Inny, on the opposite banks, were both erected to protect the important pass or ford of that river; and at Castlecor are some remains of its ancient fortress. Fossil remains of various kinds have been discovered in the limestone caverns and fissures; many of them are of animals unknown in these regions, and several of species now extinct in Ireland. The bones and horns of the elk have been dug up in the marl at the foot of the Escars, and beneath several of the bogs; also, in a small lake near Ballinalee the antlers and bones of the red-deer are often found quite sound, having been preserved by the antiseptic properties of the bog-water.

There are but few resident noblemen, or gentry of large estates: the mansions and demesnes deserving of notice are described in their respective parishes. In few parts of Ireland can persons of limited income live cheaper or better than here. The towns have plentiful and cheap markets for beef, mutton, fowl, and fresh-water fish, wild-fowl in abundance, and the water-fowl free from the fishy flavour of those from the sea-coast: cod and haddock from Galway, and oysters from the same shores, may be obtained at moderate prices. The diet, and mode of living, of the small farmers and others, are very indifferent; they scarcely ever taste flesh meat, and not often any thing but potatoes: yet they are strong, healthy, and active, and their general appearance is prepossessing. The women wear scarlet cloaks, with hoods, which they seldom use, as they cover their heads with handkerchiefs: the rest of their dress consists indifferently of cotton chequer and linsey-woolsey. The people of the lowest order travel barefoot, carrying their shoes and stockings in their hands, till they draw near their place of destination; their fuel is invariably turf, which can be procured in great abundance and of very superior quality. Coal is sometimes brought by the canal, for the use of the wealthier classes; but even these generally burn turf. The prevalent diseases are, inflammatory and putrid fever in summer and autumn, and ague, which latter is generally contracted in Meath, whither the labourers go to the harvest, and where they suffer much from the scarcity of fuel, which they enjoy in plenty at home. The lower orders are shrewd, intelligent, and industrious, fond of manly exercises and amusements, such as foot-ball, hurling, and wrestling, but on Sunday evenings the chief and invariable amusement is dancing. They are of a very proud and independent spirit, which manifests itself most conspicuously in their great repugnance to hire as servants, an occupation considered by them to be highly disreputable; hence they remain at home, living in penury in a cabin and on a small patch of ground. They are exceedingly litigious, ever ready to have recourse to the law upon the most trivial subjects; they are also extremely superstitious. The first day of the year, and of the month or week, is considered the most proper time to commence an undertaking. No one removes to a new habitation on a Friday. A large candle is lighted on Christmas-night, and suffered to burn out: should it be extinguished by accident, or otherwise, before it be completely burned away, it is considered as a certain prognostic of the death of the head of the family. The 1st of May, and Midsummer-day, are observed with great regularity, as are all the other festivals usual throughout the country; that of Hallow-Eve concludes with a supper of boiled wheat buttered and sweetened, called Granbree. In the summer months, many individuals set out on pilgrimages either to holy wells in the vicinity, or to Lough Derg, in Donegal, to which latter place persons in affluent circumstances have been known to walk barefoot as a penance. The places at which violent or sudden deaths have occurred, particularly if near a road, are marked by heaps of stones, to which every passenger deems it a duty incumbent on him to add one. The Irish language is scarcely ever heard, except in the mountainous districts among the old people; adults and children every where speak English. Of the ancient families of this county, scarce any traces now remain: titles of the most romantic kind were assumed and borne by the heads of several clans, all of which have long since fallen into disuse.

LONGFORD, a market and post town, the head of a union, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of TEMPLEMICHAEL, partly in the barony of LONGFORD, but chiefly in that of ARDAGH, county of LONGFORD (of which it is the chief town), and province of LEINSTER, 20 miles (N.W.) from Mullingar, and 58½ (W.N.W.) from Dublin, on the coach-road to Carrick-on-Shannon; containing 4966 inhabitants. This place, anciently called Athfadha, was at a very early period the site of a monastery, of which St. Idus, a disciple of St. Patrick, was abbot; and in 1400 a Dominican abbey was founded here in honour of the Blessed Virgin, by O'Ferral, Prince of Annaly. The latter building was destroyed by fire in 1429; and Pope Martin V., and his successor, Eugene IV., granted indulgences to all who should contribute to its restoration. The establishment appears to have subsisted till the Dissolution, after which it was successively granted to different parties in the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth, and was finally given to Francis, Viscount Valentia, in 1615, by James I., who had previously allowed a market and fair to be held at this place. Francis, Lord Aungier, becoming proprietor of the town, obtained from the same monarch the grant of an additional market, and two more fairs, in 1619. The castle, which from its strength had become a post of importance, was, in 1641, taken by the insurgents for the O'Farrels or O'Ferrals, and the garrison put to the sword. Francis, Lord Aungier, Baron of Longford, in 1657, obtained from Charles II. the erection of his lands into a manor, with the power of holding a court of record before his seneschal, with jurisdiction to the amount of £200; of appointing bailiffs for his manor court; and maintaining a gaol for the manor and town of Longford, which place, under the same charter, was incorporated by the designation of the "Sovereign, Bailiffs, and Burgesses of the Borough and Town of Longford."

The TOWN is situated on the small river Camlin, and in 1841, contained 804 houses, many of which are well built and of handsome appearance; the streets are watched, cleansed, and paved, under the act 9th George IV., cap. 82, by assessments on all houses above the value of £5 per annum. At the end of the principal street are cavalry barracks, adapted for 9 officers and 222 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 147 horses, and an hospital for 24 patients. About half a mile beyond these are artillery barracks for 4 officers and 136 non-commissioned officers and privates, with stabling for 55 horses, and an hospital for 16 patients. The TRADE of the town has considerably increased since the extension into it of a branch from the Royal Canal, and it now ranks among the best markets for grain, pork, bacon, and butter. The linen trade has revived, but not to its former extent. In the excise arrangements Longford is within the district of Athlone. A branch of the Bank of Ireland has been established since 1834, as also a branch of the National Bank; a spacious market-house, and corn-stores along the canal, have been erected by the Earl of Longford; several new houses have been built, and some new streets laid out, and the town is rapidly improving. There is a large distillery, in which, on an average, about 50,000 gallons of whisky are annually made, and 35 men employed; there are also a large brewery and a tannery. At the termination of the new cut from the Royal Canal, a basin for boats has been constructed by the Earl of Longford, who has also erected a butter-market and some shambles at his own expense. A passage-boat to Dublin plies daily on the canal, affording facility of intercourse with the metropolis and other towns; and the situation and other local advantages of the town are favourable to the extension of its trade. An act was passed in 1845 for making a railway from Dublin to Mullingar and Longford, to be called the "Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland:" this line is to run chiefly upon the banks of the canal, which has been purchased by the Railway Company. One part of the original scheme, consisting of a line branching from Mullingar to Athlone, has been relinquished for a time in consequence of the opposition of the projected Dublin and Galway railway; that line, however, having been defeated in the session of 1845, the Midland Great Western Company propose to apply for powers to extend this line, in one direction from Mullingar, by Athlone, to Galway, and in another, from its present termination at Longford, to Sligo. The length of the line to Longford will be 77½ British miles; and the capital of the company is one million, with power to raise £333,000 by loans. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday; the latter, which is the principal market, is amply supplied with corn, butter, bacon, pigs, hemp, and flax, and is numerously attended. The fairs are on March 25th, June 10th, Aug. 19th, and Oct. 22nd; the June and October fairs are most frequented.

The corporation, which was dissolved by the act 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 108, consisted of a sovereign, two bailiffs, 12 burgesses, and an indefinite number of freemen, assisted by a recorder, town-clerk, two serjeants-at-mace, and inferior officers. The sovereign, who might appoint a deputy, and was a justice of the peace, coroner, and clerk-of-the-market, and the bailiffs, were chosen annually from the burgesses on the Monday after Christmas-day, and sworn into office on the Monday after the 29th of September; the burgesses filled up vacancies as they occurred, by a majority of their own body, by whom also freemen were admitted; the recorder and town-clerk were appointed by the lord of the manor, who was patron of the borough and generally sovereign, and the inferior officers by the corporation. The corporation, by their charter, returned two members to the Irish parliament till the Union, when the borough was disfranchised. The manor courts have fallen almost into disuse, trifling causes only being summarily decided by the seneschal; and the corporation, for some time previously to its dissolution, exercised but few municipal functions, having little more than a nominal existence. A court was held by the deputy-sovereign on Monday and Saturday, chiefly for the adjustment of claims for labour. The assizes for the county are held here regularly, and the quarter-sessions alternately here and at Ballymahon; petty-sessions are held at Newtown-Forbes, about 2¼ miles distant, and there is a chief constabulary police station in the town. The court-house is a neat building. A gaol, well adapted to the classification of prisoners, was erected in 1825, on the radiating principle, and contains 8 day-rooms and airing-yards (in one of which is a tread-mill), with separate cells for the prisoners, who are instructed by the school-master and matron; three looms are also kept in the gaol, for the employment of such as can weave. To the north-east of the town is Carrickglass, the handsome seat of the Right Hon. T. Lefroy, LL.D., a baron of the exchequer; the demesne of which is watered by the Camlin: in the vicinity are likewise Mount Jessop, the residence of the Jessop family; Clonbolt, of the Armstrongs; and, about two miles distant, Castle Forbes, the seat of the Earl of Granard. The parish church, a handsome edifice, is situated in the town; and there are a Roman Catholic chapel, and places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and Wesleyan Methodists. The county infirmary and dispensary are in the town, and there are 12 houses, built by Lord Longford, inhabited rent-free by the poor. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 6¾ acres held at a rent of £35, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £7000, and is constructed to contain 1000 paupers. The town gives the title of Baron to the Pakenham family.

LONG-ISLAND, in the parish of Skull, union of Skibbereen, Western division of the barony of West Carbery, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 4 miles (S. W.) from Skull, and on the south-west coast; containing about 260 inhabitants. It was formerly called Innisfadda (the Irish for Loug-Island), and the "Isle of Dogs;" and it is traditionally stated that, in 830, such a violent tempest occurred that the sea broke over the island, and forced it asunder into three parts. The isle is situated on a fine harbour of the same name, and forms one side of the entrance to Roaring-water bay: though not more than a quarter of a mile wide, it is nearly two miles in length, and comprises about 154 acres of land, chiefly under tillage, and tolerably well cultivated by the spade. The substratum is clay-slate, in some places rising into rocky knolls, but even these produce good herbage; and corn and potatoes, more than sufficient for the support of the inhabitants, are produced: fuel, however, is extremely scarce. Most of the men are engaged in fishing or as pilots. Here is a detachment from the coast-guard station at Crookhaven. The harbour is well sheltered, easy of access, and capable of receiving the largest ships, which may enter at either end of the island, care being taken to avoid a spit of sand extending in a northern direction more than half way across the channel, from about half a mile within the east end of the island: the Kings' sound is considered the safest entrance.

LONGWOOD, a village, in the parish of Clonard, union of Trim, barony of Upper Moyfenragh, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 3½ miles (E. N. E.) from Clonard, and near the great western road from Dublin to Connaught; containing 587 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Blackwater, and comprises 121 houses. Here is a station of the constabulary police; petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays, and fairs on Feb. 2nd, Whit-Tuesday, July 12th, and Dec. 11th. In the Roman Catholic divisions the village is the head of a district, comprising part of the parish of Clonard and the entire of Killyon, and containing the chapels of Longwood and Killyon; the former, situated near the village, is a large plain edifice.—See Clonard.

LORHA, or Lorragh, a parish, in the union of Parsonstown, barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 8½ miles (W.) from Parsonstown, on the road to Portumna; containing 4742 inhabitants, of whom 312 are in the village. This place was anciently distinguished for its religious establishments, the earliest of which was an abbey for Canons Regular, founded by St. Ruadan, who presided here over 150 monks and died in 584. The establishment appears to have flourished without interruption till 844, when, according to Archdall, Turgesius, with his Norwegian forces, destroyed the town; he was soon after taken prisoner by Maolseachlain, King of Meath, and drowned in Lough Ainin. After its restoration the abbey was destroyed by accidental fires in 1154 and 1157, and in 1179 the town was destroyed by fire. The hand of St. Ruadan was preserved in a silver case in this abbey till its suppression. A Dominican friary, also, was founded here in 1269, by Walter de Burgh, Earl of Ulster; in which, in 1688, a provincial chapter of the order was held, when 150 friars clothed in their proper habits assisted. The parish comprises 16,521 statute acres: the land in cultivation is of good quality, and the system of agriculture improving; the scenery is pleasingly diversified, and derives much interest from the venerable ruins of the abbey and friary. The principal seats are, Abbeville; Portland; Belle-Isle, of Lord Avonmore; Harvest Lodge; Ballymacegan; Kilcarron; and Grange. The village, containing 56 houses, is pleasantly situated within three miles of the river Shannon; and has a receiving-house for letters in connexion with the office of Burris-o'Kane.

The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Killaloe, forming part of the union of Aglishcloghane or Lorha; the tithe rent-charge is £327. 7. The glebe-house was built in 1816 by the then incumbent, aided by a gift of £100 and a loan of £1200 from the Board of First Fruits, and is a handsome residence; the glebe of the union comprises 10 acres. The church has been repaired by a grant of £113 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is also a church at Dorrha, in the union. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Dorrha; the chapel here is a plain modern building near the ruins of the Dominican friary, and there is a chapel at Dorrha. A school was erected in 1832, on a site given, with a liberal subscription, by Mr. Toone; the expense of the building was £150, towards which the National Board contributed £70. There are several other schools; and a dispensary. The remains of the Dominican abbey, the walls of which are nearly entire, are situated in a fertile spot on a rivulet which falls into the Shannon; the prevailing character is the early English style. The western gable is surmounted by a small belfry turret, and above the entrance is a handsome window; the bell, which at the suppression of the monastery had been taken down and hid in a field, was discovered about 40 years since, and restored: the interior of the edifice contains several mural tablets, one of which bears the arms of the Mac Egan family. There are some ruins of Ballyquirk Castle, near which is the modern house of that name; and also of Lackeen Castle.

LORUM, a parish, in the barony of Ibrone East, union and county of Carlow, and province of Leinster, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Leighlin-Bridge, and on the road from Carlow to New Ross; containing 1493 inhabitants. It comprises 5345 statute acres, and contains the seats of Corrowmore, the property of the Rudkin family; Corris; and Kilgreaney. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Leighlin, episcopally united to the vicarages of Slyguffe and Ballyellin, and augmented by the rectory of Ballyellin under the provisions of the 11th and 12th of William III., cap. 2, together constituting the union of Lorum, in the gift of the Bishop: the rectory is impropriate in Lord Cloncurry. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £220. 13. 6., of which two-thirds are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; the tithe of the entire benefice of the vicar is £456. 18. 6. There is no glebe-house or glebe. The church was completed in 1840, at a cost of £1489, of which £833 were from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £656 private subscriptions. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Bagnalstown, and has a chapel at Ballinkellin. The parochial school was built, and is supported, by subscription; in the national school about 160 children are educated: there is also a Sunday school.

LOUGHBEG, a village, in the parish of Barnahely, union of Cork, barony of Kerricurrihy, county of Cork, and province of Munster; containing 48 houses, and 250 inhabitants.

LOUGHBRACCAN, a parish, in the union of Ardee, barony of Lower Slane, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 2 miles (E.) from Nobber, and on the road from Dublin, by Slane, to Londonderry; containing 659 inhabitants. It comprises 2159¾ statute acres: the land, which is of good quality, is partly in tillage and partly in pasture. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, entirely appropriate to the see: the tithe rent-charge is £83. 14. For the performance of clerical duties Loughbraccan forms part of the perpetual curacy of Nobber; and in the Roman Catholic divisions, part of the district of Drumconra. The ruins of the church, which stand on the summit of a hill, have a striking appearance.

LOUGHBRICKLAND, a post-town, in the parish of Aghaderg, union of Banbridge, barony of Upper Iveagh, county of Down, and province of Ulster, 8 miles (N. E.) from Newry, and 58½ (N.) from Dublin, on the road from Newry to Belfast; containing 647 inhabitants. This town, which is prettily situated on the lake from which it takes its name, owes its rise to Sir Marmaduke Whitchurch, to whom Queen Elizabeth, in 1585, granted the adjacent lands. Sir Marmaduke built a castle on the shore of the lake, for the protection of a pass where three roads united, and, soon after, a church and a mill; and laid the foundation of a town, in which a Protestant colony was settled, and for which he obtained the grant of a market and two fairs. In 1641 the castle was dismantled, and the town and church were destroyed by fire; in this desolate condition the place remained till 1688, when the church was rebuilt and the town began gradually to improve. It consists of one principal street, from which two smaller streets branch off; and contains 134 houses, most of them well built and of handsome appearance: the whole town has a cheerful and thriving aspect. The lake, which is supposed to have taken its name from the speckled trout with which it is said to have formerly abounded, comprises an area of about 70 Irish acres, and is bordered on its western side by the road to Belfast; it forms the summit level of the Newry canal, to which its waters are conveyed through Lough Shark, and is itself supplied from a spring within, its superfluous water escaping through a sluice at the north-western extremity. Fairs are held on the third Tuesday in every month, for horses, cattle, pigs, and pedlery. There are several seats in the immediate neighbourhood. The parish church, a handsome edifice with a square tower and octagonal spire, is situated in the centre of the town; and nearly opposite to it is the Roman Catholic chapel, in the later English style, built at an expense of £1700 on a site presented by N. C. Whyte, Esq., who also gave £400 towards its erection. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and Primitive Methodists. On the shore of the lake is a modern house, erected in 1812 on the site of the ancient castle, which was then taken down. The Danes, who had ravaged the north of Ireland, were defeated here by the Irish under Mac Lorriagh, in 1187.—See Aghaderg.

LOUGHCREW, a parish, in the union of Oldcastle, barony of Demifore, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, 2½ miles (S. S. E.) from Oldcastle, on the road to Kells; containing 1412 inhabitants. It comprises 5981¾ statute acres; there is no waste or unprofitable land, and the state of agriculture is improving, the drill system and a better description of stock having been lately introduced. There are quarries of good building-stone; and at the hamlet of Millbrook are some mills. Loughcrew House, the residence of the Napier family, is a magnificent structure in the Grecian-Ionic style, erected from designs by Mr. Cockerell, of London; it is faced entirely with hewn limestone, has a noble portico, and contains some good paintings by the old masters. The mansion, the out-offices (which are of a superior order), and the improvements in the demesne, are stated to have cost upwards of £80,000. The demesne comprises about 900 plantation acres, of which nearly 200 are planted; the principal approach is by a lodge of elegant design, and the scenery in the vicinity is of a pleasing character. The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Meath, united by act of council, in 1682, to the rectory of Moylough and the vicarage of Diamor, and by episcopal authority, in 1815, to the rectory of Russagh or Clonabreny, together constituting the union of Loughcrew, in the patronage of the Crown: the rectory is impropriate in E. Rotheram, of Crossdrum, Esq. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £124. 12. 4., payable in equal portions to the impropriator and vicar; and the entire tithe of the benefice of the incumbent is £277. 5. 6. The glebe-house was built in 1821, at an expense of £1879, of which £1275 were granted as a loan by the late Board of First Fruits, £100 as a gift, and the remainder was defrayed by the incumbent. The glebe comprises 40 plantation acres, valued at £50 British per annum; part of which is subject to a rent of £32. 15. The church, an ancient structure, for the repair of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners some years ago granted £181, has been recently pulled down, and a new one erected, at the cost of £1270, of which £500 were raised by subscription, and £770 were a grant from the same commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Oldcastle, and has a chapel at Loughcrew.

LOUGH DERG.—See TEMPLECARNE.

LOUGHGALL, or LEVALLEY-EGLISH, a post-town and parish, partly in the barony of ARMAGH, but chiefly in that of O'NEILLAND WEST, union and county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (N.E.) from Armagh, and 70 (N.) from Dublin, on the great north road from Derry, through Dungannon, to Armagh; containing 9615 inhabitants, of whom 394 are in the town. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Blackwater, and comprises, with the district parish of Charlemont, 10,924½ statute acres, of which 2449¾ are in the barony of Armagh, and the remainder in O'Neilland West; 59½ acres are water, and of the land about two-thirds are exceedingly rich and fertile, and the remainder of inferior quality. The system of agriculture has been highly improved under the auspices of the resident gentry, and excellent crops are raised; there is some valuable bog, but no waste land. Limestone abounds, and is extensively quarried for agricultural purposes and for repairing the roads. The weaving of linen-cloth is carried on here to a considerable extent, affording employment to more than 600 persons, who are engaged by the manufacturers and bleachers of Banbridge. The principal seats are, Drumilly, an ancient mansion with two lofty square towers projecting from the front, and overlooking the village; Hockley Lodge; Ardress; Green Hall; Summer Island, belonging to Colonel Sir W. Verner; Eden Cottage; Cloven Eden; and Loughgall House. The fine demesne of Castle-Dillon, the seat of Sir Thos. Molyneux, which is described particularly in the account of Richhill, is partly in this parish and partly in that of Armagh. The village or town, though small, is beautifully situated in a fertile valley in the midst of a richly cultivated and picturesque country; and consists of 71 houses, the greater number of which are large, well built, and of handsome appearance. There is a market-house; but the market, and also four fairs which were formerly held, have been discontinued. A constabulary police force is stationed here; and a manorial court is held monthly before the seneschal, for the recovery of debts not exceeding 40s.

The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, constituting the corps of the prebend of Loughgall in the cathedral of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate: the tithe rent-charge is £384. 7. 6. The glebe-house is a handsome residence, on which, in 1782, £220. 17. were expended in improvements; the glebe comprises 139¾ statute acres, valued at £179 per annum, which, together with houses and gardens in the village, valued at £48. 5., makes the whole value of the prebend £611. 12. 6. per annum. The church, a neat edifice in the early English style, with a square tower, was built in 1795 by subscription and assessments; a gallery was added to it in 1822, at an expense of £110. 15., and it has been since repaired by a grant of £110 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The building is of hewn marble; the interior is elegantly arranged, and contains a handsome cenotaph to Bishop Cope, who was for some time curate of the parish. There is a district church at Charlemont, the living of which is a perpetual curacy. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also that of Tartaragan; in each parish is a chapel. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly, and at Ballymagerney is a place of worship for Methodists. Of several schools, one was endowed with a school-house and two acres of land by Colonel Cope, and is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity; three are supported by Mr. Cope, and one by donations from the incumbent and Sir T. Molyneux. Nearly in the centre of the village are the ruins of the ancient church, of which the western gable and turret are nearly entire.

LOUGHGILLY, a parish, partly in the barony of LOWER FEWS, and partly in that of UPPER FEWS, but chiefly in the barony of LOWER ORIOR, or ORIER, union of NEWRY, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Market-Hill, and on the road from Armagh to Newry; containing, with the district parish of Balcek and the village of Mountnorris (which see), 9852 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the lake on which it is situated, comprises 16,029½ statute acres, including 80½ of water; 5299 are in Lower Fews, 2289¼ in Upper Fews, and 8441¼ in Lower Orior. The lake extended several miles in length from Poyntz-Pass to Mountnorris, forming a continued morass, and fortified by a military post at the former place, and at the latter by another erected by General Norris, from whom that station had its name; but with the exception of about 3 acres of water near the glebe-house, the whole has been drained and brought into cultivation. The land in the parish is fertile:

about three-fourths are under tillage, and in a very high state of cultivation; the remainder, though in some parts rocky, affords good pasture. Slate is found, but the quarries are not at present worked. There are several substantial and some handsome houses, the principal of which is Glenanne, an elegant residence. In the southern part of the parish is a small lake, called Shaw's Lough, from which a stream flows through Glenanne. This stream was a convenient site for some extensive mills for spinning cotton and weaving calico, in which were 170 power-looms, affording employment to nearly 300 persons; the mills were lately burned down, and for the last two years have been in ruins. There are still, however, bleach-greens and other mills here, in which manufactured goods are finished for the English markets; and in the townland of Tullyallen are two large mills for finishing linen-cloth. Since the establishment of these works, the proprietor has planted a great portion of mountainous and rocky land, introduced a good practical system of agriculture, and much improved the entire neighbourhood. A manorial court for the district of Baleek is held every month, in which debts to the amount of 40s. are recoverable. Baleek was separated from this parish in 1826, and erected into a perpetual curacy.

The living of Loughgilly is a rectory, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Lord-Primate; the tithe rent-charge is £695. 3. 9. The glebe-house was built in 1782, and subsequently enlarged and improved; the glebe comprises 500 statute acres. The church is a spacious and handsome edifice with a tower, originally built at an expense of £1384. 12., a loan from the late Board of First Fruits, and rebuilt in 1828 by aid of a gift of £830. 15. from the same Board. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parishes of Ballymoyer and Baleek; in each is a chapel. There are three places of worship for Presbyterians and one for Covenanters. Of eleven schools, the male parochial school is supported by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's fund, and the female school chiefly by the rector: the parochial school-house was built on the glebe in 1813, at an expense of £250. A school-house for males and females has been built at Mullaghmore by the Education Society, who have endowed it with £35 per annum from the surplus funds of the collegiate school at Armagh, which latter was founded by Charles I., who granted seven townlands in this parish for the foundation of a school at Mountnorris, which was some years afterwards established at Armagh. A school-house for males and females has been lately built at Mountnorris by Mr. Cope, who has endowed the school with £40 per annum. Four unendowed almshouses were built by Dean Dawson, in 1811, for four aged women; and the late Lord Gosford bequeathed a sum of money, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor. During the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone, the garrison here was put to the sword by the O'Donells; it also suffered greatly in the war of 1641, when a dreadful carnage took place. There are several remains of fortifications in the neighbourhood; the "Tyrone Ditches" are near the junction of the parish with the parishes of Killevy and Ballymore; but of the extensive fortress of Port-Norris, or Mount-Norris, not a vestige can at the present time be traced.

LOUGH GLINN, an ecclesiastical district, in the union of Castlerea, barony of Frenchpark, county of Roscommon, and province of Connaught, 7 miles (S. W.) from Frenchpark, on the road to Ballyhaunis: the population, and the number of acres, are returned with the parish of Taughboyne or Tybohine. The land is in general of inferior quality, and a large portion consists of bog. The village, which contains 62 houses and 302 inhabitants, is a station of the constabulary police; it has a receiving-house for letters under Frenchpark and Clare; and a dispensary. Fairs are held in May, July, October, and December. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Elphin, and in the patronage of the rector of Taughboyne, who allows a stipend of £69. 4. 6. to the curate, augmented by £15 per annum from Primate Boulter's fund. The glebe-house, built in 1828 by aid of a gift of £450 and a loan of £50 from the late Board of First Fruits, stands on a glebe of 20 acres, valued at £12 per annum. The church, a neat structure in good repair, built in 1815 by aid of a gift of £600 from the same Board, is situated a mile west of the village. In the Roman Catholic divisions this district forms part of the union of Taughboyne, and has a chapel in the village.

LOUGHGUILE, or Loughgeel, a parish, partly in the barony of Kilconway, but chiefly in that of Upper Dunluce, union of Ballymoney, county of Antrim, and province of Ulster, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Ballymoncy, and on the road from Ballymena to Ballycastle; containing 6082 inhabitants. This place is celebrated for a battle which was fought on the Aura mountain, between the Mac Quillans and Mac Donnells, the former of whom were defeated; and near the intrenchments that were thrown up on the occasion, and of which there are still some remains, is a large cairn, where the slain on both sides are said to have been interred. The parish is situated on Lough Guile, and intersected by the river Bush, which rises in the Cambrick mountain, and, after a bold and devious course of 13 miles, falls into the sea at Bushmills. It comprises 30,165 statute acres, of which $6466\frac{1}{4}$ are in the barony of Kilconway, and $23,689\frac{3}{4}$ in Upper Dunluce: $59\frac{1}{2}$ are water; and of the land, about one-third is wild and boggy pasture, and the remainder chiefly arable. The surface is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into lofty eminences, of which Mount Aura has an elevation of 1530 feet. The soil is principally light and gravelly, but in the valleys extremely fertile: the system of agriculture has greatly improved since the decline of the linen manufacture, and excellent crops are now raised. Within the parish are some extensive tracts of limestone, which is quarried, and burnt into lime, in which a considerable trade is carried on; and there is an ample supply of bog-turf. Lisanour Castle, situated on the shores of the lough, was originally built by Sir Philip Savage in the reign of John, and in 1723 was purchased by the ancestors of the Macartney family, of whom George, Earl Macartney, was born, and for some time resided, here. The last remains of the ancient building were removed in 1829, on the erection of the present mansion, which is beautifully situated in a fertile valley romantically interspersed with woods and lakes, and adorned with extensive and flourishing plantations; near the margin of one of the lakes is an elegant cottage in the later English style, richly embellished, and forming a picturesque feature in the scenery of the vale. Fairs are held on the 19th of Feb., June, Aug., and Nov., chiefly for horses, cattle, pigs, and linen-yarn. A constabulary police force is stationed here, and petty-sessions are held on alternate Tuesdays.

On the death of Dr. Trail, the last chancellor of Connor, and under Bishop Mant's act for dissolving the union attached to the chancellorship of that see, the LIVING, previously a vicarage, became a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Connor, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £386. 5. The church, a small plain edifice with a tower surmounted by a spire, was rebuilt in 1733, chiefly at the expense of the Earl Macartney. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is a spacious edifice, built in 1785, near the entrance of Lisanour Castle. At Magheraboy is a place of worship for Seceders. A dispensary affords medicine and advice to the poor, who are visited at their own dwellings when unable to attend. There are several Danish forts in the parish.

LOUGHILL, a parish, in the union of RATHKEALE, barony of SHANID, county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 11¼ miles (N. W.) from Rathkeale, and on the mail-road from Limerick to Tarbert; containing 2100 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the southern bank of the river Shannon, which is here about three miles in breadth; it comprises 5154 statute acres. The land is in general rocky, and the soil light; but near the village it is of better quality, and the soil of greater depth: about one-half is under tillage; the system of agriculture is gradually improving, but a considerable portion is cultivated by spade labour. The principal manure is sea-sand and sea-weed, either collected on the slab, or brought from the opposite coast of Clare. Throughout the whole of the lower or northern part of the parish, are extensive beds of coal lying above each other in five different strata; the uppermost bed, which is the thinnest, has been worked, but so inefficiently that, though the produce is of excellent quality, coal is imported from England and Wales at a cheaper rate, and the works have been consequently discontinued. The substrata generally are silicious grit, greenstone, and quartz, the last penetrating the entire country in veins of considerable thickness, and in some parts nearly white and of great purity. The principal seats are, Mount-Trenchard, that of Lord Monteagle, a handsome mansion formerly called Cappa, and beautifully situated on the banks of the Shannon; Rock Lodge; Fairy Lawn; Woodcliff; and Curragh. The village contains 53 houses, most of which are small thatched cabins. Nearly adjoining Ouvane Cottage is a good quay, where sloops may receive or deliver their cargoes. A receiving-house for letters in the village is in connexion with Rathkeale. Fairs are held at Mount-Trenchard in March, June, September, and December.

The townland of Kilfergus, on which is the old church of Glin, and the adjoining townland of Ballyoulihan, though both in this parish, pay tithe to the rector of Glin. In the townland of Knockabooley a singular tenure prevails, by which the Bishop of Limerick is enabled to grant leases for three lives; whereas, in the other townlands of the parish, he can grant leases only for 21 years. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Limerick, forming part of the union and corps of the precentorship of the cathedral of Limerick: the tithe rent-charge is £71. 5.; there is a glebe of 16 acres, but no glebe-house. The church, a small neat edifice in the early English style, with a square tower, was built in 1812, on a new site, by a loan of £800 from the Board of First Fruits, in 1812; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recently granted £116 for its repair. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Glin; the chapel is a large plain edifice. About half a mile from the village are the ruins of the old church; and near the shore was a very strong castle, said to have been the property of the bishop of the diocese, which was taken down by the late Mr. Hewson, who built a garden wall with the materials. On the demesne of Woodcliffe is a piece of ground called the Field of Sculls, where more than 100 skeletons have been found; and on the Curragh estate have been dug up numerous brass coins of the reign of James I.

LOUGHIN-ISLAND, a parish, in the union of DOWNPATRICK, barony of KINELARTY, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Newry to Downpatrick; containing, with the post-town of Clough and the villages of Seaforde and Anadorn (which see), 6571 inhabitants. The parish comprises 12,485¾ statute acres, of which 124¾ are water; about one-half of the land is of the richest quality, and of the remainder, with the exception of a small proportion of waste and bog, the greater part is tolerably fertile. The linen manufacture was established here in 1815 by Mr. Cromie, of Draper Hill; and upwards of 30,000 webs are now annually made from mill-spun yarn, by which employment is afforded to not less than 2000 persons. The principal seats are, Seaforde House, the splendid mansion and demesne of the Forde family, noticed in the article on Seaforde; Ardilea, a handsome residence near Clough; and Draper Hill, about halfway between Ballynahinch and Castlewilliam.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Down, having attached to it the precentorship of the cathedral of the Holy Trinity in Down, and is in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £412. 10. The church, situated at Seaforde, on one of the conical hills in which this part of the country abounds, is a plain edifice in the Grecian style, with an octagonal spire of wood covered with copper: the approach to it is by a handsome avenue shaded by trees. It was built in 1720, previously to which time divine service was performed in the ancient church, on the island from which the parish has its present name; the building has been lately repaired from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. About a mile west of Seaforde are the ruins of the church of Drumcaw, which place, previous to 1715, was a separate parish, but was in that year consolidated with Loughin-Island, when the townlands of Magheralone, Tyconnet, Murvaclogher, and Rossconnor were disjoined from the latter, and added to the parish of Kilmore. In the Roman Catholic divisions, part of the parish is in the union or district of Ballykinler, and the townlands which in 1715 were added to Kilmore continue united with the remaining portion. There is a chapel for this latter district, at the southern extremity of the townland of Tievenadara; and another in the townland of Drumaroad, for the portion attached to Ballykinler. In the parish are several schools. One, in the village of Seaforde, was built and endowed by the governors of the schools founded by Erasmus Smith; two acres of land required by the governors to be made over in perpetuity for the master were given by the late Colonel Forde, and a yearly gratuity is paid to him by the present head of the family, the Rev. W. B. Forde. There is also in the village a girls' school, built in 1816 by Colonel Forde, and endowed by him with £14 per annum. A school-house in the townland of Clara was built, chiefly by Colonel Forde, in the same year. In 1840 the Rev. W. B. Forde built a neat school-house at Anadorn; this school, and that at Clara, are in connexion with the Church Education Society, from which each of the masters has a salary of £8, besides a gratuity of equal amount from the landlord. Contiguous to each of the Roman Catholic chapels is a national school; and in the parish are several Sunday schools. At Clough are two places of worship for Presbyterians, one in connexion with the General Assembly, the other with the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster; and at Seaforde is also a place of worship for Presbyterians. Miss M'Kenny, in 1832, bequeathed £50 to the poor of Clough, the interest of which is annually distributed by the rector.

On Castle hill, northward of Anadorn, stood a fort; contiguous to which was the castle of the Macartans, the former proprietors of the present barony of Kinelarty. At Clough are the ruins of an old castle, one of the ancient castella murata, remarkable for being situated on the top of a fort which originally formed the northern end of a chain of forts with their accustomed ramparts and ditches, extending as far southward as the gardens attached to Clough House; from this fort is a full view of two separate lines of forts, and of the whole of Dundrum bay and castle. A little northward of Castle hill, in an angle formed by two roads, is a cromlech, which still preserves much of its original form; and near it were found, some years ago, while excavating for the foundation of a dwelling-house, several sepulchral urns, in which, and also in a kistvaen discovered on the western side of the island lough, were calcined bones and ashes. On the island called Loughin-Island, a romantic and sequestered spot, are the ruins of three edifices which, though not exactly parallel, are, in their general bearings, east and west. The central one is conjectured to have been the original parish church; the one to the northward, built in 1547, was used as such till 1720, when the present church was built at Seaforde; and the third is traditionally said to have been a cell of St. Fynian, and was the private chapel and burial-place of the Macartans. At the western extremity of the townland of Drumcaw, is a very ancient bridge of one arch, over the Moneycarra river.

LOUGHLANSTOWN, Leighlinstown, or Laughlanstown, a village, in the parish of Rathmichael, union and barony of Rathdown, county of Dublin, and province of Leinster, 7 miles (S. E.) from Dublin. It is situated on the road from Dublin to Bray, in a valley watered by two mountain streams. Near it, and on the right of the road ascending from the village towards Bray, is the workhouse of the union of Rathdown, built on a site of 8 acres held at a rent of £49. 12.; it was completed in 1841 at an expense of £6500, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers.

LOUGHMORE EAST.—See Callabeg.

LOUGHMORE WEST, or Loughmoe, a parish, in the union of Thurles, barony of Eliogarty, county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, 2¼ miles (S. by E.) from Templemore, and on the road to Thurles and Clonmel; containing 2471 inhabitants, of whom 148 are in the village. The parish comprises 4865 statute acres. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Cashel, and in the gift of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Ormonde, and the tithe rent-charge is £402. 4. 6., of which £222. 4. 6. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. There is no church or glebe-house. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Loughmore and Castleinny, which also comprises the parish of Temple-erry and contains a chapel in each parish.

LOUGHREA, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of Loughrea, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 18 miles (E. by S.) from Galway, and 86½ (W. by S.) from Dublin; containing 7152 inhabitants, of whom 5458 are in the town and suburbs. This place, which is situated on the shore of Lough Rea, was chiefly remarkable for its monastery, founded by Richard de Burgh, about the year 1300, for Carmelites or White friars; after the Dissolution it was granted to Richard, Earl of Clanricarde, ancestor of the present proprietor. A castle was erected here by the Earl of Ulster at an early period; and the town, from its situation in the approach to Galway, was deemed of so much importance that it was fortified. It at present consists of several streets, and contains 988 houses, many of which are neat and well built: in the year 1841 the inhabitants adopted the act 9th George IV., cap. 82, for Lighting, Paving, and Watching Towns in Ireland. There is a promenade called the Mall, which is much frequented, and the neighbourhood abounds with pleasingly diversified scenery. The lake, which is about one mile in diameter, has three small islands of picturesque appearance; its shores are enlivened by some pleasing cottages, and embellished on the south and east with hills of beautiful verdure. An extensive brewery has been erected on the side of the lake, by Mr. L. Fahy. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Galway. A branch of the National Bank has been established. The market is on Thursday, and is well supplied with grain and provisions of every kind, and with poultry in abundance: fairs are held on Feb. 11th, May 26th and 27th, Aug. 20th, and Dec. 5th; the May fair is numerously attended by purchasers for horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs, of which last great numbers are sold at all the fairs. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town, which is also the head station of the central district of the revenue police, including those of Loughrea, Galway, Ballinasloe, and Athlone, and comprising a force of three lieutenants, three sergeants, and 58 privates, under the control of a resident sub-inspector. A manorial court is held before the seneschal; petty-sessions are held every Thursday, and quarter-sessions twice in the year before the assistant barrister for the county. In a small bridewell are a few cells, with two day-rooms and two yards.

The parish comprises 6436¼ statute acres: the soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improving; there is but a moderate quantity of bog, and scarcely any waste land. Building-stone is found, and extensively quarried. The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory is partly appropriate to the deanery, and partly to the vicarage, which latter is episcopally united to the vicarages of Kilteskill, Kilrickill, and Kilnadeema, and in the patronage of the Marquess of Clanricarde. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £115. 19., of which £17. 6. are payable to the dean, and the remainder to the incumbent. There is no glebe-house: the glebes of the union comprise 27½ statute acres, let on lease for £20. 9. per annum; and the entire value of the vicarial benefice, including glebe and tithe, amounted, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, to £517. 16. The church, a neat structure, was built in 1821 by a loan of £1846. 3. from the late Board of First Fruits: the spire was struck by lightning, and thrown down on the roof, on the first Sunday in Dec. 1832, about two hours before the time of divine service; the church has been repaired by a grant of £169 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and is one of the parishes belonging to the bishop; the chapel is a spacious edifice, and there are chapels also attached to the Carmelite monastery, and to the convent of sisters of the same order. The Carmelite monastery, originally founded in 1300 by Richard de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, has, notwithstanding the alienation of its revenues at the Dissolution, still preserved a regular succession of members. In consequence of the dilapidated state of the buildings, a new chapel, and a dwelling-house adjoining it, were erected in 1785; the former was rebuilt on a more extensive scale in 1816, and the latter in 1829, under the superintendence of the prior, the Rev. Mr. Gannon, at an expense of £4000 (including both), defrayed partly from the funds of the establishment and partly by subscription, to which the Clanricarde family, on whose estate the monastery is situated, liberally contributed. A convent for nuns of the same order was founded about the year 1680, and removed to its present site in 1829, when the building, including a chapel, was erected under the direction of the prior of the abbey, at a cost of £5000, entirely defrayed from the funds of the nunnery; there are at present 18 sisters in the convent, chiefly young ladies. Nearly 1000 children are taught in three public schools, of which the parochial school is supported by the rector. The national schools are chiefly under the direction of the prior and Roman Catholic clergy of the monastery, and the sisters of the nunnery; the school-houses were built at the joint expense of the prior, the nuns, and the National Board of Education. The workhouse of the union, on a site of 6½ acres held at a rent of £12. 13. per annum, was completed in 1841, at a cost of £6960, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers.

Some remains exist of the ancient Carmelite monastery; and also of the old castle built by the De Burghs, which was for some time the residence of the Clanricarde family. There was an hospital for lepers in the town; but little of its history is recorded, and even the site of it is unknown. On the summit of Monument Hill, near the town, is a circular inclosure in which are seven stones, five still standing erect, and two lying on the ground; in the centre is a small tumulus of earth, and near the base of the hill are vestiges of a circular intrenchment, within which are the remains of an ancient cromlech.

LOUGHSHINNY, a village, in the parish of LUSK, union of BALROTHERY, barony of BALROTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of MUNSTER; containing 28 houses, and 198 inhabitants.

LOUISBORGH.—See LEWISBURGH.

LOUTH (County of), a maritime county of the province of LEINSTER, and the smallest in Ireland, bounded on the east by the Irish Sea; on the north, by the bay of Carlingford and by the county of Armagh; on the west, by the counties of Monaghan and Meath; and on the south, by that of Meath. It extends from 53° 42′ to 54° 6′ N. Lat., and from 6° 4′ to 6° 38′ W. Lon.; and comprises 201,434 statute acres, of which 178,972 are arable land, 15,603 uncultivated, 5318 plantation, 728 in towns and villages, and 813 under water. There were, in 1821, 101,011 inhabitants; in 1831, 107,481; and in 1841, 111,979; exclusively of the county of the town of Drogheda, which forms a separate jurisdiction at the southern extremity of the county.

It appears from Ptolemy that the present county formed, in his time, part of the territory of the Voluntii, which extended southward to that of the Eblani. Louth was subsequently included in the independent sovereignty of Orgial, or Argial, called by the English Oriel or Uriel, constituting a large part of the province of Meath, and including also the counties of Armagh and Monaghan. This county is stated to have formed the subordinate territory of Conal Muirthemne, called also Hy Conal and Machuire-Conal, in which were the smaller districts of Fera Arda, or Fatharta, the present barony of Ferrard; Hy Segan, or Hy Seanghaio, that of Ardee; Fera Lorg, Lorgan, or Lurgin, that of Lower Dundalk; Hy Mac Uais, the country of the Mac Scanlans, that of Upper Dundalk; and Ludha, or Lugha, that of Louth, which was the country of the O'Carrols, chiefs of Argial. The last celebrated head of this race was Donchad O'Carrol, King of Argial, who founded the two great abbeys of Mellifont and Louth, and was likewise a prince of considerable prowess. Argial was conquered by John de Courcy, in 1183; and that part of it which is included within the limits of the present county of Louth (one of those erected by King John in 1210) being immediately peopled with English settlers, it continued ever after to be subject to the English jurisdiction. Thus, the ancient Argial was divided into Irish Argial and English Uriel. The latter, from its situation, being much exposed to the incursions of the native chiefs, numerous castles were erected for its defence; but nevertheless, in the reign of Edward II., it was ravaged by the Scots under Edward Bruce, who, however, received their final overthrow from Sir John Birmingham in this county.

The county of Argial, Louth, or Louth, was one of the four counties of the pale in which, in 1473, a small standing force was appointed to be maintained; and the mayor of Drogheda, Sir Laurence Taaf, and Richard Bellew, were appointed commanders of the newly instituted Fraternity of Arms for the defence of the English pale. It was overrun by the insurgent chieftains in the reign of Elizabeth, at which time it appears to have formed part of the province of Ulster; for in 1596, in the conference held at Faughart between O'Nial and O'Donel on the Irish side, and the archbishop of Cashel and the Earl of Ormonde on that of the English government, the latter proposed that the English should retain possession of that part of Ulster situated between the river Boyne and Dundalk, in this county, of which they had been in possession for a long period, together with the towns of Carrickfergus, Carlingford, and Newry, in the more northern parts. But these terms were altogether rejected; and ever since, Louth has formed a portion of the province of Leinster.

It is wholly in the diocese of Armagh, except a small portion of two parishes in the diocese of Clogher. For purposes of CIVIL jurisdiction it is divided into the baronies of Ardee, Ferrard, Louth, Upper Dundalk, and Lower Dundalk; and it contains the sea-port, borough, and market-town of Dundalk; the sea-port and disfranchised borough of Carlingford; the disfranchised boroughs of Ardee and Dunleer; and the post-towns of Castle-Bellingham, Collon, Louth, Lurgan-Green, Tallonstown, and Flurrybridge: the largest villages are Annaglasson, Clogher, and Mullaghcrew. It sent ten members to the Irish parliament, two for the county at large and two for each of the boroughs; but at the Union the boroughs were all disfranchised, except Dundalk, which sends one member to the Imperial parliament. The election for the county, which continues to return two members, takes place at Dundalk: the number of electors registered in 1841 was 918, of whom 271 were £50, 88 £20, and 390 £10, freeholders; 24 £20, and 95 £10 leaseholders; and one £50, and 48 £20, rent-chargers. The county is included in the North-Eastern circuit; the assizes are held at Dundalk, where the county court-house and gaol are. Quarter-sessions are held at Drogheda and Dundalk, in January, April, June, and October; and in April and October at Ardee, where are a court-house and bridewell. The local government is vested in a lieutenant, 13 deputy-lieutenants, and 26 other magistrates, together with the usual county officers, including two coroners. There are 28 constabulary police stations, having in the whole a force of a county inspector, five sub-inspectors, six head-constables, 29 constables, and 149 sub-constables, with seven horses; the expense of whose maintenance in 1842 was £9432, defrayed by grand jury presentments and by government. The district Lunatic Asylum is in Dublin; the County Hospital, at Dundalk, was built in 1834, and is considered to be among the most complete in Ireland, both as regards the structure and the internal arrangements: there are dispensaries at Ardee, Ballymascanlan, Castle-Bellingham, Collon, Dunleer, Louth, and Termonfechan. The amount of grand jury presentments for 1844 was £16,448. In military arrangements the county is included in the Dublin district, with the exception of the town of Dundalk, which is in the Belfast district: at Dundalk is the only barrack within the county, adapted for 25 officers, 513 men, and 320 horses. Along the coast are five stations of the revenue police, respectively at Greenore Point, O'Meathe, Cooley Point, Soldiers' Point, Dunany Point, and Clogher Head; these form the Dundalk district, in which are one inspecting commander, five officers, and forty men.

This county, although the smallest in Ireland, presents several distinguishing features as to its SCENERY and soil, worthy of attention. The southern districts are level, varied by gently swelling elevations, in a state of high cultivation, and interspersed with thriving plantations: to the north the surface rises into the lofty group of the Ravensdale, Cooley, and Carlingford mountains. The coast, from the mouth of the Boyne, which is the southern extremity of the county, presents a broad level strand, stretching northward for several miles to the boldly projecting promontory of Clogher Head, at the foot of which is the village of the same name, with a natural harbour that affords shelter to a few fishing-yawls. Thence to Dunany Head is a sandy bay, in which are a few reefs, covered at high water but at ebb tide having a dry strand for half a mile beyond them. Dunany is the southern extremity of Dundalk Bay, which sweeps round into the land in a semicircular form, having the harbour and town of Dundalk in its most inland point, and terminating northwards at Cooley point. The southern and western shores of this fine bay, the mouth of which extends seven miles from point to point, and which measures the same distance in depth to the entrance to Dundalk harbour, are of the same character as those already noticed, broad, shallow, and skirted with a line of low land rising gradually into slight elevations, clothed with verdure and trees. The northern side of the bay is of a character totally different. Here the mountains rise boldly from the water's edge, covered in their lower parts with wood, but above denuded and heathy. This mountainous tract forms a peninsula that separates the bay of Dundalk from that of Carlingford, which forms the northern boundary of the county. The character of Carlingford bay is different from that of Dundalk bay: it is long and narrow, extending nearly nine miles inland to Narrow water, which is the entrance to Newry harbour, with an average breadth of 1½ mile, and bordered on both sides by lofty eminences; on the south by the mountain group already described, on the north by the mountains of Morne, in Down, which latter are among the highest in Ireland. Both these bays are considered as unsafe for shipping; that of Dundalk, from its shoals; that of Carlingford, from the sudden and violent flaws of wind that sweep along it from the surrounding cliffs. Fish of many kinds are caught in great numbers off the shores of the county; the most common species are turbot, cod, haddock, plaice, ling, and herrings. There is an oyster-fishery in Carlingford bay, the oysters of which are in the highest estimation for their superior flavour, and are sent in large quantities to Dublin and other towns situated along the coast. The SOIL in flat parts is suitable to every kind of agricultural produce, being a rich vegetable mould, based on marl, limestone, or clay-slate: northwards it gradually deteriorates, until, on approaching the summits of the mountains, the only vegetable productions are heath and the coarsest grasses. The best land is about Ardee and Louth; there are also extensive tracts of rich soil at Tallonstown, Dundalk, and Castle-Bellingham.

Louth may be said to be altogether an AGRICULTURAL county. Much of the land is under pasture, but every description of grain is extensively cultivated. The best wheat districts are those of Ardee and Cooley: the best barley is grown in the neighbourhood of the town of Louth; the Chevalier barley has been lately introduced with the greatest success, being found better adapted to the soil than any hitherto raised. Flax is also grown in large quantities, principally for the supply of the spinners of Leeds, Bolton, and other manufacturing towns in England. Every kind of green crop is raised by the large farmers. Lime is the usual manure, except in the vicinity of the coast, where sea sand and weed are used; a compost of lime, earth, and bog-mould, is found to be very beneficial; the produce of the farmyard is exclusively preserved for the potato-crop. Breeds of every kind of cattle have been introduced, under the sanction of the Castle-Bellingham Agricultural Association. Considerable numbers of horned-cattle and sheep are purchased at the Ballinasloe fair, to be fattened here. The native stock of sheep, when crossed by the New Leicester, is very superior both as to fleece and mutton. Pigs are numerous throughout every part; there is scarcely a farmer or cottier who is not more or less a dealer in them: the Berkshire and the Chinese breeds are most esteemed. The horses are of a light and active description, well adapted for country work; the saddle horses are generally brought in by dealers from other counties. The agricultural implements are of the most improved kind, except in the mountain districts, where those of the old construction are still used in many places. Much of the land is cultivated by the spade; and even where the plough is used, the land is afterwards carefully trenched with it: the old solid-wheeled car has been laid aside, and a light, well-constructed, single-horse cart supplies its place. Irrigation and draining are better understood here than in any of the adjoining counties. The fences are generally quickset hedges, although the broad bank of earth or sods and the dry stone-wall are to be met with in some parts. The extensive forests so frequently mentioned in the wars of the sixteenth century have disappeared, and the only traces remaining of them are some scattered underwoods near the bases of the mountains. The principal ornamental plantations are at Collon, Ravensdale, Barmeath, and Dundalk: there are smaller plantations round Bellurgan, Cooleystown, Clermont, Louth Hall, Townley Hall, and Termonfechan. The waste lands comprise an extent of nearly 16,000 acres, chiefly in the more elevated parts of the northern group of mountains. A small and hardy breed of sheep, and some young cattle, are grazed on them; they also contain patches of bog, the turf of which is carried down into the low country for fuel. Coal is imported in considerable quantities from the British coast, particularly for the use of the inhabitants of the larger towns.

The GEOLOGY of this portion of the island is very simple. The Ravensdale and Carlingford mountains, in the north, are dependent on the Morne mountains, and, like them, are composed chiefly of granite. Hornblende and primitive greenstone abound on the skirts of this granitic district, and to these succeed exterior chains of transition rocks. The rest of the county is chiefly occupied by clay-slate, except where limestone occurs in detached districts, as in the neighbourhood of Ardee, Killyner, and Mell. An extensive limestone field stretches from Shanlis towards Louth; another rises very abruptly near Collon. Blue limestone occurs near Carnabeg and Killin. Near Castletown is a very pure red limestone, which appears to be the southern termination of the Armagh field; none other of the same character having been found any where except at Castleespie, in Down county. Other detached beds of this rock are worked in various parts of the county, for agricultural purposes and for building. The line of demarcation between the granite and transition rocks is very clearly defined. Commencing at Carlingford, it crosses the Ravensdale and Cooley mountains, and enters Armagh county at Myra Castle, whence it is traceable into the mountains of Forkhill. The new red sandstone is to be perceived only in a few places. Lead-ore has been found in thin veins, near the junction of the granite and transition rocks; and detached nodules have been met with near Ardee, and in the bed of the Flurry river. Oxyde of manganese, and impure iron-stone, have been discovered near Clogher Head, and iron pyrites near Mount Ash and Ring Castle: the remains of iron-works are often found on the hills.

The manufacture of sheetings and other kinds of coarser linen-cloth, is carried on in the neighbourhood of Drogheda to a considerable extent; and there are large bleach-greens at Ravensdale and Collon. A pin-manufactory, established in Dundalk in 1836, gives employment to upwards of 600 persons; another of the same description has been since erected in the town of Louth. There is an iron and brass foundry in the former of those towns, the castings of which are held in high estimation. At Dundalk and some other places are extensive distilleries and breweries: the character of the ale of Castle-Bellingham has long stood very high. Flax-mills are to be seen on all the smaller rivers, and several large and very powerful flour and meal mills throughout the county. There are three places of export for the agricultural and manufacturing produce, Newry to the north, Drogheda in the south, and Dundalk midway between the two; but the trade of the last-named place is somewhat impeded by the shallowness of the harbour, which prevents vessels of large burthen coming up to the quay, except at spring tides.

All the RIVERS which pass through the interior of the county are small. Of these, the Flurry, Stranarn, Cully, and Creaghan rise in the county of Armagh, and flow eastward into the bay of Dundalk. The Fane has its source in the beautiful lake of Castle-Blayney, in Monaghan, and flowing south to Candleford, turns eastward, and, passing by Ring Castle, Grange, and Clermont, falls into the same bay at Lurgan-Green. The Lagan Water, which rises near Carrickmacross, in the county of Monaghan, enters Louth near Killany, and, having joined the Glyde, divides the county into two nearly equal portions, and falls into the sea below Castle-Bellingham. The Dee rises near Drumconrath, in Meath county, and, passing through the rich vale of Ardee, meets the White River near Poe's-court, and falls into the sea close to the mouth of the Lagan. Several minor streams rise in the interior; they all flow eastward, and contribute much to the fertility of the tracts they irrigate, and to the beauty and freshness of the surrounding scenery. The estuaries of the Boyne and of the Newry Water form the extreme boundaries of the county to the south and north. The roads are very numerous, well made, and kept in excellent repair; the railways are noticed in the articles on Drogheda and Dundalk.

The REMAINS of ANTIQUITY are extremely various. The Druidical relics at Ballrighan and Carrick-Edmond comprise circles, detached stones, and cairns: there are the remains of a Druidical temple on the plains of Ballinahatney, near Dundalk; circles and a cromlech on Killin hill; a fine cromlech at Ballymascanlan; and a large cairn on Carrick-Brant. At Ballrighan has been discovered a curious artificial cave; and near Killin hill is the extraordinary fort called Faghs na ain eighe, or "the one night's work." The most ancient mounds appear to be the ordinary tumuli, such as are seen between Dundalk and Drogheda; in which latter vicinity is a very celebrated structure, at Grange. Next in date are those encompassed with a deep trench, and generally met with in the neighbourhood of some old castle or place of note; such as those of Castle Guard at Ardee, Greencastle near Castle-Bellingham, and at Killany. Some mounts have a square redoubt, or other works, attached to the main encircling trench; as at Castletown. Besides those above mentioned, the places where camps of different kinds occur are, near Ballinahatney plain; Mount Albani, about two miles from Dundalk: Rosskugh, near Carrick-Brant, on the banks of the Dundugan river; Mount Ash, near Louth; a Danish fort, near Dunleer; another at Castletown, near Dundalk; a round fort at Louth; Castle Ring, near the same place; Faughart, to the north of Dundalk; Mount Bagnal; and a Danish fort near Castle-Bellingham. A fine round tower is still standing at Monasterboice, and part of another at Dromiskin. The number of religious houses that existed in the county is no less than 23: there are still remains of those of Carlingford, where the ruined buildings are very interesting; Faughart, where the vestiges consist of St. Bridget's stone and pillar; Mellifont, the abbey of which place was very sumptuous; and Monasterboice, where are two crosses, one of which, called St. Boyne's, is among the largest, most ancient, and richly decorated in Ireland. Of the numerous ancient castles, there are remains of those of Haynstown (three miles from Dundalk), Miltown, Killincoole, Darver, Carlingford, Castle-Roche, Dungooly, Rood's-town, Ballug (near the northern shore of Dundalk bay), Dunmahan, Glass-Pistol (near Termonfechan), Clonmore, Rath (three miles from Carlingford), Ardee, Termonfechan, Ballrighan (two miles west of Dundalk), and Castletown. All of these, together with the chief modern mansions of the nobility and gentry, are particularly described in their respective parishes. A great number of ornaments of pure gold, swords, spears, axes of bronze, and other relics of antiquity, have been found in various places; and in the summer of 1835 a very large head ornament and fibula of pure gold were found near Monasterboice.

Sir John Birmingham, in reward of his victory over the Scottish army near Dundalk, in the reign of Edward II., was created Earl of Louth; but being shortly after slain in an insurrection of his own people in this county, the title became extinct. In 1541, Henry VIII. created Sir Oliver Plunkett Baron Louth, which title is at present enjoyed by his descendants. Oriel, the ancient name of the district, gives the title of Baron to Viscount Ferrard, of Collon.

LOUTH, a post-town and parish, in the union of DUNDALK, partly in the baronies of ARDEE and UPPER DUNDALK, but chiefly in the barony of LOUTH, county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Dundalk, on the road to Kingscourt, and $39\frac{1}{2}$ (N. by W.) from Dublin; containing 9647 inhabitants, of whom 718 are in the town. This place, called anciently Knockfergus, and also Cluain-Caoin, was celebrated for an abbey founded by St. Patrick, over which he placed St. Mocteus or Mochtalugh, a Briton, who died at a very advanced age in 534. The monastery became an extensive seat of learning under the superintendence of St. Mocteus and his successors; and it is said that 100 bishops and 300 presbyters, all eminent for learning and piety, were educated in this school. St. Dichull, who became abbot about the commencement of the 8th century, and several of his successors, were styled indifferently abbots or bishops; and the monastery continued to flourish till 830, when it was pillaged by the Danes, by whom the abbey was destroyed in 839, and many of the brethren killed. In 968, while in the possession of the Danes, the abbey was plundered by Muireeartagh, son of Donell, King of Ireland, who slew many of these invaders; and in 1043, this place and the adjacent country were plundered by Andatus O'Ruairc, who was himself soon after slain. In 1075, the town, with all its churches, was destroyed by fire; and in 1133 and 1148 the abbey experienced a similar calamity, from which it never seems to have recovered. Donchad O'Kervaill, Prince of Orgial, and Edan O'Coellaidhe, Bishop of Clogher, who had recently (in 1148) founded the abbey of Knock, jointly erected a PRIORY for Canons Regular, which was subsequently made a sanctuary by Malachy, Archbishop of Armagh: the prior sat as a baron in parliament. The town was destroyed by fire in 1152, 1160, and 1166, when it was also plundered; and in 1242, a grand chapter of the order was held in the priory of Louth by the Archbishop of Armagh, at which were assembled all the abbots and priors of the Canons Regular in the kingdom. Edward Bruce and other leaders of the Scottish army were entertained here, in 1315, by the prior, who was afterwards pardoned by Edward II. on payment of a fine of £40; and in 1488, the prior, who had been concerned in the insurrection of Lambert Simnel, received the king's pardon. John Wile, who had alienated a considerable portion of the revenues of the establishment, and who was prior at the time of the Dissolution, voluntarily resigned his office into the king's hands, and received a pension of £16. 13. 4. for the remainder of his life; the priory, with all its revenues, was granted in the 33rd of Henry VIII. to Sir Oliver Plunkett, ancestor of the present proprietor.

The TOWN is situated on the river Glyde. From a grant made by Henry IV. to the "Bailiff and Commons of the Town of Louth," releasing them from two parts of the chief rents during the minority of Lord D'Arcey, it appears to have had a municipal government prior to 1406. It contains 149 houses; and has a sub-post-office to Ardee, Carrickmacross, and Dundalk. There are six constabulary police stations in the parish; fairs are held every month in the village of Mullacrew, and petty-sessions every alternate Thursday in the town. The PARISH comprises 17,842$\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, of which 2081$\frac{1}{4}$ are in the barony of Ardee, 1654$\frac{1}{2}$ in that of Upper Dundalk, and 14,107 in that of Louth. The land is of very good quality, and principally under tillage, producing abundant crops; the system of agriculture is improved; there is little bog, and not any waste land. The chief seats are, Stephenstown, a handsome mansion in a highly improved demesne of 500 acres, well planted, and watered by the river Fane, which here separates the parish from that of Killincoole; Glyde Farm, the property of Lewis Upton, Esq., a handsome residence in tastefully disposed grounds; and Corderry. There is an extensive flour-mill at Channon Rock; also two corn-mills at the southern extremity of the parish, near Killincoole.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Armagh, and in the patronage of the Crown for two presentations, and the Lord Primate for one. The tithe rent-charge is £1491. 1. 4.: the glebe-house was built in 1813, at an expense of £4940. 6., and the glebe comprises 64¾ statute acres of cultivated land, valued at £147. 14. The church is a plain structure, erected about 1807 and enlarged in 1828, by parochial assessment; it has a tower, and has been repaired by a grant of £242 from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church: there are three chapels, situated at Louth, Knockbridge, and Stonetown; the two first are spacious edifices. The parochial school, in the town, with an infants' school attached to it, is partly supported by the rector; a school near Glyde Farm, by the trustees of Erasmus Smith's charity, aided by the rector; and one on the demesne of Stephenstown, by the rector. At Louth, Knockbridge, and Stonetown, are national schools; and there is a dispensary for the poor, who, when unable to attend, are visited at their own dwellings.

At Ardpatrick, in this parish, a church was founded by St. Patrick, of which no part remains; and at Knock, a monastery for Canons Regular, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, was founded in 1148, as already observed, by Donchad O'Kervaill, Prince of Orgial, and Edan Coellaidhe, Bishop of Clogher, who also founded the priory of Louth. Marian O'Gorman, who was abbot in 1167, composed a martyrology in the Irish language, which existed in the time of Colgan and was then in great esteem; the endowment was augmented by Hugh de Ardiz, in 1260, but was yet insufficient for the maintenance of the establishment. The abbot surrendered the monastery, with its revenues, in the 31st of Henry VIII.; and James I., in the 3rd of his reign, granted it to Sir John King, Knight, at the yearly rent of £16. 10. 4.: there are no remains. On the summit of a hill is Mount Ash, a curious fort, supposed to be of Danish origin; it consists of an oval mount, the surface of which is depressed and surrounded with a vallum, and around two-thirds of the circumference is a second vallum with a ditch. On the glebe-land is Fairy Mount, an abrupt conical eminence surrounded by a high earthen vallum. Castle-Ring, near the town, is of similar construction, but more elevated, and has a small stream between the vallum and the counterscarp; on the summit are the foundations of a hexagonal mural fort. The remains of the ancient abbey of Louth, founded by St. Patrick, or rather of the priory subsequently erected on its site, are extensive, but in a very dilapidated state; the cemetery is still a favourite place of interment. Dr. Plunkett, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, who was executed in London for high treason, was for some time resident here.

LOWESGREAN, or ROESGREEN, a village, in the parish of ST. PATRICK'S ROCK, union of CASHEL, barony of MIDDLETHIRD, county of TIPPERARY, and province of MUNSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Cashel, on the road to Clonmel. Fairs are held on Aug. 2nd, and Oct. 23rd; and one of the Roman Catholic chapels of the district of Cashel is situated here.

LUCAN, a post-town and parish, in the union of CELBRIDGE, barony of NEWCASTLE, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (W.) from Dublin, on the road to Galway and Sligo; containing 1139 inhabitants, of whom 563 are in the town. After the English settlement it appears to have been granted to Richard de Peche, one of the earliest adventurers, and in 1220 was the property of Waryn de Peche, who founded the monastery of St. Catherine, near Leixlip. In the reign of Richard II. it was in the possession of the Rokeby family, and in the 16th century belonged to the Sarsfield family, of whom William, one of the ablest generals, in the service of James II., was by that monarch, after his abdication, created Earl of Lucan. From him it descended by marriage to the ancestor of Colonel G. Vesey, its late proprietor.

The TOWN is beautifully situated in a fertile vale, on the eastern bank of the river Liffey, over which is a handsome stone bridge of one arch, ornamented with balustrades of cast-iron from the Phœnix works, near Dublin. At the side of the bridge is the picturesque glebe of the incumbent. The total number of houses is 106; most of them are well built, and many are fitted up as lodging-houses for the reception of visiters, who, during the summer season, resort to this place to drink the waters, which are found efficacious in scorbutic, bilious, and rheumatic affections. A handsome spa-house has been erected, consisting of a centre and two wings, in one of which is an assembly-room 62 feet long and 32 feet wide, in which concerts and balls are given; the house affords excellent accommodation for families. The mineral spring, from its having a higher temperature than others in the neighbourhood, is called the "Boiling Spring;" the water, on an analysis made in 1822, was found to contain, in two gallons, 70 grains of crystallised carbonate of soda, 20 of carbonate of lime, 1½ of carbonate of magnesia, 2 of silex, 6½ of muriate of soda, and 14 of sulphur. The scenery of the vicinity is beautifully diversified; and its short distance from the metropolis renders the town a place of fashionable resort, and of pleasant occasional residence. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in it, and petty-sessions are held on Tuesdays.

The PARISH, through a portion of which the Royal Canal passes, comprises 1125 statute acres, and is in a high state of cultivation; the soil is fertile, and the crops are abundant. Lucan House is a spacious mansion, situated in a highly embellished demesne, comprising nearly 500 statute acres, extending along the banks of the Liffey; within the grounds is a monument to one of the Sarsfield family, near which are an ancient oratory dedicated to St. John and thickly covered with ivy, and a holy well. Of the other seats the principal are, St. Edmonsbury, a tasteful demesne beautifully situated, and commanding some fine views; Weston Park, finely situated on the Liffey; Woodville; Hermitage; Finstown House; Lucan Abbey, or Canon Brook;

Primrose Hill; Glenwood; Villa; View Mount; Lucan Lodge; and Mount Pleasant. On the river Liffey, and within the grounds of Weston Park, is a salmon-leap, from the Latin name of which "Saltus," the barony of Salt derives its name. It consists of a succession of rocky ledges, too extensive to be cleared at one bound, and in passing over it the fish consequently sustain great injury; the stream forms a beautiful cascade, the picturesque effect of which is increased by the richly wooded banks of the river, and the tastefully embellished demesne of Leixlip Castle. An inquest was taken in the reign of Edward II., to ascertain to whom the right to the fish taken here belonged; and another to inquire into the erection of certain weirs, "obstructions to the boats passing to our good city of Dublin with fish and timber." The latter inquest is supposed to refer to a canal which at some very remote period must have been carried along the bank of the Liffey. In excavating the foundation for a mill recently constructed at the salmon-leap, the masonry which formed part of the lock of a canal was discovered; the sill of the lock is still to be seen, and more masonry for the same purpose has been found further down the river. At a later period, a canal appears to have been formed along this line, as far as Castletown, two miles above the salmon-leap; by which, according to tradition, coal was conveyed from Dublin to that place, and of which some remains are still to be seen. The mill is capable of producing from 700 to 800 barrels of flour weekly; the water-wheel is 28 feet in diameter, and, in turning 5 pair of stones, acts with a power equivalent to that of 60 or 70 horses.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Dublin, united to the vicarage of Leixlip, to the augmentation of which the rectorial tithes were appropriated by act of William III.: the tithes are included in the amount given for Leixlip. A neat church with a tower and spire was erected in the town in 1823, towards which the First Fruits' Board gave £900 and advanced £1100 on loan; and in the same year a perpetual curacy was instituted here, in the patronage of the incumbent of Leixlip: the stipend of the curate has been augmented with £20 per annum from Primate Boulter's fund. The glebe-house was built in 1823, by aid of a gift of £50 and a loan of £450 from the Board of First Fruits; the glebe contains two acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Palmerstown, Clondalkin, and Lucan; the chapel, a very small edifice, has been rebuilt. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, erected in 1832. A poor-shop, a lending-library, and a loan fund, have been established; and a dispensary is open to the poor of the neighbourhood.

The vicinity affords some highly interesting specimens of irregular stratification of limestone, which occurs in parallel layers separated by seams of decomposed calpe, dipping uniformly at a small angle to the E. N. E. In a bank on the left side of the Liffey, a few yards only above the bridge, the strata becomes sinuous, forming curvatures of nearly two-thirds of their respective circumferences; and single slabs taken from the disturbed beds have an arched outline, conforming to the general curvature of the strata. At Canon Brook, for many years the residence of the late Mr. Gandon, architect, is a singular cave, discovered by that gentleman; it consists of one principal apartment and two side cells, of smaller dimensions, secured all round with stone, to prevent the walls from falling in: many curious relics of antiquity were found, consisting of celts, pieces of bone curiously inscribed and sculptured, military weapons of copper or bronze, and various others of more recent date. The hill in which these apartments are excavated is about 300 feet above the level of the vale, and is called the Fort Hill, from its being crowned with a fortification, the works of which are still in good preservation. The monastery of St. Catherine (founded by Waryn de Peche in 1220), though its endowment was augmented by subsequent benefactors, was, on account of its poverty, assigned in 1323 to the abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin; there are no remains. Opposite to the gate of Lucan House demesne was a very ancient and splendid cross, round the site of which it is still the custom, at Roman Catholic funerals, to bear the corpse previous to interment. Above the modern bridge are some fragments of an older structure, said to have been built in the reign of John. Lucan gives the titles of baron and earl to the family of Bingham.

LUDDENBEG, or LUDDON, a parish, in the barony of CLANWILLIAN, union and county of LIMERICK, and province of MUNSTER, 5½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Limerick, on the old road to Cahirconlish; containing 944 inhabitants. It comprises 1954 statute acres of good land, of which about one-half is in tillage: the subStratum consists chiefly of a mixture of basalt and limestone. The parish is in the diocese of Emly; the rectory is impropriate in Viscount Southwell, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Cahirconlish. The tithe rent-charge is £93, of which £49. 12. 7. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; at Isertlaurence is a good glebe of 9 acres, and at Luddenbeg is another of 4½ acres. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Ballybricken, and has a small chapel at Bohermore. At the foot of a gentle eminence are the ruins of the church, by some writers called an abbey, on the walls of which are some figures rudely sculptured in bas-relief; and a little to the south stood the castle of Luddenmore, a strong fortress, of which scarcely a vestige can be traced.

LUKESWELL, a hamlet, in the parish of KILBACON, barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 5 miles (S.) from Knocktopher, and on the road from Waterford to Kilkenny; containing 10 houses and about 50 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Kilmacow, which has its source among the "Welsh mountains," in the vicinity.

LULLIAMORE, a parish, in the union of EDENDERRY, barony of EAST OPHALY, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 4¾ miles (S. E.) from Edenderry, and on the road from Prosperous to Rathangan; containing 51 inhabitants, and comprising 2656¼ statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Kildare, forming the corps of the prebend of Lulliamore, and part of the union of Kilmague or Kilmaogue, in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £27. 1. 6. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kildare and Rathangan.

LURGAN, a market and post town, and the head of a union, in the parish of SHANKILL, barony of O'NEILLAND EAST, county of ARMAGH, and province of ULSTER, 13½ miles (N. E.) from Armagh, on the road to Belfast, and 67½ (N.) from Dublin; containing, in 1841, 4677 inhabitants. This place formed part of the territory of the O'Nials, and on the settlement of Ulster was, with the lands of Dowcorran and Ballenemony, together comprising 2500 acres, granted by James I. to William Brownlow, Esq., who erected a handsome house at Dowcorran, and shortly after built the town of Lurgan, in which, in 1619, were 42 houses, all occupied by English families. On the other part of the estate were 45 families; and the colony continued to flourish till the war in 1641, when the town was burned by the insurgents, who converted the church into a garrison, and afterwards demolished it: they also destroyed the mansions of Dowcorran and Ballenemony. After the Restoration the town was rebuilt; but was again destroyed by the army of James II., and its proprietor declared an outlaw. It was, however, restored in 1690, when a patent for a market and fairs was obtained; and soon afterwards an important branch of the linen manufacture was established here, which has continued to flourish till the present time.

The TOWN is situated in the midst of a fertile and well-cultivated district, and consists of one spacious street, containing 728 houses substantially built of stone and roofed with slate, many of which are large and handsome. The manufacture of diapers was introduced here by William Waring, Esq., M.P. for Hillsborough during the whole of the reign of Anne; and the Lurgan and Waringstown manufacturers have always been eminent in this branch of the trade. Damasks of superior quality, and cambrics, are made in large quantities, and sold in the market weekly to the amount of from £2500 to £3000; there is scarcely a family in the district that is not more or less connected with the linen trade. Here are two tobacco-manufactories; two ale-breweries; and an extensive distillery, in which 15,000 tons of grain are annually consumed. A facility of intercourse with Belfast is afforded by Lough Neagh, the Ulster railway, and the Lagan navigation; and the trade of the town is progressively increasing. In the excise arrangements Lurgan is within the district of Armagh. Branches of the Belfast, the Northern, and Provincial Banks have been established. The market, on Friday, is abundantly supplied with provisions; and great quantities of linens are sold on the market-days in the brown-linen hall, a spacious building, erected by subscription in 1825. Fairs are held on Aug. 5th and 6th, and Nov. 22nd and 23rd. A chief constabulary police force is stationed in the town; a manorial court is held every three weeks, and petty-sessions every Friday; the quarter-sessions for the county are also held here. The court-house is a large and well-arranged building; and there is a district bridewell, containing seven cells, with day-rooms and airing-yards, and well adapted for classification. The parish church, a handsome edifice with a tower surmounted by an octagonal spire; the Roman Catholic parochial chapel, a neat Gothic building; and meeting-houses for Presbyterians and the Society of Friends, are in the town. A mendicity society and a voluntary poor fund have been established, to which the Right Hon. Charles Brownlow contributes £100 per annum. Near the town is Lurgan House, lately rebuilt on an extensive scale, and in the Elizabethan style, with free-stone brought from Scotland; the approach is by a lodge and gateway of the same character, and the demesne, which is very large, is embellished with a profusion of stately timber, and with an artificial lake of 100 acres. There are various other seats in the vicinity, which, with the schools and other institutions, are noticed under the head of SHANKILL. The union workhouse, on a site of six acres purchased for £450, was completed in 1840, at a cost of £6130, and is constructed to contain 800 paupers.

LURGAN, a parish, in the union of OLDCASTLE, barony of CASTLERAHAN, county of CAVAN, and province of ULSTER, on the road from Kells to Cavan; containing, with the post-town of Virginia (which is separately described), 6557 inhabitants. It comprises, according to the Ordnance survey, 11,327¾ statute acres, including 922¾ acres of water, the greater portion of which is in Lough Ramor; 8423 acres are applotted under the Tithe act, and there is a large tract of bog and moor. In 1831, two townlands were separated from this parish, to form part of the district parish, or perpetual cure, of Ballyjamesduff. The living of Lurgan is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Kilmore, united by act of council to the rectory and vicarage of Munterconnaught, together constituting the union of Lurgan, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £175. 1. 9., and the gross tithe of the benefice £286. 1. 9.: the glebe of the union, which comprises 999¼ acres, is valued at £694. 2. per annum. The glebe-house, situated two miles from the church, was erected about 1814, at an expense of £3276. 18., of which £1384. 12. were granted as a loan, and £92. 6. as a gift, from the late Board of First Fruits. The church, in the town of Virginia, was erected in 1821, at a cost of £2492. 6., of which £1846. 3. were a loan from the same Board, and the remainder was contributed by the parishioners; having been accidentally burnt in the winter of 1830, it was repaired by subscriptions amounting to £900, contributed chiefly by the bishop and the parishioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms the head of a district, comprising also part of the parish of Loghan in the diocese and county of Meath, and containing the chapels of Lurgan and Maghera.

LURGANBOY, a village, in the parish of KILLASNET, union of MANOR-HAMILTON, half-barony of ROSSCLOGHER, county of LEITRIM, and province of CONNAUGHT, 1¼ mile (W. by N.) from Manor-Hamilton, on the road to Sligo; containing 184 inhabitants. This place is most romantically situated in a rich and highly improved tract of country watered by the small river Boonid, which has its winding course through ancient woods and flourishing plantations, with which the surrounding district is embellished. The scenery is singularly picturesque and pleasing, and the view of the distant mountains by which the place is encompassed is strikingly beautiful. The nearest of the group, at a short distance to the south-east of the village, is Benbo, which has an elevation of 1365 feet above the level of the sea, and is of very peculiar conformation. The higher portion is of fine granite, flanked with stratifications of micaceous quartz, and having beneath it hornblende rock, hornblende and mica slate with a profusion of garnets, sienite with green hornblende, and serpentine and green steatite thickly studded with garnets, which are also found in a stream at the base of the mountain.

On the western side, some of the rocks are much decomposed; and red, yellow, blueish white, and black clays are found in great variety: a stream called the Red-Stone River, which flows through the vicinity, is tinged with the dyes of these several clays. The western base of the hill is traversed by a metallic vein containing copper pyrites, formerly wrought on a small scale, and sulphuret of lead; manganese is also found here, and both sandstone and limestone are abundant. The village contains 32 houses. Nearly in the centre was a neat market-house, now converted into a dwelling-house: fairs are held on the 15th of May, and on the 21st of every other month in the year.

LURGAN-GREEN, a town, in the parish of DROMISKIN, union of DUNDALK, barony and county of LOUTH, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Dundalk, and 37 (N.) from Dublin, on the road to Belfast; containing 35 houses, and 214 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Fane, and immediately adjoining the beautiful and extensive demesne of Clermont Park. A constabulary police force is stationed here; and fairs are held on July 25th and Nov. 11th.

LUSK, a parish, in the union of BALROTHERY, barony of BALROTHERY EAST, county of DUBLIN, and province of LEINSTER, 4 miles (N.) from Swords, and on the road from Dublin to Skerries; containing, with the town of Rush (which is separately described), 5961 inhabitants, of whom 872 are in the village of Lusk. This place was chiefly distinguished as the site of a monastery, over which St. Macculin, styled indifferently abbot or bishop, presided till his death in 497. Cassan, a learned scribe, who is called the chronographer of Lusk, died abbot of this monastery in 695; and either in that or the following year, a grand synod was held here by St. Adamnanus, at which all the principal prelates of the kingdom were present. In 825 the abbey was plundered and destroyed, and in 854 was, together with the whole town, consumed by fire: it suffered a similar calamity in 1069; and in 1135 the town and abbey were burned, and the whole country of Fingal wasted, by Donel Mac Murrogh O'Melaghlin, in revenge for the murder of his brother Conor, Prince of Meath. In 1190, a nunnery for sisters of the Aroasian order, which had been founded here at an early period, and subsequently appropriated to the priory of All Saints, Dublin, was removed to Grace Dieu, in this parish, by John Comyn, Archbishop of Dublin, who placed in it a sisterhood following the rule of St. Augustine, and endowed it with ample possessions, which were confirmed by Pope Celestine in 1196.

The PARISH comprises 16,183½ statute acres, and is divided into three parts, called East, West, and Middle Lusk. The land, with the exception of about 150 acres of sand-hills, is fertile and in good cultivation: 150½ acres are appropriate to the economy fund of the cathedral of St. Patrick, Dublin; and there are about 200 acres of common, which is good grazing-land. Here are some quarries of limestone, in which are found beautiful crystals; and of stone of proper quality for building: fullers'-earth is also found in the parish, and at Loughshinny are veins of copper, but no mines have been worked. The principal seats are, Corduff House, at one time occupied by Stanihurst, the historian; Knock Ardmin; Rochestowo; Bettyville; and Kennure Park, belonging to Sir Roger Palmer, Bart. The village is pleasantly situated on the road from Dublin, and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified. At Rogerstown is a quay for landing coal; and from a document dated 1175, prohibiting the illicit exportation of corn, and the departure of any of the retinue of William de Windsor from the port of Lusk, it appears that this place formerly possessed some maritime importance. Fairs are held on May 4th, June 24th, July 25th, and Nov. 25th, chiefly for cattle. Here are a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Swords, a constabulary police station, and a coast-guard station belonging to the district of Swords.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Dublin. The rectory is divided into two portions; one united to the rectories of Ardrie, St. Andrew, and Burgage, together constituting the corps of the precentorship; the other till lately forming part of the union of Ballymore and corps of the treasurership; in the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin. The vicarage is in the alternate patronage of the Precentor and the Archbishop, the latter of whom was patron of the now suppressed treasurership. The tithe rent-charge is £739. 1. 6., of which £30 are payable to the vicar, and the remainder to the lessee of the precentor, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The lands belonging to the precentorship comprise 986½ statute acres, of which 71 are in Lusk, 154 in Ardee, and 670¾ in Burgage, exclusively of the chanter's orchard and garden in the precincts of the cathedral church, three tenements in St. Patrick's close, and two houses in Bride-street, and four in Dame-street, Dublin; the whole let at an annual rent of £238. 11. 6½, and an annual renewal fine of £83. 1. 6½. The gross value of the precentorship, before the passing of the Rent-charge act, was £346. 8., and of the vicarage, £120, per annum. The glebe-house was built in 1821; the late Board of First Fruits gave £400, and granted a loan of £400, towards its erection: there are two glebes, comprising together 22 acres. The CHURCH, built on the site and partly with the materials of the ancient abbey, is in the later English style of architecture, with a massive square embattled tower having at three of the angles a slender circular tower, and at the fourth a similar tower of larger dimensions, which is roofless and without battlements. The interior consists of two long aisles, separated by a series of seven pointed arches, now filled up with masonry: the eastern portion of the south aisle is the only part appropriated to divine service; the windows of the remaining portions are nearly all closed up, and the whole of the north aisle is almost in total darkness. There are numerous sepulchral monuments, some of which are very ancient and highly interesting; of these, one of various kinds of marble, in front of the altar in the south aisle, was erected about the close of the 16th century to Sir Christopher Barnewall and his lady, whose effigies in a recumbent posture are well sculptured and elaborately ornamented. In the north aisle is a monument of black marble to James Bermingham, of Ballogh, Esq., bearing his recumbent effigy in chain armour; there is also a tomb curiously sculptured in relief, with an inscription, to Walter Dermot and his lady, which from some obliteration has been by different antiquaries ascribed to the 6th and to the 16th centuries. Near the altar is a piscina, and there are two very ancient fonts; close to the church is the well of St. Mac-culin, the patron saint. In the Roman Catholic divisions this place is a deanery, comprising the districts of Lusk, Rush, Skerries, Ballyboghill, Garristown, Donaghbate, and Portrane. The chapel, a spacious edifice, was erected in 1809, at an expense of £2000, nearly half of which was given by James Dixon, Esq., of Kilmainham, and the remainder raised by subscription; attached to it is a burial-ground.

There are some remains of an ancient church and castle in the demesne of Kennure; and also of the chapel of the convent at Grace Dieu, which, though never extensive, exhibits details of a superior character: at Whitestown are the ruins of an old church dedicated to St. Maur. At Drummanagh and Rush are martello towers; and at the former place likewise the remains of an extensive encampment, commanding a fine view of the surrounding country and of the sea. In digging the foundation for the glebe-house, several stone coffins were found, containing human bones.

LUSMAGH, or KILMACUNNA, a parish, in the union of PARSONSTOWN, barony of GARRYCASTLE, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Banagher; containing 3643 inhabitants. A Franciscan friary was founded at Cloghan Cantualaig, by O'Madden, early in the fifteenth century; but no particulars have been recorded. The castle of Cloghan, supposed to have been built in the reign of King John, was taken by storm in 1595 by Sir William Russell, lord-deputy, who put forty-six of the garrison to the sword, in consequence of O'Madden, the proprietor, having sent him a taunting refusal to surrender. It is now the property of The O'Moore, whose ancestors have been resident here since the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when they were banished from the territory of Leix, in Queen's county. The parish is situated on the river Shannon, and on the Lesser Brosna, one of its tributary streams; and comprises $8919\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres. Limestone is found here; and on the banks of the Shannon are flour-mills. Lusmagh is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clonfert; the rectory being partly appropriate to the see, and partly to the archdeaconry; and the vicarage forming part of the union of Dononaughta, in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithe rent-charge is £78. 4. 8., of which £48. 9. 3. are payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in whom the temporalities of the see are now vested; £10. 7. 9. to the archdeacon; and the remainder to the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms a separate district: a large and handsome chapel has been built at the Cross of Capplevane. Some remains of the church still exist.—See NEWTOWN.

LYNALLY, or LINALLY, a parish, in the union of TULLAMORE, barony of BALLYCOWAN, KING'S county, and province of LEINSTER, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (N. W.) from Tullamore, on the road to Parsonstown; containing 2069 inhabitants. A religious house was founded here, it is said by St. Colman, who died in 516: the last notice of its abbots is in 884. The parish comprises 5999 statute acres, of which about 840 are woodland, 4800 arable and pasture, and the remainder bog and waste called "Callow;" the land is in general poor, and agriculture in a rather backward state. The seats are, Charleville Castle, the beautiful residence of Lord Charleville; Screggan; Lynally; Cluna; and Rosse. It is in the diocese of Meath; the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Downshire, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Fircall. The tithe rent-charge is £75. 5. 9., of which £48. 9. 3. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar; there is a glebe of $325\frac{1}{2}$ acres, valued at £445. 4. 7. per annum, but no glebe-house. The church is a plain neat structure, completed in 1832 by aid of a loan of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killina; the chapel, at Mucklow, is a plain building of recent erection. The parochial school is supported by subscriptions, including £10 per annum from Mrs. Coote, and an annual allowance from the incumbent; the school-house and an acre of ground are given rent-free by Colonel Bernard. At Screggan Hill are the remains of an intrenchment, said to have been one of Cromwell's.

LYNN, a parish, in the poor-law union of MULLINGAR, barony of FARTULLAGH, county of WESTMEATH, and province of LEINSTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by W.) from Mullingar, on the road to Tyrrel's-Pass; containing 1325 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on Lough Ennel, and bounded on the west by the river Brosna, comprises 5020 statute acres. The soil is fertile, and the land chiefly in pasture; the system of agriculture is much improved, and that portion which is in tillage produces excellent crops; there is very little bog and no waste. Limestone is quarried for agricultural purposes, and there are some quarries of black flagstone of good quality. The principal seats are Larkfield, Vylandstown or Violetstown, Lynn Lodge, Lynn House, Lynnbury, Bloomfield, and Lamancha. Petty-sessions are held at Moylisker. The parish is a rectory, in the diocese of Meath, and part of the union of Moylisker; the tithe rent-charge is £135, and the glebe comprises 20 acres of profitable land, valued at £46. 3. per annum. The glebe-house was built in 1813, at an expense of £1055. 18. British, of which £200 Irish were a gift, and £500 a loan, from the late Board of First Fruits; the remainder was defrayed by the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Mullingar; the chapel is at Gainstown. At Kilronan is a large burial-ground; some slight remains exist of the church at Lynn, and also of an ancient castle, formerly the residence of the Swift family; and there are numerous raths in the parish.

LYONS, a parish, in the barony of SOUTH SALT, county of KILDARE, and province of LEINSTER, 3 miles (S.) from Celbridge; containing 379 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the Grand Canal, comprises $1634\frac{3}{4}$ statute acres, of which about 160 are woodland, and the remainder divided in nearly equal portions between pasture and tillage. The soil is fertile, and the system of agriculture improved; there is only a very small portion of waste land. Lyons Castle, the splendid seat of Lord Cloncurry, takes its name from an ancient town and castle which were destroyed in the war of 1641; of the former there are no traces, but of the latter, one of the principal towers is left, which, with the remains of the ancient church, forms an interesting feature in his lordship's demesne. The present structure is a castellated mansion of granite, consisting of a spacious centre connected by semicircular colonnades with a stately pavilion at each extremity. The interior contains many superb apartments, some of which are beautifully embellished in fresco by Gabrielli, an artist brought from Rome by his lordship for that purpose; and in addition to the numerous antiques and choice works of art with which his lordship's collection is enriched, one of the pavilions is appropriated as a gallery of statuary and sculpture by the first masters, as a study for native artists. The demesne, which is very extensive and tastefully laid out, includes the hill of Castlewarden, on which are the remains of an ancient fortification; and nearly in the centre is a picturesque lake. A constabulary police force is stationed at Lyons. The parish is in the diocese of Kildare, and is a rectory, forming part of the union of Kill; the tithe rent-charge is £57. 12. 4. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kill and Lyons; the chapel, a neat plain building, erected in 1810, is embellished with a bronze crucifix $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet high, given by Pope Pius VII. to Lord Cloncurry, and, together with an elegant font of white marble brought from Rome, presented by his lordship to the chapel.

M

MACDARA, an island, in the parish of Moyrus, poor-law union of Clifden, barony of Ballynahinch, county of Galway, and province of Connaught, 15 miles (S.) from Clifden, and on the western coast: the population is returned with the parish. It comprises about 29 statute acres; and contains the ruins of an ancient stone-roofed church or chapel, which is traditionally said to have been the abode of the patron saint of Connemara.

MACETOWN, a parish, in the union of Dunshaughlin, barony of Skreen, county of Meath, and province of Leinster, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Dunshaughlin, and near the road from Ratoath to Navan; containing 374 inhabitants. It comprises $1991\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres; the land is of medium quality. Macetown is a chapelry, in the diocese of Meath, forming part of the union of Kilmessan: the rectory is impropriate in the Marquess of Drogheda, and the tithe rent-charge is £51, of which £43. 10. are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the incumbent. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Skryne. Here are the ruins of an ancient castle.

MACLONEIGH, a parish, in the union of Macroom, barony of West Muskerry, county of Cork, and province of Munster, 2 miles (S.) from Macroom; containing 1622 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Lee, and comprises 3808 statute acres. In some places the soil is deep and loamy, in others inclining to stiff clay, and in others light and friable; about two-thirds of the land are under tillage, and the remainder consists of rough mountain-pasture and bog, of which latter there is a considerable portion near the river. Agriculture is in a very backward state, the old heavy wooden plough being still used; and much of the land is cultivated with the spade. Macloneigh is a rectory, in the diocese of Cork, forming part of the union of Kilmichael: the tithe rent-charge is £187. 10. The glebe-house, a neat mansion, stands here, on a glebe of 48 acres of good land; the church of the union is in Kilmichael. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Kilmichael: the chapel, at Toames, is a small neat edifice, erected in 1831. The parochial school is supported by the rector; another school is aided by a bequest of £10 per annum from the late Mrs. Margaret Browne, of Castleview; and there is a national school at Toames, for which a school-house was built in 1833, at an expense of £90. The ruins of the parish church are situated near the glebe-house; it was a spacious edifice nearly 80 feet long, of which the gables and south walls are still nearly entire; the doors and windows are of hewn stone, but of rude construction.

MACOSQUIN, or Camus-juxta-Bann, a parish, in the union and barony of Coleraine, county of Londonderry, and province of Ulster, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Coleraine, on the road to Dublin; containing 6545 inhabitants. The place derived its latter name, which is the more ancient, from the foundation of a monastery at Cambos or Camus, on the river Bann, by St. Comgal, in 580; and the former, by which it is more generally known, from the Cistercian abbey of St. Mary de Fontana or Macosquin, founded in 1172 by the family of O'Cahan. This latter establishment became very celebrated as the resort of numerous pilgrims; continued to flourish till the Dissolution; and was granted in 1609 by James I. to the Irish Society, by whom the church of Macosquin was made parochial.

The parish is chiefly the property of the Richardson family, who hold in perpetuity under the Merchant-Tailors' Company: it is situated on the river Bann, by which it is bounded on the east; and comprises $17,804\frac{1}{4}$ statute acres, of which $65\frac{3}{4}$ are in the river. The land is generally not of very good quality; there are extensive tracts of bog and mountain, which might be brought into cultivation at a moderate expense. Basaltic stone of excellent quality for building is scattered over the parish, and is quarried for that purpose and for mending the roads; granite, porphyry, and clay-slate are found in the channels of several of the numerous rivulets; and iron-ore is also very abundant, especially in the townland of Drumcroon, but the mines have never been worked in consequence of the high price of coal. There are several gentlemen's seats in the neighbourhood, most of them surrounded with extensive and thriving plantations, which form a conspicuous and interesting feature in a district generally destitute of timber. Of these, the principal are Somerset, Greenfield, Ardverness, Drumcroon, Dromore, Ballyness, Castleroe, and Camus House. The linen manufacture was formerly carried on to a very great extent, especially in the finer fabrics, and there were until recently four large bleach-greens capable of finishing 60,000 pieces annually, all of which were in full operation; but the trade has so much declined, that one only is now kept partially at work. The salmon-fishery first granted to Sir Arthur Chichester in 1605, and afterwards to the Irish Society, is situated at a place called "the Cutts:" the tide flows up, but the river Bann, though navigable here, is unavailable to the benefit of the parish; the navigation being prevented by fords, and by the "Cutts" about a mile from the bridge of Coleraine. The courts leet and baron attached to the manor have not been held for some time; the jurisdiction of the court of Coleraine extends over this parish, and all pleas are now referred to it.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop, but the advowson is claimed by the Irish Society; the tithe rent-charge is £450. The glebe-house was built about 80 years since at an expense of £738. 9.; the glebes comprise 250 Cunningham acres, valued at £250 per annum. The church, a very spacious structure, was new-roofed and repaired in 1826, at an expense of £500; and has since been enlarged, at a cost of £200. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Killowen or Coleraine: there are places of worship for Presbyterians at Englishtown and Crossgare; also one for Covenanters at Ringrash. The small remains of the monastery founded by St. Comgal were taken down, to build a wall round the burial-ground: among them was a very ancient stone cross, having four compartments, in each of which were three of the Apostles sculptured in high relief, and profusely ornamented with scrolls and wreaths; it was removed from its socket, and now forms a gate-pillar in the wall. There was also an ancient font, to which, previously to the removal of the cross, the people resorted in great numbers. Several stone and bronze celts have been found chiefly in the bogs; also fossilized tubs of butter, one of which, weighing 22 lb., is preserved at Drumcroon. There are five forts, and several artificial caves, one of which, at Ballywilliam, contains five apartments. There are also several strong chalybeate springs in the parish, of which those at Drumcroon and Greenfield contain iron, sulphur, and magnesia in solution, with a considerable portion of carbonic-acid gas.

MACRONY, a parish, in the union of FERMOY, barony of CONDONS and CLONGIBBONS, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Kilworth, on the road to Lismore; containing 3406 inhabitants. It comprises 8371 statute acres: the land, though in general of an inferior quality, is chiefly under tillage, a large portion of the mountain waste having been lately brought into cultivation; there is a small portion of bog. Limestone raised in the adjoining parish is generally burnt for manure, and slate was formerly worked in the vicinity. The river Araglyn, which separates this parish from Leitrim, winds through a vale covered on both sides with a dense wood of oak, chiefly planted by W. C. Collis, Esq. At the head of the vale, at a place called The Furnace, iron-ore was worked to a great extent, and smelted on the spot; but the timber becoming too valuable for fuel, the works were discontinued about 80 years since. There are two small corn-mills on the river, employed in grinding oats. Near The Furnace, where the counties of Cork, Tipperary, and Waterford meet, is a station of the constabulary police, supported at the joint expense of the three counties. Castle Cooke, a seat, is beautifully situated on the Araglyn, in the midst of extensive and valuable plantations. The parish is in the diocese of Cloyne; the rectory is impropriate in the representatives of Messrs. E. & B. Norcott, and the vicarage forms part of the union of Kilworth; the tithe rent-charge is £345, payable in equal portions to the impropriator and the vicar. In the Roman Catholic divisions, also, the parish is part of the union of Kilworth, and has a chapel.

MACROOM, or MACROMP, a market and post town, a parish, and the head of a union, in the barony of WEST MUSKERRY, county of CORK, and province of MUNSTER, 24 miles (W. by N.) from Cork, and 145 (S. W.) from Dublin; containing 7227 inhabitants, of whom 4794 are in the town. This place is said to have derived its name, signifying in the Irish language "a crooked oak," from a large oak-tree that formerly grew in the market-square. It appears to owe its origin to the erection of a castle, which, according to Sir Richard Cox, was built in the reign of John by the family of the Carews. This castle subsequently became the property of the M'Cartys, and was repaired and beautified by Teigue M'Carty, who died here in 1565. It was taken in 1602, after a long siege, by Sir Charles Wilmot, just as he was about to draw off his forces to Cork agreeably to the orders of the Lord-President, who was apprehensive that its owner Dermot M'Carty, having made his escape from him, would attempt to cut off the retreat of the besieging army. On this occasion the garrison were compelled to abandon the fortress by the breaking out of an accidental fire, which raged so furiously as to threaten its destruction; and the English forces rushing in, extinguished the flames, and, leaving a garrison for its defence, marched directly to Cork. In 1650, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ross assembled an army of 4000 foot and 300 horse from the western part of the county, to relieve Clonmel, at that time besieged by Cromwell; but on the approach of Lord Broghill with 2000 of the parliamentarian cavalry, the bishop set fire to the castle, and concentrated his forces in the park, where, being attacked by Lord Broghill, they were defeated, and their leader taken prisoner. Ireton, being soon afterwards made president of Munster, despatched a party of his forces from Kilkenny to this place, who burned both the castle and the town. In 1691, the garrison was severely pressed by a body of native troops in the service of James II.; but on the approach of Major Kirk with 300 dragoons, they abandoned the siege, and retreated with considerable loss.

MACROOM, some years since, was the joint property of the Earl of Bandon and the late Robert Hedges Eyre, Esq., and received comparatively little improvement; but after it became the sole property of the latter gentleman, considerable progress was made in improving its appearance and the condition of its inhabitants. The town is pleasantly situated in a healthy open vale surrounded by hills of moderate elevation, and enlivened and fertilised by the winding course of the river Sullane, near which the town is built: there is an old bridge of nine arches adjoining the castle; and about half a mile below it, where the Sullane receives the waters of the Lany, is another stone bridge of nine arches, about a mile to the east of which the stream discharges itself into the river Lee. The approaches on every side are through long lines of cabins, of which those to the west of the old bridge have been rebuilt in a neat and comfortable style, and roofed with slate. The place consists of one street, nearly a mile in length, and towards the western extremity having a wider space, in which is a newly erected market-house, forming one side of a square, the opposite side of which is occupied by the hotel and the castle gateway: the inhabitants are supplied with water from the river. Though troops are often stationed here, there is no barrack: the proprietor of the town has offered to government a sufficient quantity of ground, rent-free, for the erection of a suitable building for the accommodation of the troops. There are no fixed sources of public amusement; but the town is frequently enlivened by the lovers of field sports and steeple-chaces, for which the neighbourhood is celebrated.

Two flour-mills and two tanyards are at present in operation; and there were formerly a distillery and salt-works, which have been discontinued. The principal trade is in corn, which is brought into the town daily by the farmers, and purchased on account of the Cork merchants; the quantity sold during a recent year exceeded 39,000 barrels. In the excise arrangements the town is within the district of Cork. The market is on Saturday, and is abundantly supplied with butchers' meat, vegetables, and provisions at a moderate price; and from January till May there is a weekly market for pigs, many of which are slaughtered here and afterwards sent to Cork. From May till the end of the year, monthly cattle-fairs are held, those of May and Dec. on the 14th, and the others on the 12th. Here is a chief constabulary police force, for whose accommodation a handsome barrack has been built. A manorial court for the recovery of debts not exceeding £2 is held every third week before the seneschal, the jurisdiction of which is very extensive, comprehending several parishes in addition to that of Macroom. The quarter-sessions for the West Riding of the county are held here in December, and the petty-sessions for this division of the barony of Muskerry, on alternate Tuesdays. The court-house is a neat building of hewn limestone, ornamented with a cornice and pediment supported by two broad pilasters, between which is a Venetian window; and connected with it is a bridewell.

The PARISH comprises 12,667 statute acres. About four-fifths are under tillage, the remainder being rough mountain pasture and bog; the system of agriculture is in a state of progressive improvement; there is little waste land except the rocky parts of the mountains, and the bog affords an ample supply of fuel. Here are quarries of clay-slate, which is used for building. In the mountains of Muskerry-More, consisting principally of schistose rock, and forming a detached portion of the parish, are several thin strata of freestone of very white colour and good quality; and in a rivulet on the south side is a thin seam of coal, which dips very rapidly. The scenery is richly diversified, and in many parts beautifully picturesque; and there are several gentlemen's seats in the parish. Of these, the principal is Macroom Castle, the residence of the late Robert Hedges Eyre, Esq., who converted the ancient castle into an elegant modern mansion, in which the old towers are so perfectly incorporated as to be scarcely distinguishable from the rest of the building. During the alterations, a 32-lb. cannon-ball was taken out of the walls. More recently, an additional tower and range of buildings have been erected at the rear, and many improvements have been made. The mansion is a spacious quadrangular structure with embattled parapets, and richly mantled with ivy, on the side fronting the demesne, which is bounded on the north by the river Sullane and extends over a beautifully wooded ridge to the south and west, including a spacious deer-park. The present owner is the Hon. William H. White Hedges, second son of the Earl of Bantry, and nephew of the late Mr. Hedges Eyre. Mount-Massey occupies a conspicuous site above the northern bank of the Sullane, and is encircled with a grove of fir-trees. Rockborough is pleasantly situated in a retired spot, about two miles to the west of the town, and is distinguished for the beauty and variety of its scenery, in which wood and water, barren rock and verdant hill, are pleasingly combined. Sandy-Hill is also pleasantly situated, commanding a fine view of the castle and its wooded demesne. Coolcawer, a handsome mansion with stone pillars, recently built, is about a mile and a half to the south-east of the town, and is embosomed in a richly wooded demesne. Firville, a lately erected mansion, is romantically situated at the extremity of a picturesque glen, on the northern bank of the Sullane, near its confluence with the Lany; and Coolehane, also recently erected, is on the same bank of the river, but at a greater distance from its confluence. Codrum House, and Codrum, are also in the parish.

The LIVING is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Cloyne, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £360, and there are six acres of glebe. A handsome rectory-house was built in 1840, by the Rev. W. Halloran, then incumbent, at a cost of £800; it is prettily situated in a field to the north of the church, and commands a fine view of the river, and the castle and demesne. The church, towards the erection of which the Board of First Fruits granted a loan of £1000, in 1824, is a small edifice in the later English style, with an enriched porch, and is attached to the tower of the ancient structure; it is situated at the western extremity of the town, opposite to the castle, and close adjoining the bridge. In the Roman Catholic divisions this parish is the head of a district, comprising also part of the parish of Ahinagh: the chapel here is a handsome edifice, with a square embattled tower strengthened with buttresses and crowned with pinnacles; and there is also a chapel at Ahinagh. Male and female scriptural schools are supported by the Hon. W. H. White Hedges, and the rector; and a school held in the chapel-yard is aided by the National Board. The town is the centre of a large dispensary district, to which are attached two physicians and an apothecary: the dispensary is managed by a committee, treasurer, and secretary; is supported by subscription and presentments; and is of great advantage to the poor. A fever hospital is now in course of erection, to contain 40 beds and all suitable conveniences; the estimated cost is £650. There is also a charitable loan-fund society, in connexion with the Dublin Loan-Fund Board; it has been four years in operation, and is of great benefit in promoting industry and order among the poorer inhabitants. The union workhouse is near the west entrance to the town, on a site of six acres purchased for £500; it was completed in 1841, at a cost of about £7000, and is constructed to contain 600 paupers.

On the lands of Codrum, about half a mile to the west of the town, is a large stone of clay-slate, inscrted in a wall on the road side, with the following inscription still legible: D.E.O.C. 1686, H.F. FECIT.; implying that Donald, Earl of Clancarty, caused the wall to be erected. On the same lands are the remains of an encampment, in which is a spacious subterranean cavern, the extent of which has not been ascertained; pieces of iron and other metal, much corroded, and apparently portions of ancient military weapons, have frequently been found here; the entrance has been closed up, to prevent accidents to the cattle. There are two chalybeate springs, one on the lands of Ballyvirane, and the other, recently discovered, on the lands of Cooleanne; the water is similar in its properties to that of Leamington; they are both much used, and have been found efficacious in scrofulous and leprous diseases. Sir William Penn, a distinguished admiral, and father of William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, in America, was born at Macroom Castle.

MACULLY, or MUCKALEE, a parish, partly in the barony of IVERK, but chiefly in the barony of KNOCKTOPHER, county of KILKENNY, and province of LEINSTER, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Knocktopher; containing 651 inhabitants. The parish comprises 2712 statute acres. It is a rectory, in the diocese of Ossory, and forms part of the union of Kilculliheen: the tithe rent-charge is £79. 10. 8. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is part of the district of Slieraugh.

MAGAUNAGH, or MOYGAWNA, a parish, in the union of BALLINA, barony of TYRAWLEY, county of MAYO, and province of CONNAUGHT, 7 miles (S. W.) from Killala, and on the road from Crossmoliua to Ballycastle; containing 2107 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Awenmore, and comprises 20,269 statute acres; the land is light, and partly under tillage, with some pasture, and great quantities of bog and mountain: limestone abounds. The principal seats are Belleville, Gleumore, and Stonehall. It is a vicarage, in the diocese of Killala, forming part of the union of Crossmolina; the rectory is partly appropriate to the precentorship of Killala, and partly to the vicars-choral of Christ Church, Dublin. The tithe rent-charge of the parish is £82. 10. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church; the chapel is small, and in bad repair.

MAGHAREE ISLANDS.—See KILLEINY.

MAGHERA, a parish, in the union of KILKEEL, barony of UPPER IVEAGH, county of DOWN, and province of ULSTER, 2 miles (S. W.) from Castlewellan, and on the road from Bryansford to Downpatrick; containing 1505 inhabitants, of whom 166 are in the village. This parish, which is bounded on the east by a branch of the inner bay of Dundrum, comprises 3214¼ statute acres. The soil is various; in some parts extremely fertile, and in others sandy, with detached portions of marsh and bog: the marshy grounds afford good pasture. The principal seats are Tollymore and Church Hill, both handsome residences. The living is a vicarage, in the diocese of Down, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom the rectory is appropriate: the tithe rent-charge is £157. 10., of which £97. 10. are payable to the see, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe comprises 19¼ statute acres, valued at £36 per annum. The church, towards the erection of which the late Board of First Fruits gave £900 in 1825, is a small neat edifice, about a quarter of a mile from the village. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Bryansford, or Lower Kilcoo. The parochial school was founded in 1826, by the late J. Keowen, Esq., who built the school-house on the glebe, and endowed it with £5 per annum; at Tollymore is a neat school-house, built by Mrs. Keowen. Near the church are the ruins of the ancient church, of which the western gable and south wall remain; the beautiful Norman arch at the western entrance is in good preservation; the windows in the south wall are narrow, and of elegant design. Near the new church, also, are the remains of an ancient round tower, the upper part of which, from the height of 20 feet above the base, was thrown down by a storm in 1704, and lay in an unbroken column on the ground; the doorway, in that portion which is still erect, is towards the east, and 7 feet from the ground. About a mile from the church are the remains of a large cromlech, the table-stone of which is supported on three upright pillars; in a narrow lane to the west is an upright stone 13 feet high and having 5 sides; while in an adjoining field is a block of granite capped with a conical stone of greywacke.

MAGHERA, a market and post town, and a parish, in the union of MAGHERAFELT, barony of LOUGHINSHOLIN, county of LONDONDERRY, and province of ULSTER, 16 miles (S.) from Coleraine, and 102 (N.) from Dublin, on the coach-road to Coleraine; containing 14,511 inhabitants, of whom 1123 are in the town. This place is evidently of great antiquity; and though there is no precise account of the original foundation of an abbey for Canons Regular, said to have been established here at a very early period, yet it is certain that the ancient see of Ardstra or Ardsrath was removed, in 597, to this town, which continued to be the seat of the diocese till 1158, when it was united to the see of Derry, and the cathedral church established in that city. The town appears to have declined rapidly in importance after that period; and few events of historical interest occur, except occasional depredations during the insurrections of the O'Nials (to whom the surrounding territory belonged) and in the war of 1641, during which it was burned by the insurgents under Macdonnell. In 1688, the town, which had scarcely recovered from its former devastation, was assaulted by the Irish adherents of James II., and the inhabitants were compelled to abandon their houses, and seek refuge in the city of Derry. During the disturbances of 1798 it enjoyed comparative tranquillity, and it has since been gradually increasing in extent and importance.

It consists of one long and spacious street, from which several smaller streets branch off; and contains 201 houses, most of which are modern buildings of stone, roofed with slate, and of handsome appearance: the town is a great thoroughfare, and is amply supplied with excellent water. The inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture, and in the linen manufacture, which is extensively carried on in the parish; and at Upperland is a bleach-green, where about 8000 pieces are annually finished for the English and American markets: there are also numerous corn and flax mills on the different streams, of which the Moyola forms part of the southern boundary of the parish. The general market, on Tuesday, is amply supplied with all kinds of provisions; a market is also held on Friday, chiefly for grain; and there are fairs on the last Tuesday in every month, for cattle, sheep, pigs, and pedlery. The market-house, the property of A. Clarke, Esq., of Upperland, is a large neat building, erected in 1833, on a rising ground in the centre of the town; and over it is a spacious room in which petty-sessions are held on alternate Saturdays, and a manorial court monthly, in which debts under 40*s.* are recoverable.

The PARISH comprises 24,791¼ statute acres, the greater portion good arable and pasture land; there is some of inferior quality, and a large tract of waste and bog. The mountain district is very extensive, and abounds with grouse and every other kind of game. The system of agriculture is improved, and the highlands afford excellent pasturage for cattle: the vale of the Moyola, and the vicinity of the town, are extremely productive; and in the bogs are several fertile spots, called by the country people "islands," which are in a good state of cultivation. Limestone, found on the estate of the Mercers' Company, is extensively quarried, and is productive of great benefit to the neighbourhood. On the plantation of Ulster, the lands of the ancient see of Maghera were confirmed to the Bishop of Derry, and other parts of the parish were assigned by James I. to the Mercers', Vintners', Salters', and Drapers' Companies of London, who still retain possession of their manors. The principal seats are Maghera House, Fairview, Rowens Gift, Upperland, and Clover Hill.

The LIVING is a rectory, in the diocese of Derry, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the tithe rent-charge is £761. 10. 9. The glebe-house was built in 1825, at an expense of £3077. 6., of which £1278. 2. were a grant from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was defrayed by the incumbent; the glebe comprises 907¾ acres, valued at £651. 10. per annum. The church, a neat edifice of stone with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, towards which the same Board granted a loan of £1363. 6., was erected in 1819; the east window is embellished with stained glass, presented by the lady of the late Bishop Knox. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish is the head of a district, comprising also the parish of Killelagh and part of that of Termoneeny; the chapel at Lamny is a plain modern edifice, and there is also a chapel at Fallagloon, a handsome building with a campanile turret and a bell. There are places of worship for Presbyterians in connexion with the General Assembly. The parochial schools, held in a large building near the church, erected in 1821 at an expense of £400, of which £100 were a parliamentary grant and £125 were given by the Mercers' Company, are supported by the rector; a school at Swattragh is aided by the Mercers' Company, and one at Craigadick by Mr. Clarke. There are also 15 private schools, in which are about 550 children; and three Sunday schools. A voluntary poor fund and a dispensary have been established.

The ruins of the old church are highly interesting, and some portions bear marks of very remote antiquity: over the west entrance is a representation of the Crucifixion, rudely sculptured in high relief, with ten of the Apostles; and in the churchyard are the tomb and pillar of Leuri, the patron saint, whose grave was opened some years since, when a silver crucifix was found in it, which was carefully replaced. About three miles from the town is Doon Glady, a very large and perfect rath, which gives name to one of the townlands; it is encompassed with treble walls and a trench. There are several other raths and forts in the parish. Numerous celts, swords, spear-heads, and ornaments of bronze and brass, have been found in the parish and vicinity, and are in the possession of the rector. Some remains exist of ancient iron-works, established at Drumconready in the reign of Charles I., and destroyed in 1641; they consist of the foundations of the buildings, and heaps of half-smelted ore and charcoal.

MAGHERACLOONY, a parish, in the union of BAILIEBOROUGH, barony of FARNEY, county of MONAGHAN, and province of ULSTER, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Kingscourt; on the confines of the counties of Louth, Cavan, and Meath, and on the coach-road from Dublin to Londonderry; containing 9012 inhabitants. On the verge of this parish, at the ford of Bellahoo, a battle was fought in 1539, between the Lord Grey, and O'Nial and O'Donell; at the same spot one was also fought by General Ireton. The parish comprises 14,952 statute acres (including 336½ under water) principally good arable and pasture land; there are a few detached bogs, and some extensive plantations, but scarcely any waste land. Of late years, the land has been much improved by draining and the large quantity of lime used as manure: limestone is abundant in the southern part; coal of indifferent quality is also found. A branch of the river Leggan bounds the parish for about four miles on the south-west: the principal lakes are those of Fea, Feo, Rahans, and Graghlone, besides which there are some smaller. The seats are, Lough-Fea Castle, the residence of the Shirley family, a spacious and handsome structure in the Elizabethan style of architecture, situated in a richly planted demesne including Lough Fea within its limits; Derry; and Coolderry.

The LIVING is a vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop; the rectory is impropriate in Colonel Moore, and the tithe rent-charge is £937. 10., of which £515 are payable to the impropriator, and the remainder to the vicar. The glebe-house, erected in 1816, cost £941. 10. 9¼., of which £323. 1. were a gift, and £415. 7. a loan, from the late Board of First Fruits, the residue having been supplied by the incumbent; the glebe comprises 40 acres, valued at £60 per annum. The church is a neat structure, built in 1835, at an expense of £738. 9., being a loan from the same Board. The Roman Catholic parish is co-extensive with that of the Established Church, and has chapels at Rocks and Corlan: the latter, a spacious oblong structure, 90 feet by 40, was erected in 1825, and has a burial-ground attached; the site was given by E. J. Shirley, Esq., who contributed £25 towards the building. The parochial school-house is a good slated building, erected at an expense of £150, part of which was a grant from the Lord-Lieutenant's school fund.

MAGHERACROSS, a parish, in the poor-law unions of ENNISKILLEN and LOWTHERSTOWN, partly in the barony of OMAGH, county of TYRONE, and partly in the barony of LURG, but chiefly in that of TYRKENNEDY, county of FERMANAGH, and province of ULSTER, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Eniskillen, on the road to Omagh; containing 5202 inhabitants. The parish extends from north to south nearly five miles, and the same from east to west; and comprises 10,452¾ statute acres, of which 343¾ are in the barony of Omagh, and 170¼ in Lurg: 71 are water. About 50 acres are woodland, 1500 waste and bog, and the remainder of the land good arable and pasture; the soil is fertile, the system of agriculture improved, and there is a due supply of peat for fuel. The principal seats are Jamestown and Crocknacrieve. A large fair, chiefly for horses, is held on Feb. 12th at Ballinamallard, where is a receiving-house for letters in connexion with Enniskillen and Omagh. The living is a rectory and vicarage, in the diocese of Clogher, and in the patronage of the Bishop: the tithe rent-charge is £246. 8. 4. There is no glebe-house; the glebe comprises 300 acres, valued at £176 per annum. The church was recently built, partly by subscription, but chiefly at the expense of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the Roman Catholic divisions the parish forms part of the district of Whitehall, or Derryvullen; the chapel is a small thatched building. There are places of worship for Wesleyan and Primitive-Wesleyan Methodists, in connexion with the Established Church. About 600 children are taught in the parochial and six other public schools; and there are five private schools, in which are about 200 children; two Sunday schools; and a dispensary.
